Nuclear China, Assertive Japan Likely To Dominate Rumsfeld Trip. Under the headline "Washington And Beijing Stoke Nuclear Fears," the Financial Times (6/2, Dickie, Sevastopulo) reports Secretary Rumsfeld is due in Singapore today for a three-day security conference that is "likely to include much discussion about China." The FT says the Pentagon "drew plenty of attention" in its report last week that suggested US analysts "had been surprised by changes in the capacity of China's nuclear deterrent. … It is not entirely clear what surprises the Pentagon was referring to since the unclassified version of the report provided few details about new developments." But the report "was a reminder of the possibility for mutual miscalculation between the world's most powerful country and its most populous."

The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Wain, 2.11M) focuses its coverage on the "deteriorating political relations between Japan and China," saying that while the US "has recently stepped up its criticism of Chinese military spending, some Asian countries have become alarmed about an increasingly nationalistic Japan." Former ASEAN leader Rodolfo Severino said that while the US "has a major presence in the region, 'the defining relationship in East Asia will be between China and Japan. … Unfortunately, they just don't like each other, and they sense a certain rivalry.'"

Some Lawmakers Object To Lobbying From Chinese Embassy. The Washington Times (6/2, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside The Ring" column, "The Chinese Embassy continues to lobby Congress with impunity on the issue of Taiwan. The latest effort was a recent letter to members of the House Armed Services Committee aimed at China-related provisions of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill." Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong "warned that provisions increasing military ties between the Pentagon and Taiwan and improving Taiwan's defenses against a Chinese attack 'will do serious harm to China-U.S. relations' if enacted into law. Mr. Zhou said the new provisions would create a military alliance between the United States and Taiwan and violate diplomatic communiques governing U.S.-China ties." The letter "has angered several lawmakers who view it as foreign government interference in the congressional legislative process."

Chinese Officials Seek Sympathy For Country's Problems. The Los Angeles Times (6/2, Magnier, 958K) reports, "Chinese officials have settled on a new mantra in meetings with visiting foreign dignitaries: You've seen Beijing and Shanghai. Now it's time to go out to the countryside and see our tired, our poor, our huddled masses yearning to be fed." The Times adds, "Behind the polite invitation is a more substantive message. Namely, you may view us as a strategic threat poised to steal your jobs, drive up your gas prices and take over the world. But take a peek beyond the tall buildings and bright lights and you'll have more sympathy for our problems. And then maybe, just maybe, you won't be so hard on us. … Even on trips abroad, officials are making the pitch for a visit to the Chinese sticks. … Encouraging influential foreigners to have a 'Green Acres' moment not only helps outsiders better understand China in all its complexity, it also makes tactical sense."

OPEC Rejects Venezuelan Proposal To Reduce Production. The CBS Evening News (6/1, story 5, 1:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Oil ministries of the OPEC cartel meeting in Venezuela today agreed to keep pumping crude at nearly full capacity, rejecting their host's call to cut production. That did not stop Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez from again blasting his favorite target, the United States." CBS (Regan) added, "All eyes were on Venezuela's leftist wildcard President Hugo Chavez today. In typical fashion, he ranted against the US, calling Americans imperialists who have been taking advantage of Latin America's resources for decades."

The Financial Times (6/2, Hoyos, Webb-Vidal) reports Chávez "angered OPEC ministers with anti-US rhetoric as they united against him in rejecting his call to cut the oil cartel's production." And the Washington Post (6/2, D5, Mufson, 744K) says "oil traders and analysts took little comfort from OPEC's commitment, noting that the cushion between world supply and demand remained uncomfortably thin." Moreover, they said, "the oil producers were unlikely to reduce output when they could cash in on record high prices that many consumers think are already out of control." The Wall Street Journal (6/2, Bahree, Luhnow, 2.11M), among other sources, runs a similar story this morning.

Uribe Win Seen As Backlash Against Chavez Model. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M), "Liberty lovers across the Western Hemisphere are cheering Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's second-term victory on Sunday. Colombians gave their president more than 62% of the vote. His closest competitor, the hard-left Carlos Gaviria, whose platform mirrored the ideology of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, earned only 22%. Pro-Uribe parties also won a majority in Congress." The Uribe win "is not only an endorsement of a worldview favoring security, the rule of law and global engagement for Colombia. It is also evidence of a backlash against the economic isolation and hostility toward private property preached by Mr. Gaviria and Mr. Chávez next door."

WHO Puzzled By Indonesian Bird Flu Cluster. AFP (6/2, Kearney) reports the World Health Organization (WHO) "has admitted it was having difficulty identifying the source of bird flu infection in a case where seven people in the same family died of the virus." The case raised fears of human-to-human transmission of the virus and a deadly global flu pandemic. "There are three possible sources of infection, but there is no conclusion," WHO epidemiologist Steve Bjorge told reporters at a joint press conference with Indonesian health ministry officials in Jakarta Thursday. "It's difficult to get good information from that village, and that family," he said. However, Bjorge said the first family member to contract avian flu was most likely infected by her sick chickens.

Local Tests Show Indonesian Girl Died From Bird Flu. The AP (6/2) reports, "An eight-year-old girl in Indonesia has died of bird flu, a health official said Friday, citing local tests." The World Health Organization has yet to confirm the girl's death, which comes three days after her brother died "with similar flu-like symptoms, but no samples were taken." The children's' family "reported that chickens died near their house, and we have been told they had contact with birds," said Dr. Hariadi Wibisono, a senior official at the national Health Department.

Bird Flu Outbreak Could Paralyze African Health System. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/2) reports, "African health systems, already crumbling under the strain of AIDS, malaria and other diseases, could collapse if a bird-flu pandemic takes hold on the continent," health experts said at the World Economic Forum on Africa. Idrissa Sow, a senior WHO official, "said it was vital to increase the number of laboratories capable of testing for the H5N1 virus in Africa." Currently South Africa has the only advanced laboratory facilities, while other countries have had to send samples to Europe for testing.

UN Agency Proposes Plan To Track Birds. The AP (6/2) reports the UN food agency said Thursday it is "considering a plan to fit wild birds with tiny backpacks and monitor their annual migrations to help combat the spread of the deadly H5N1 bird flu." The project would "rely on communications satellites and a network of computers to track the birds' movements" at an estimated cost of $6.8 million, the UN Food and Agricultural Organization said in a statement. A system of radio beacons and satellites would "feed data into the computers of ornithologists, ecologists, virologists and epidemiologists" around the world. "Early warning would give governments and producers more time to respond to potential threat -- with great benefits for the poultry industry and society at large," the FAO said.

Arab League's Reaction To Darfur Violence Decried. Mohammed Buisier, a Libyan-American political activist, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/2, 2.11M), "Once again, the international community, and the UN in particular, is being shamed into acting to stop the massacres in Darfur, and once again the Arab League and Arab leaders are unwilling and unable to face facts, or to deal with them in a civilized and humane manner. Indeed, the most recent Arab League summit, which took place in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum…ended with a resolution denying that any massacres had taken place in Darfur and expressing resistance to any outside intervention in the 'interna'" affairs of an Arab country. (Not surprisingly, this stance is identical to that taken by Osama Bin Laden.)" Buisier adds, "By adopting this argument, the Arab League was not just covering up for the atrocities perpetrated by the Sudanese government, but also for the direct or indirect involvement in this part of the Sudan of some of the Arab governments attending the summit." It is "but one more shameful manifestation of Arab governments turning a blind eye to the continuing inhumane atrocities committed against their own citizens."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Free And Uneasy (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

TIRANA, Albania -- After four years in Guantanamo Bay, Abu Bakker Qassim, a former terror suspect cleared last year of having ties to al Qaeda, got word last month that he finally would be set free.

He and four fellow Muslims from China were loaded onto a U.S. military transport plane in the middle of the night, shackled to the floor and flown for 12 hours to their new home: a converted military barracks in Tirana, the capital of Albania.

The compound is located on a potholed road strewn with garbage. It has high walls, bars on the windows and a guard at the gate. The five men occasionally leave but don't venture far. They've found no one in this small Balkan country who knows their native language, a Turkic tongue spoken by the Uighur (pronounced WEE-gur) people of China.

"I think Allah must be testing our patience," says Mr. Qassim, a 37-year-old father of three from Xinjiang, a historically Muslim region of deserts and mountains in western China. Pointing to strands of rusty barbed wire outside his window, he rolls his eyes. Freedom, he says, "is not what we expected."

The U.S. is also in a predicament it never expected: What should it do with Guantanamo inmates who have been found deserving of release but who face jail or execution if returned to their homelands?

It's a question that has grown urgent in recent weeks as the United Nations and even stalwart ally Britain have turned up the heat on Washington over Guantanamo prison. Critics say the camp stains America's reputation, upends the Geneva Convention governing treatment of prisoners and fuels Muslim anger. Eighty-nine inmates are now staging a hunger strike, drawing further attention to their plight.

Washington's hesitation to repatriate some detainees reflects its growing unease with authoritarian states it initially enlisted as partners in the post-9/11 war on terror. U.S. forces used an air base in Uzbekistan during the war in Afghanistan, but Washington strongly criticized the former Soviet republic last year when Uzbek security forces killed scores of unarmed protesters. Uzbekistan then evicted the U.S. military.

Fear of being sent home is so strong that an exonerated Egyptian detainee, Ala Abdel Maqsud Muhammad Salim, had his U.S. lawyers ask a federal court in January to block his release to avoid his being sent to Egypt, where he expected harm. The U.S. dropped a plan to return the sickly and nearly blind prisoner. He's still in Guantanamo.

U.S. officials say they scouted for two years for a country ready to take Mr. Qassim and his companions, beginning the search even before their exoneration. The U.S. was wary of sending them to China. Beijing severely punishes Muslims from the far west who criticize the Communist government or advocate independence. Unwilling to let the men live in the U.S., American officials say they approached more than 100 countries. All said no or waffled, fearful of upsetting China and reluctant to take on America's problem. Then Albania, an impoverished land with a large Muslim populace and a brutal communist past, said yes in April.

Messy Struggle

The decision pushed the country of some 3.5 million into a messy big-power struggle. Soon after the five Uighurs reached Tirana, China accused Washington of hypocrisy for letting them go. Beijing demanded that Albania hand over the men, whom it calls terror suspects. Prime Minister Sali Berisha says he was harangued by China's ambassador. Mr. Berisha says he's glad he gave the five Uighurs a haven, but regrets that it "has become very noisy around here." The Chinese Embassy in Tirana declined to comment.

Guantanamo Bay now holds around 460 detainees. These include four who have been declared "no longer enemy combatants" -- bureaucratic jargon for innocent. About 116 others, though not exonerated, are no longer considered a serious threat or valuable to U.S. intelligence.

Among those who have been cleared but remain at Guantanamo is Zakirjan Hassam, an Uzbek dissident desperate to avoid going back to Uzbekistan. Like China, Uzbekistan rallied early to the "war on terror," viewing it as a vindication of its own harsh measures against restive Muslims.

Before sending detainees home, U.S. officials seek guarantees they will be treated humanely and prevented from causing trouble for America in the future. Those issues have slowed U.S. negotiations with Saudi Arabia over the repatriation of Saudi nationals at Guantanamo, although 15 Saudis there were sent home last month.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has cited such complications in explaining why the Guantanamo prison can't simply be closed. The U.S. is working "almost daily" with foreign governments to reduce the number of prisoners, she has said. On a visit to Britain in April, Ms. Rice said: "We don't want to be the world's jailer."

Guantanamo critics blame the dilemma on the Bush administration's refusal to adopt swift and transparent procedures for judging guilt or innocence. They say lengthy incarceration leaves people with the stigma of terrorism even if they eventually get cleared. Lawyers for Mr. Qassim and other absolved detainees say those who are found innocent should be allowed to settle in America.

"The U.S. made this mistake," says Sabin Willett, a Boston corporate lawyer who early last year volunteered to defend Mr. Qassim and another Uighur detainee. "After four years at the Guantanamo prison, America owes them better than to be swept under an Albanian rug."

Unlike many of the world's Muslims, China's Uighurs often like America. Chafing at rule by Beijing and a flood of ethnic Chinese into their region, many Uighurs look to the U.S. for help. Calls for outright independence from China have faded but anger at police heavy-handedness and restrictions on religious worship have triggered sporadic bouts of unrest.

Mr. Qassim says that before leaving China in 2000 he used to listen to U.S.-funded Radio Free Asia, which broadcasts news in Uighur and other Asian languages. "It was very sad and disappointing to have a country we respect treat us in the way we've been treated," he says.

A native of Yining, a town near China's border with Kazakhstan, he used to work in a state leather factory and as a small-time trader. He ran into trouble after anti-Chinese riots in his hometown in 1997. Mr. Qassim says he didn't take part in the turmoil, which left at least nine dead, but he began to speak out against Chinese rule. Mr. Qassim says he also grew more interested in Islam, and was jailed for seven months on suspicion of anti-Chinese activities.

In 2000 he moved to neighboring Kyrgyzstan, hustling for work in a big bazaar. There he met a fellow Uighur from Yining, Adel Abdu Al-Hakim, now with him in Albania. The two later decided to move to Turkey, hoping to work at a leather-jacket factory run by a ethnic Uighur living there.

With no money for air tickets, they headed overland for Pakistan, where they say they intended to get visas for Iran. Discovering this would take months -- and fearful of staying on in Chinese ally Pakistan -- they opted to wait in Afghanistan.

The two men say they left Pakistan in the summer of 2001 to join some 30 anti-Chinese Uighurs living near the Afghan city of Jalalabad. The U.S. would subsequently describe their settlement as a "training camp."

The Uighurs in Guantanamo strongly denied that description in their tribunals. According to transcripts, each insisted the place was just a cluster of ramshackle buildings. Mr. Qassim says he studied the Quran and occasionally took pot shots with a Kalashnikov rifle, but received no "terrorist" training. Both he and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim say they had never heard of the Afghan-based Osama bin Laden and had no intention of joining him.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim heard reports of a likely U.S. attack on Afghanistan from a Uighur who listened to Radio Free Asia. He says he didn't expect any trouble, as the Uighurs had no quarrel with America.

Late at night a few days later, U.S. planes bombed their settlement. Ayup Hajimemet, now 23 and the youngest of the five Uighurs in Albania, says he arrived at the village just as the bombing started. He joined a group of fleeing residents, including Mr. Qassim, and headed for the mountains. They later discovered their destination was called Tora Bora, the focus of a failed U.S. hunt for Mr. bin Laden.

DOJ_NMG_0031219

Hungry and frightened, they say they sought shelter in a cave, only to be driven out by wild monkeys throwing stones. "We don't fit in anywhere in the world. Even monkeys don't want us," says Mr. Qassim.

Betrayed by Locals

After some two months of foraging and begging for food, Mr. Qassim and other Uighurs decided to get out of Afghanistan. They made a three-day trek across snow-covered peaks into Pakistan. Upon arriving, they say, local tribesmen gave them a warm welcome -- and then betrayed them.

After a lamb feast, the 18 Uighurs were taken to a mosque, herded into vehicles, driven to a jail and handed over to U.S. forces, who flew them to an American prison in Afghanistan. Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim says the 18 were captured by Pakistani bounty hunters. He overheard people saying the hunters received $5,000 each for the captives from the U.S. A Pentagon spokesman said he couldn't discuss "tactics, techniques and procedures" used to combat terrorism.

After some six months of interrogation in Afghanistan, the 18 Uighurs captured in Pakistan were put on a plane to Guantanamo, their heads hooded, their arms and legs tethered. Upon arrival in Cuba, they say they were each given an orange jumpsuit, a copy of the Quran and an "internment serial number." Mr. Qassim became ISN #283.

China cheered the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, linking it to its own crackdown in Xinjiang. Beijing soon issued a report claiming the Uighur activists were "supported and directed by Osama bin Laden." It named as an al Qaeda affiliate a small Uighur group called the East Turkistan Islamic Movement.

At Guantanamo, much of the interrogation of the Uighurs focused on the movement, which the U.S. in late 2002 declared a terrorist organization. The Uighurs in Guantanamo denied any involvement with the group.

The U.S. let Chinese interrogators interview Mr. Qassim and other Chinese nationals at Guantanamo, according to the men and court documents. Most refused to talk, but they were rattled: Mr. Qassim says the Chinese made veiled threats against their families back in Xinjiang and appeared to have had access to information the Uighurs had given U.S. interrogators. A Pentagon spokesman said the U.S. "works with a variety of nations to try and determine the status of detainees."

Out of 22 Uighurs with Chinese nationality sent to Guantanamo, U.S. officials concluded early on that Mr. Qassim and the four now with him in Albania weren't terrorists. But for reasons that remain unclear, U.S. authorities failed to inform the five Uighurs of that. In early 2004, the Pentagon asked the State Department to start looking for a possible home for them abroad.

Later that year, the Uighurs and hundreds of others got their first chance to formally contest their status as "enemy combatants." This followed a 2004 Supreme Court decision that prompted the Pentagon to set up so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals. Detainees appeared before the secret panels shackled and without lawyers, but were allowed to defend themselves. Remarks in declassified transcripts suggest the Uighurs' hearings took place in late 2004.

"Treating a person like me this way is not fair," Mr. Qassim told the tribunal, claiming that he opposed China, not America. The U.S., he complained, "was to help young Uighur people, and now they are saying we are the enemy.... We Uighurs have more than one billion enemies and that is enough for us."

Mr. Hajimemet, the young man who reached Afghanistan just as bombs were falling, was the only one of the five Uighurs to learn much English. While in prison, he says, he sometimes lashed out in response to taunts from American guards and to the daily humiliations of "being treated like an animal." He spat at a guard. "Even a donkey kicks back," he says. He wasn't tortured, he says, but on one occasion was thrown against a metal bed, leaving him with a lingering back injury.

The review tribunals set up in 2004 examined 558 cases in all and ruled that 38 detainees should be reclassified as "no longer enemy combatants." Among them were the five Uighurs now in Albania. The 13 other Uighurs who had been seized with them in Pakistan are all still "enemy combatants" and remain in Guantanamo.

In March 2005, Mr. Willett, the Boston lawyer, filed a petition in the U.S. to force the government to bring Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim to court. U.S. officials declined to inform him that his clients already had been cleared. "The whole approach has been to keep Guantanamo a great big secret," says Mr. Willett, a partner at Bingham McCutchen LLP. "In the fog of war, mistakes are made," he adds. "The dishonor comes of hiding them."

Four months later, in July, Mr. Willett got permission to visit Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim in Cuba. The two men were chained to the floor in a tiny plywood hut, the lawyer says. Only at this meeting was he finally told they had been exonerated. Mr. Willett returned to the U.S. and filed an emergency motion demanding their immediate release.

About a month later, Mr. Qassim and the other exonerated Uighurs were moved to less-severe quarters in nearby Camp Iguana. They could walk around without chains and were allowed to watch nature videos. News broadcasts were banned. Mr. Willett requested permission to send a Uighur-English dictionary and other language materials but was told this was forbidden. Defense Department rules bar inmates from developing any skill, even English, that might be used against the U.S.

At a U.S. court hearing last August on Mr. Willett's call for the prisoners' release, a federal judge denounced the term "no longer enemy combatant" as "Kafkaesque." When assured by a government lawyer that the case would be resolved "soon," the judge snapped, "Define soon." In a December ruling, he declared the continued detention of Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim was "unlawful" but said he couldn't order the release of the innocent men because this would involve immigration issues outside of his purview.

Mr. Willett appealed, and a hearing was set for May 8. With the legal pressure mounting, the government stepped up previously fruitless efforts to find the Uighurs a home. U.S. officials at one time considered letting the Uighurs into America, but that option was rejected "at a senior policy level" out of concerns over possible litigation and security, says a senior State Department official.

Sending the Uighurs back to China was never an option, say U.S. officials. The State Department's annual report on global human rights, released in March, concluded that China had "used counter-terrorism as an excuse for religious repression of Uighur Muslims." It also reported that a Uighur sent back to China from Nepal against his will had been executed. The State Department's latest report on global terrorism, issued in April, now lists the East Turkistan Islamic Movement as a group of "concern."

Albania was first approached about taking the Uighurs late last year, and initially balked. In April, the U.S. ambassador to Tirana went to see Prime Minister Berisha. Mr. Berisha had assisted the U.S. in the 1990s, helping the Central Intelligence Agency hunt down alleged Islamic militants in Albania. The militants were later expelled to Egypt and, in two cases, hanged. Albania was also seeking U.S. backing to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Berisha says he told the ambassador that Albania would take the Uighurs as a "favor to a friend," so long as America was sure they weren't terrorists. The U.S. agreed to cover the costs of their resettlement. Albania, he says, owes a lot to America, most recently for its 1999 military intervention in Kosovo, populated largely by ethnic Albanians.

China, which under Mao Zedong was a close ally of Albania, heard of the plan and was livid. A scheduled visit in May to Beijing by Albania's foreign minister was called off.

Three days before the May 8 U.S. court hearing on the Uighurs, Mr. Qassim and the four others were bundled onto the transport plane. Though told they were going to Albania, they were terrified the flight might end in China. Mr. Qassim says he calmed down only when the door of the plane opened and he saw European faces.

'Pay Any Price'

Local newspapers splashed their arrival across the front pages. The opposition blasted the government for upsetting China. Two days after the Uighurs landed, Prime Minister Berisha met with Vice President Dick Cheney in Croatia at a gathering of three countries hoping to join NATO. The prime minister said Albania was ready to "pay any price" to join the alliance. Mr. Cheney said he endorsed the entry of Albania, Croatia and Macedonia.

In Tirana last week, Mr. Berisha said he was baffled that so many major nations declined to take the Uighurs, including the U.S. itself and the European countries that call for Guantanamo's closure. "Big countries don't like to deal with small problems," he said.

Mr. Qassim and his companions, meanwhile, have shaved off the long beards they had grown in jail to fit in with zealously devout Arab inmates. They now have a driver to take them around Tirana, and have found a Turkish restaurant where Turkish-speaking waiters can just about make out their orders. China's official news agency, Xinhua, says the five men are "faring poorer than rats crossing the street."

On a visit last week to an Internet cafe, the five men searched for news about their case in their native tongue. Then they watched footage from the 9/11 attacks in New York. They'd never seen the images of hijacked planes flying into the World Trade Center before, and they wanted to know what got America so angry.

DOJ_NMG_0031221

Mr. Qassim groaned as he saw the jets slam into the towers. "This is awful, really awful," he said. "If this hadn't happened, we would never have gone to Guantanamo."

89 Gitmo Detainees On Hunger Strike (AP)

By Andrew Selsky

AP, June 1, 2006

More Guantanamo Bay detainees have joined a hunger strike, raising the total to 89, and six of them were being force-fed, the U.S. military said Thursday.

The strike — which last weekend jumped from three participants to 75 — is now the biggest of the year at the U.S. prison on Cuba, where about 460 men are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

The U.S. military said the detainees were trying to pressure the United States to release them, but a human rights attorney described the strike as a desperate appeal for justice.

Six hunger strikers were being force-fed, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand — two more than last weekend.

"All are being closely monitored by the ... medical staff and being counseled on the health effects of long-term hunger striking," Durand said in a statement from Guantanamo Bay.

Military officials said the hunger strikers are an attempt to gain public sympathy to pressure the United States to release them.

Ben Wizner, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney who has been to Guantanamo Bay, said the growing hunger strike appears more like a call for help by detainees.

"The vast majority have never been charged with any crime, and have been prevented from communicating directly with the outside world," Wizner said in a telephone interview from New York. "So it may well be their attempt to ensure that the world is reminded of their unlawful detention."

A U.N. panel said May 19 that holding detainees indefinitely at Guantanamo Bay violates the world's ban on torture. The panel said the United States should close the detention center.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen and British Attorney General Lord Goldsmith are among those who also recently have called on the United States to close Guantanamo.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington cannot turn loose "people who have vowed to kill more Americans if they're released."

Only 10 Guantanamo detainees have been charged with crimes. The Supreme Court is expected to rule in June whether President Bush overstepped his authority in ordering the detainees to be tried by U.S. military tribunals.

The hunger strike comes amid increasing displays of defiance from the prisoners, who have been held for up to 4 1/2 years, with many claiming their innocence.

On May 18, a detainee staged a suicide attempt to lure guards into a cellblock where they were attacked by prisoners armed with makeshift weapons, the military said. Earlier that day, two detainees overdosed on antidepressants they collected from other detainees and hoarded in their cells. The men have since regained consciousness.

The hunger strike began in August and peaked at 131 last fall, according to the military's count, before declining to three earlier this year as the military used more aggressive force-feeding methods, including a restraint chair. Force-feeding is done through tubes inserted into the nose.

Physicians for Human Rights has called on the United States to halt the "brutal and inhumane force-feeding tactics."

"The commanders of Guantanamo are not tolerating people on hunger strike," said Leonard Rubenstein, executive director of the doctors' group, adding that detainees were apparently being force fed before their lives are at risk.

"These are policy decisions made by commanders, not by physicians," Rubenstein said from Washington in a telephone interview.

U.S. officials said the measures are "safe and humane" and have been used in American civilian prisons.

German Spy Agency Admits Mishandling Abduction Case (NYT)

By Souad Mekhennet, Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

Germany's external intelligence service, the BND, said yesterday that it knew about the American seizure and detention of a German citizen 16 months before the country was officially informed of his mistaken arrest. It was unclear whether that information had been passed on to senior officials.

Germany had previously maintained that it did not learn of the abduction of its citizen, Khaled el-Masri, until he returned to Germany in May 2004.

The disclosure on Thursday, made as a parliamentary inquiry into the case reconvened in Berlin, adds to suspicions that European governments, or at least their intelligence services, have abetted the American practice of "extraordinary rendition." The phrase refers to the kidnapping of terrorism suspects by American agents who then secretly transport the suspects to third countries for interrogation, beyond the jurisdiction of American laws.

Any European participation in the extrajudicial seizures and detentions, not to mention the torture that is said to be involved, would constitute a breach of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Council of Europe, which enforces the convention, is investigating the allegations of European participation in the American rendition program.

Mr. Masri's ordeal, first reported by The New York Times in January 2005, is one of the best-documented cases of extraordinary rendition. The case ignited outrage in Germany, and the government has publicly criticized the Bush administration.

Mr. Masri said he was detained in Macedonia in December 2003. His name is similar to that of a man wanted in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks.

He said the Macedonian authorities held him for 23 days before turning him over the Central Intelligence Agency, which flew him to Afghanistan, where he was held for five months. He said he was flown to Albania and released after his captors determined that he was not the man they were seeking.

The American ambassador to Germany, Daniel R. Coats, officially informed Berlin of Mr. Masri's mistaken arrest shortly after his release.

Although the United States has acknowledged that Mr. Masri was detained as part of the rendition program, neither American nor Macedonian authorities have officially confirmed that he was seized in Macedonia. But a Macedonian official who was directly involved in the case acknowledged Macedonia's role in the abduction after being promised anonymity.

"This declaration from the BND makes it clear that everything started in Macedonia and that he was handed over to the Americans there," said Manfred Gnjidic, Mr. Masri's lawyer in Ulm, Germany. Mr. Gnjidic maintains that the German government knew about Mr. Masri's abduction and did nothing.

In a statement on Thursday, the BND said it had interviewed all of the employees of the Germany Embassy in Macedonia this year after a Times article reported that Macedonia had informed Germany of Mr. Masri's case within days of his transfer to American custody.

The intelligence service said no one reported knowing anything. But now, with a parliamentary commission preparing to call witnesses in its investigation, one midlevel BND official at the embassy has come forward to say that he was told of Mr. Masri's arrest in early January 2004.

According to the statement, the unidentified BND employee said that while eating in a Macedonian government canteen, someone he did not know told him that a German citizen named el-Masri had been arrested in Skopje, Macedonia's capital, and handed over to the Americans.

Because the matter was unrelated to the BND employee's job, the statement said, he did not do anything. It also said there was a "high possibility" that the employee did not tell anyone else. The BND said the information should have been forwarded to its headquarters in Berlin.

"I asked during my time in Macedonia to talk to someone from the German Embassy, and one of the Macedonians told me, 'But the Germans don't want to talk to you,' " Mr. Masri said on Thursday.

N.Y. Steamed Over Terror Fund Cutbacks (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE

The AP, June 2, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- From Times Square and the Empire State Building to the Brooklyn Bridge and the Statue of Liberty, New York is a city of spectacular landmarks. Ask any of the 41 million tourists who visited last year.

But according to the Homeland Security Department, New York has no national monuments or icons - a determination that led to a 40 percent cut in anti-terrorism funding.

New Yorkers are seething over the news, and some are demanding the firing of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., charged that the Bush administration had "declared war on New York" with its decision to reduce anti-terrorism funding by $83 million while increases went to cities like Jacksonville, Fla., Louisville, Ky., and Omaha, Neb.

"I'm not begrudging any other city, but why would you cut the No. 1 target in the country by 40 percent?" said King, who demanded an investigation. "How can you possibly justify that?"

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on Thursday said President Bush "should not come back to New York and stand with us" until his administration comes up with more money to keep New York safe.

"This is wrong and unfair, but also outrageous," Schumer said. "The bottom line is this is abandoning New York."

The cutback comes nearly five years after the terrorist attack that killed 2,749 people at the World Trade Center, and a week after a Pakistani immigrant was convicted of conspiring to blow up the subway station at Herald Square, the site of Macy's flagship store, one of the world's most popular shopping destinations.

In Washington, Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman said his agency would review its finding that New York City has no national monuments or icons that would be at risk of terrorist attack.

"We're going to go back and look at it," said Foresman, who said that the decision was made partly on attendance figures. A federal worksheet based on a variety of data was used to determine the "icon" status and the funding.

Chertoff defended the cut on Thursday, while acknowledging that New York City was still at the top of the U.S. threat list. He said the nearly $125 million in grants for New York were in line with the average amounts the city has gotten in the years since Sept. 11. He added that New York has gotten more than $500 million in all, and that is more than twice the total received by the next-highest-risk city, Los Angeles.

"When actual decisions get made it tends to rub people who came out on the short end the wrong way. We are always willing to listen to criticism," he said in a speech at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank.

The local tabloids have savaged Chertoff, with an editorial cartoon in the Daily News comparing him to Benedict Arnold. "Terror? What Terror?" asked a mocking front-page headline in the New York Post. "Shove off, Chertoff!" read page one of the Daily News.

Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., called for Chertoff's resignation. Mayor Michael Bloomberg was less militant, although he questioned what was happening in Washington.

"I don't have to list the Brooklyn Bridge, the United Nations and Rockefeller Center and the Statue of Liberty and Empire State Building and the Stock Exchange," Bloomberg said. "So you really wonder what was going through somebody's mind."

Assorted terror plots targeting the subways and other city landmarks have come to light since the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. Schemes have mentioned the United Nations, the Holland and Lincoln Tunnels, and the federal building housing local FBI offices.

NYPD officials said the drastic cut in funding ignored the city's uncomfortable position as the top target for terrorists to strike. The department was depending on the federal money to:

- Finance an $81.5 million proposal to safeguard Lower Manhattan and parts of midtown with a surveillance "ring of steel" modeled after security measures in London's financial district.

- Pay half of the $200 million annual cost of heavily armored patrols - called Operation Atlas - and other current security measures, including protection for the nation's largest mass transit system.

- Provide $38 million for counterterrorism training and equipment, such as biological and radioactive detection devices.

One out-of-towner visiting the Empire State Building on Thursday had no problem with the federal cutbacks.

"At some point, you have to stop pouring in money," said George Kent, 77, of Reno, Nev. "I think the national treasury needs the money."

City Has Itself To Blame For Terror Cuts, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Al Baker And Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The federal agency distributing $711 million in antiterrorism money to cities around the nation found numerous flaws in New York City's application and gave poor grades to many of its proposals.

Its criticism extended to some of the city's most highly publicized counterterrorism measures.

In a report that outlines why it cut back New York City's share of antiterrorism funds by roughly 40 percent, the Department of Homeland Security was so critical of some highly viewed local measures — like Operation Atlas, in which hundreds of extra police officers carry out counterterrorism duties around the city each day — that the Police Department and other city agencies must now seek further federal approval before drawing on the money they were given to pay for those programs.

In a flurry of charges and countercharges, federal officials said yesterday that the city not only did a poor job of articulating its needs in its application, but it also mishandled the application itself, failing to file it electronically as required and instead faxing its request to Washington.

City and state officials insisted that they had made no mistakes. And a state official provided a written acknowledgement from the federal government saying that the city's application for grant money has been "successfully submitted" and said that the city could "log in" any time to view the application.

New York City received $124.5 million from the Department of Homeland Security, about 40 percent less than the $207.5 million it received the year before. Many smaller cities around the country, like Charlotte, N.C., saw their shares increase sharply.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg questioned yesterday whether old-fashioned pork barrel politics was at play in doling out the money in an election year. He was one of several elected officials who moved on different tracks to uncover how the decisions were made, with an eye toward revising that process.

"We tried to do an analysis of some of the moneys and whether or not they were given out for political reasons, and in fact in many of the places where they got money — but arguably there's no threat — there are close elections either at the Senate level or the House level," the mayor said. "Now, whether that was their motive I have no idea."

The White House tried to minimize the effect on New York. The grants will be reconsidered each year and could change if "some grand and unforeseen need arises," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. "The point of homeland security, as I said before, is to provide security for the entire homeland," he said. "And certainly no disrespect meant to New York with $124 million for this coming year."

The report, obtained yesterday, pointed out opposing views held by cities and the federal government over how antiterrorism money should be spent and, as an extension of those views, how terrorism should be fought.

City officials have used federal money to subsidize continuing costs, like paying overtime to officers. The federal government, on the other hand, wants the grants to pay for semipermanent safeguards that can increase security over the long term, like improvements in communications systems, better gas masks and increased training.

The report faulted the city for not adequately explaining why the money being requested could reduce risks.

Though the report said the city was in the top 25 percent of urban areas at risk, it rated the city in the bottom 25 percent in the quality of its application. It rated the Police Department's counterterrorism program and Operation Atlas as below average in sustainability, a criticism of the continuing overtime costs.

Eight of the city's programs including the counterterrorism division and Operation Atlas, as well as some health and training programs — fell in the bottom 15 percent, meaning any federal money used toward them will need to be specifically approved.

Elected city officials were especially stunned that the report said New York had no national monuments or icons. The city's application was evaluated by so-called peer-review panels of five to seven people with varying backgrounds from 47 states and affirmed by government analysts at the Department of Homeland Security.

Angry officials in New York zeroed in on the peer review process yesterday, trying to determine who evaluated the programs and whether their judgments were clouded by a desire to steer security money to their own areas. City officials questioned whether the reviewers had expertise in antiterrorism efforts.

Members of New York's Congressional delegation presented a united front in pledging action to change the allocations. Representative Peter T. King, a Republican and chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said he would hold hearings to investigate the process, while Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, both Democrats, wrote letters to Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, demanding a full explanation.

In Washington, Mayor Anthony A. Williams described the decision to cut his city's allocation by 40 percent as shortsighted.

A spokeswoman, Sharon Gang, said the Homeland Security Department did not give much of a rationale for the cuts and that their proposals rated average or above average on almost all counts.

"It sounds like they made a unilateral, gut decision not based on our application," Ms. Gang said. "And they scored other locations higher."

Officials in New York said the impact of the cash drain would be felt.

"We have a counterterrorism center that would deal with all of the potential scenarios that we have been studying that we have to be prepared for that could be dramatically affected by any cut in funding," said Fire Commissioner Nicholas A. Scoppetta. "It's as though Washington is not going to be convinced of the need until they have another terrible incident in a place like New York or Washington."

Paul J. Browne, a senior aide to Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly and the department's chief spokesman, said: "The N.Y.P.D. will continue to do what it needs to do to keep the city safe," he said. "We'll just be doing it without D.H.S. stepping up to the level expected of it."

He said the department's counterterrorism work had been essential in defending the city since 9/11 "What more evidence do they need?" he said.

Stephen C. King, a lawyer who specializes in emergency-response and domestic security issues at Hunton & Williams in New York, said he could not understand the 40 percent cut to the city. "I'll have to look at it closer," he said, "but I can't wrap my arms around that one."

Though the federal officials said the city did not file properly, the city said state officials filed its package, and a state official said its package of applications was filed electronically on March 2, the deadline.

In an interview, George W. Foresman, under secretary for preparedness as the Department of Homeland Security, applauded some of the security work being done by New York, while raising the question of just what is the proper use of the federal funds.

"Do you pay for what are viewed as basic capabilities; law enforcement, fire, E.M.S., public health, emergency management?" he asked. "Whose role is it to pay for that, versus whose role is it to pay for specialized training and equipment for fire, E.M.S. and law enforcement?"

Mr. Chertoff said yesterday: "There was no suggestion about anything we did that New York is not the No. 1 terror target. But I do think it's fair to ask this question: After a city gets $500 million, more than twice as much as the next-largest city, is it correct to assume they should continue to get the same amount of money year after year after year after year with everybody else dividing up what remains?"

Still, Mr. Schumer called the episode an "absurdity," saying the grading system did not make sense.

"It would be as if you got 800's on your boards and Stanford Law School rejected you because you put the stamp on upside down," he said.

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

If Al Qaeda is planning on following up its 2001 attacks on New York and Washington with an assault on Nebraska, the Department of Homeland Security's new urban areas security grants are brilliant. But, of course, the White House, Wall Street and densely populated urban areas are the most likely terrorist targets, and these are precisely the places the department dangerously shortchanged this week. The new grants, which slash spending for New York and Washington by 40 percent — and shower money on Omaha and Louisville — are more about pork barrel politics than security. Given how important the stakes are in protecting the nation against terrorism, they are also a disgrace.

Scarce antiterrorism money should be rigorously aimed at the places most at risk of attack, but the Bush administration and Congress have consistently refused to do so. While efforts to protect subway riders in New York City and federal workers in downtown Washington are badly underfinanced, places that would be bizarre targets have been swimming in federal funds. The Northwest Arctic Borough, an Alaskan area of 7,300 people, spent $233,000 a while back to buy decontamination tents, night vision goggles and other equipment.

This week, the Department of Homeland Security has skewed things even further against Americans who live in the places that are most likely to be attacked. New York's share of the urban areas security program falls to $124 million from $207 million last year, and Washington's falls to $46 million from $77 million.

There appear to be serious problems with the department's evaluation process. Rather than having impartial antiterrorism experts make recommendations, it relied on anonymous "peer reviewers" recommended by governors, mayors and local homeland security departments. The panels appear to have been too focused on politics, and not enough on safety. The resistance to financing operating costs, like police overtime, ignores the fact that day-to-day groundwork does the most to combat terrorism.

Some of the specifics of the decision process are downright bizarre. New York City's evaluation found that it had no "national monuments or icons." The department concedes that omitting the Statute of Liberty was an "oversight," but it still seems unaware that to many would-be terrorists, the biggest American icon of all is simply — New York.

The responsibility for the bad allocations lies with President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. But Congress also has a poor record in this area. Representatives of high-population states like New York, California and Texas have continually lost out in their efforts to enact a more risk-based formula. Congressmen from the areas that have been shortchanged this week are vowing to fight. Representative Peter King, a New York Republican who is chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, says he wants New York to be "made whole," either by adjusting the most recent grants or finding money from other budgetary sources.

When President Bush and the Republican Party were looking for a backdrop for their 2004 national convention that symbolized America's war on terror, they came to New York City, not Omaha. Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff owe the American people a system that recognizes the vulnerability of places like New York and Washington not just when the television cameras are rolling, but when the money is being handed out.

Flash: DHS Disputes Al-Qaeda's 5-Star Rating Of Two U.S. Cities (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman was leaving the Chamber of Commerce on H Street yesterday morning when he met one of his subordinates, Tracy Henke, arriving to deliver a speech.

"It's gonna get better," Foresman told Henke, consolingly.

Henke shrugged. "You just roll with it," she said.

Or, more likely, get rolled. Henke, who is in charge of Homeland Security's grant-making, has become a target of ridicule since she announced plans Wednesday to cut counterterrorism money for New York City and the Washington area -- which together have been the targets of 100 percent of al-Qaeda's terrorist attacks on American soil -- by 40 percent each.

Adding insult to this injury, Henke's department judged that the nation's capital is a "low-risk" city and that the Statue of Liberty, Brooklyn Bridge and Empire State Building are not worthy of "national icon" status. By contrast, those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis -- both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri -- received boosts in funds. Other winners: the horses of Louisville, the cattle of Omaha and five cities in Jeb Bush's Florida.

Sounds dubious? Sorry, you can't see the data Henke used. Classified.

To nobody's surprise, the actions at DHS have brought furious condemnations, most notably from Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, who wrote in Thursday's New York Post: "As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City."

Henke seems rattled. Arriving for her speech yesterday to a DHS-backed group called the Citizen Corps, she was a bit out of breath and hurried to the stage, saying "I'm up again." She immediately brought up the controversial grant announcement and appealed to her audience for some love.

"Needless to say, not everybody has nice things to say about me," she said, so "anybody who wants to say something nice, please feel free to do so. You know, it's one of those things where it's occasionally important to have a little bit of that positive affirmation. If nothing else, then I'll have to call my parents, and the reality is they don't give it to me either."

In this time of torment over big-city terrorism funding, Henke opted to recall her small-town upbringing. "People come to Washington and they forget where they came from and they think all knowledge, all information, all good ideas generate in the marble buildings of Washington, D.C.," she argued. "Guess what? Not true. Not true at all. I'm very fortunate, I come from a very small town in Missouri." She said she keeps a sign in her desk that says "Remember where you came from."

Henke has. St. Louis, not far from her hometown of Moscow Mills, gets a 31 percent boost in counterterrorism money under the new formula.

The new DHS plan is advertised as a "risk-based" model, but it came up with almost the opposite conclusions to a Rand Corp. study last year that calculated terrorism risk to 47 cities. Seven of the 10 highest-risk cities in the Rand study will lose funding under the DHS plan; six of the 10 lowest-risk cities in the Rand study will see increases in funds, including such hot spots as Milwaukee and Tampa.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff tried to tamp down the controversy in a speech later at the Brookings Institution, arguing that "it's only a reduction if you choose to look at the highest year of funding" -- which happens to be last year. This explanation didn't satisfy, and Chertoff, barraged by questions on the subject, became petulant, saying that "threatening the secretary is not a way to drive funding decisions," and "there's a little bit of the quality of what-have-you-done-for-me-yesterday about some of the criticism."

Foresman, the undersecretary for preparedness and Henke's boss, avoided the controversy as he spoke to the Citizen Corps yesterday. "We have a moment in time where we've got sustained federal funding to states and communities," he told the group.

Sustained? The urban terrorism funds are to be cut 14 percent overall.

Approached by reporters after his speech, Foresman allowed that the new formula isn't just about a city's risk; he said there's also an "effectiveness" score, rating each city on "how well are they able to articulate the application of resources." Washington and New York were, evidently, not as "articulate" as DHS desired. Never mind that the urban grants were supposed to balance out other counterterrorism programs that, under a formula imposed by Congress, give disproportionate money to such strategic hubs as Vermont, North Dakota and Wyoming.

A reporter asked Foresman how he can be sure the new criteria are valid. "Good question," he allowed.

The lady from Missouri entertained no such uncertainty. "I'm happy to defend it," Henke said before her speech, in which she boasted that "we have accomplished a tremendous amount."

Asked later if she expected the uproar, she replied: "There's no getting around the outburst coming. Risk exists elsewhere in the nation and we have done a much better job at identifying, calculating and analyzing that risk."

And besides, she added, "you have sites in Wyoming that have risks associated with them."

It's true: The bison of Grand Teton have lived in fear of al-Qaeda long enough.

Is D.C. Ready For Terrorist Attack? (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0031228

Two unrelated traffic accidents within an hour of each other yesterday in Northeast shut down two major highways during the busy morning commute, causing massive gridlock and seemingly endless delays -- but also providing an ominous warning: What if it had been a terrorist attack?

The Bush administration has spent $2 billion to protect the city since the September 11 attacks -- assigning law-enforcement personnel, rerouting traffic and erecting barriers -- and countless millions have been disbursed by state and local governments to avoid a gridlock catastrophe in the event of another attack.

But the prospect of being able to get either in or out of the city without being caught in a massive traffic jam remains in doubt in the event of an incident or the evacuation of government buildings.

Even the agencies assigned the task of responding to a terrorist attack could contribute to the problem: A Code Red declaration by the Department of Homeland Security -- meaning that an attack was imminent or had taken place -- could result in an immediate lockdown of public and government facilities and restrictions on public travel.

Under the direction of Homeland Security, emergency personnel and equipment would need to be directed to the area, transportation systems would be "redirected or constrained," and public and government facilities could be closed.

Although the department's definition of Code Red and what protective measures would be required if it were instituted are vague, redirected or constrained means roads, bridges and tunnels could be closed, and airports and train stations could be shut down or limited.

"No plan is perfect and responding to these kinds of situations is a work in progress," said Natalie Jones Best, emergency preparedness and risk manager for the D.C. Department of Transportation. "But we have developed multiple response plans, identified emergency routes and come up with contingency plans to manage traffic in the event of an emergency.

"An incident like the one that occurred this morning, although unfortunate, gives us the opportunity to take a look at those plans and go back and make changes if necessary," Ms. Jones Best said. "It puts us in a position of being able to better manage our resources and strengthen our response."

Homeland Security officials did not return calls yesterday for comment.

Lon Anderson, spokesman for AAA Mid-Atlantic, said the main commuter routes in the Washington area operate at maximum capacity, leaving almost no alternative if one becomes blocked because of an accident.

"Add a major incident that takes away a major commuter route and it doesn't mean that everything slows down. It means that everything stops," Mr. Anderson said.

Gridlock is not uncommon in the D.C. area because of incidents involving national security or other law-enforcement concerns, dating to at least 1998, when an Alexandria man threatened to jump off the Woodrow Wilson Bridge and stopped traffic for more than five hours. D.C. police shot him in the leg with a beanbag bullet and he jumped into the water. The man survived, but the incident backed up Beltway traffic for more than 20 miles.

In March 2003, Dwight Ware Watson, dubbed the "Tractor Man," brought much of Washington to a standstill when he decided to protest tobacco-subsidy cuts by driving a tractor into a Constitution Gardens pond on the Mall. U.S. Park Police cordoned off the area from the Washington Monument to the Lincoln Memorial. The federal government emptied several nearby offices and closed off major traffic arteries. Over the two days of the siege, four consecutive D.C. rush hours saw massive traffic jams.

Major evacuations of federal buildings in the District also have been prompted by suspicious events, forcing an exodus out of the city. In 2005, a pilot's errant flight into restricted D.C. airspace May 11 prompted evacuation of the White House, the U.S. Capitol and the Senate and House office buildings, but also exposed a breakdown in communications between federal agencies and city officials, who did not know about the evacuation because they had disconnected a communications line between the Federal Aviation Administration and the Metropolitan Police Department.

After 24,000 military personnel and civilians who work at the Pentagon were evacuated on September 11, along with much of official Washington, highway gridlock took over in the nation's capital. Police also cleared the Capitol and all House and Senate office buildings, and the drive out of the city took hours.

Ms. Jones Best said she was "caught" in yesterday's traffic jam but managed to find a detour by listening to the radio -- saying the ability of government to get timely information to the public was "key" in being able to manage any crisis situation. She said that safety is "always our top concern" and that law-enforcement personnel and other first responders can determine "hot spots" and divert traffic to other areas.

Randall J. Larsen, director of the Virginia-based Institute for Homeland Security, a nonpartisan, not-for-profit research organization, yesterday questioned the rush by federal, state and local governments to evacuate the city in a terrorist attack. He said that there may not be any reason to leave and that finding "shelter in place" -- a small, interior room with no or few windows -- could be a better option.

"Other than a hurricane, why would you need an evacuation plan?" asked Mr. Larsen, a retired Air Force colonel and originator of the first graduate course on homeland security at the National War College. "If it's a nuclear attack, forget it. A chemical attack, you don't have to go that far. I see no need to have all these evacuation plans."

Mr. Larsen also said federal, state and local governments have to first decide when an evacuation is actually necessary and then be able to coordinate that effort with each other and with hundreds of responding law-enforcement officers. He called it a difficult task, noting that 20 local governments make up the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments alone, along with "a lot" of federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies.

"One of the major problems for the D.C. region and the Department of Homeland Security in general has always been, 'Who's in charge?' " he said. "Just who orders an evacuation, when and why? They are all difficult questions."

Ms. Jones Best said the question of who's in charge depends on where an incident occurs.

"Locals are always the first responders and are in charge until the situation dictates otherwise," she said. "We've held a number of exercises and met the people we need to talk with. A process is in place, and it establishes a clear liaison to FEMA."

Can the Federal Emergency Management Agency do the job in the wake of criticism for its handling of Hurricane Katrina?

"I think FEMA recognizes that it has gaps and is working to improve," she said.

Chertoff: FEMA Is Hurricane-ready (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And Nick Martin

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal disaster agency criticized for bungling last year's response to Hurricane Katrina stands ready for this year's hurricane season with a more experienced leader, a bigger cache of supplies and new high-tech systems to figure out how bad a disaster is and get help there faster, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff says.

At the start of the 2006 hurricane season, which began Thursday, the Federal Emergency Management Agency is “much more prepared than we were last year or any previous year,” says Chertoff, whose department includes FEMA.

But some disaster-response experts, members of Congress and FEMA employees are skeptical. “The proof will be in the pudding,” says James Lee Witt, FEMA chief from 1993 to 2001. “I just hope and pray it won't be such a bad season.”

Leo Bosner, head of the FEMA headquarters employees' union, says many experienced employees have quit since Katrina hit last August. “I'll cross my fingers” that newly hired staff have enough training to respond, Bosner says. “But I really don't know what kind of shape we're in.”

FEMA officials insist the agency is ready for the new season with:

•Up to five times as much supplies as last year, from truckloads of water and ice to laptop computers.

•New high-tech systems, such as satellites that can send real-time video to FEMA headquarters to show officials what's happening and GPS tracking for equipment.

In the states that tend to be hit hardest, emergency-response officials say they're cautiously optimistic about FEMA's ability to respond. They're also reminding people that it may be up to 72 hours after a storm before help arrives.

In Charleston County, S.C., emergency preparedness director Cathy Haynes is holding community meetings. One slide in her show puts it bluntly: “Why do you need to be prepared? … Emergency agencies will be OVERWHELMED!”

And Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, isn't convinced that FEMA's ready. “We still have people who are living in tents,” he says. “There's still suspicion in the Gulf Coast region.”

Army Builders Accept Blame Over Flooding (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

In a sweeping new study of the causes of the disaster in New Orleans last year, the Army Corps of Engineers concludes that the levees it built in the city were an incomplete patchwork of protection, containing flaws in design and construction and not built to handle a storm anywhere near the strength of Hurricane Katrina.

"The hurricane protection system in New Orleans and southeast Louisiana was a system in name only," said the draft of the nine-volume report, released yesterday in New Orleans.

Several outside engineering panels that have been critical of the corps have come to similar conclusions, and have found a more extensive chain of flaws in the design, construction and maintenance of the 350-mile levee system.

But the 6,113-page report is remarkable for being a product of the corps' own official investigation, which brought together 150 experts from government, academia and business to study what went wrong and how to build better systems for the future.

The region's network of levees, floodwalls, pumps and gates lacked any built-in resilience that would have allowed the system to remain standing and provide protection even if water flowed over the tops of levees and floodwalls, the report's investigators found. Flaws in the levee design that allowed breaches in the city's drainage canals were not foreseen, and those floodwalls failed even though the storm waters did not rise above the level that the walls were designed to hold.

But the system was also overwhelmed in significant ways by Hurricane Katrina, and some degree of flooding would have happened even if the floodwalls had not been breached by the surging waters, the report stated.

"Regardless of breaching or no breaching, there would have been massive flooding and losses" from the hurricane, Lewis E. Link, the director of the study and a senior research engineer at the University of Maryland, said in an interview. "The losses were increased because of the breaching that occurred."

The investigators found no evidence of negligence or malfeasance by the corps or its contractors, but said the corps had failed to take into account the tendency of the local soil to sink over time, leaving some sections of levee lower than they should have been. The corps did not re-examine the heights of levees even after it had been warned about the degree of subsidence, the report said.

Similarly, the corps designed the system to protect New Orleans against a relatively low-strength hurricane, the report found, and did not respond to warnings over the years from the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration that a stronger hurricane should have been the standard.

The report suggested the corps has had trouble keeping up with the fast-changing world of geotechnical engineering, and does not share critical information among its many parts. Although the corps had indications that the floodwalls might fail under intense storm conditions, "the pieces were not put together to solve the puzzle," the report said. More must be done, it concluded, to share information among those who do research and those who design and build systems.

The report, which is already being used in the repair and improvement of New Orleans's flood protection, warned that the area "remains vulnerable" to any storm with surge and wave conditions like Hurricane Katrina's.

The chief engineer of the corps, Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, said in an interview that the report showed that "we missed something in the design," particularly in the construction of the drainage canal floodwalls that caused so much of the flooding.

According to the report, the corps designers did not anticipate the way the floodwalls would fail as water climbed high against them: in several breaches, including the one at the 17th Street Canal, the force of the water pushed the floodwall back slightly, opening a gap deep into the earthen levee below that allowed water to course down under high pressure and push the wall aside.

General Strock did not go so far, however, as to apologize on behalf of the corps for the decades of decisions that went into the system.

"It is what it is," he said. "Call it a mea culpa, or call it a dry recognition, or admission, or whatever — but we're not ducking our accountability and responsibility in this."

Nonetheless, he made it clear that he believed outside influences had played a role in the problems of the flood protection system, though he said that did not absolve the corps. As one example, he cited plans by the corps in the 1970's to put large barriers at the narrow openings between Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico.

The corps backed off from that plan after a court challenge from environmental groups and then proposed floodgates at the city's drainage canals. But local officials of the levee boards and sewerage and water boards blocked that plan, as well. So the corps went with the next fallback plan of building floodwalls in the canals.

"Each time, we backed off," General Strock said. "Each time we did that, we assumed an increment of risk. I don't think anybody looked back and said, 'Risk, risk and risk adds up to unacceptable levels.' "

He said this was not an effort to lay blame at the feet of others, because ultimately the corps had responsibility for what it built.

"At the end of the day, we have to stand by the decisions," he said. If the corps builds floodwalls, he said, those floodwalls have to stand up to the test and the system has offer the intended level of protection. "And we didn't get there," he said.

The corps announced this week that it had substantially met its goal of repairing the city's hurricane protection system by June 1, the beginning of hurricane season, though there was significant work still to be done, including on two of the three enormous gates at the mouths of the city's major drainage canals.

If an unseasonably early hurricane approaches with threats of a storm surge, corps officials say, they will drive sheets of steel across the mouths of the canals and remove the rainwater with portable pumps. That could lead to street flooding, but should prevent the catastrophic breaches that allowed Lake Pontchartrain to pour billions of gallons into the center of the city.

A setback was announced this week as a 400-foot section of levee in Plaquemines Parish, south of New Orleans, shifted as it neared completion. The marshy soil of the area could not support the weight of the earthen levee structure, which slumped and bulged. It is being repaired.

Robert G. Bea, an engineering expert at the University of California, Berkeley, who has been critical of the corps, said he was impressed by the level of criticism in the report.

"This report has got a tone in it that is not like anything we have seen before," Dr. Bea said. "They're coming forward now."

But he said he wished that the corps had admitted other failures and gone further in delving into the internal reasons for those failures. A report by Dr. Bea and colleagues, released last month, said organizational dysfunctions within the corps had created an environment with little responsibility or accountability, and within which safety concerns could be easily played down.

Yesterday's report did not address that question in depth, but General Strock said it would be dealt with in a subsequent study.

Corps: Levees' Design Caused Deadly Failure (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, June 2, 2006

New Orleans' levees failed during Hurricane Katrina because federal engineers for decades did not anticipate the potential height of storm waters and underestimated the strength required to hold them back, the Army Corps of Engineers concluded Thursday.

“That is a very sobering thing for us,” said Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, the corps chief. “This is the first instance of a failure of a corps design of any significance.”

A well-designed levee system might not have held back the high waves and storm surge that swamped nearly 80% of New Orleans and vast areas nearby, but it would have minimized damage and allowed a swifter recovery, the corps said in a 6,000-page report.

The design of critical levee walls that failed near Lake Pontchartrain on New Orleans' north side was “marginal,” the report said. Tests conducted by the corps in the 1980s showed that the levees could crumble under pressure from high water — as they did after the storm hit on Aug. 29 — but those findings were not used in the design.

The corps oversees construction of flood controls in the nation's waterways. Katrina damaged 169 miles of the 350-mile levee system that protects the New Orleans area and caused more than 1,570 deaths in Louisiana alone. The corps, Strock said, is “deeply saddened and enormously troubled by the suffering of so many.”

The report, prepared with the help of outside engineers and scientists, offers the most complete account yet of why the levees failed. Some engineers said the report did not go far enough in identifying failures within the corps. A report last month by engineers at the University of California-Berkeley urged that the corps be made more efficient and less vulnerable to political pressure.

“If you cannot fix the organizational problems, the flood control problems will never be fixed,” said Robert Bea, a Berkeley professor who helped prepare last month's analysis.

The corps' report estimated what would have happened if the levees had held. Katrina's storm surge still would have flooded large areas, but the central neighborhoods of New Orleans and nearby St. Bernard Parish would have been flooded only one-third as badly.

This finding underlies the importance of building levees that will not crumble even if water flows over them, said Ed Link, a University of Maryland engineering professor who oversaw the task force that prepared the report.

“You could dramatically reduce the catastrophic losses and flooding,” Link said.

Army Corps Of Engineers Admits Levee Defects Caused Flooding (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The Army Corps of Engineers acknowledged today that design defects in the levees protecting New Orleans caused the majority of flooding during Hurricane Katrina and that the disaster will almost certainly trigger reforms in how the federal government protects the American public.

The corps said that its 40-year effort to construct a hurricane protection system for the region of southern Louisiana had resulted in a set of piecemeal projects that "was a system in name only," a recognition that a wide range of errors, weak links and incomplete construction was at the heart of the massive damage that occurred on Aug. 29.

The corps released a 7,000-page investigation that is carefully worded and written in the language of government engineers, but delivers a stunning set of findings about errors made in the design of storm walls and earthen levees that failed during Katrina.

The report found that four major breaches of I-walls, a type of concrete storm wall that sits on top of an earthen levee, caused 65% of the flooding in the greater New Orleans area.

Although the report's executive summary never uses the words "design defect," corps officials said they now accept that their work had shortcomings and errors were largely responsible for the disaster.

"We do take accountability," Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander and chief engineer of the corps, said at a news conference in a downtown hotel, attended by five Army generals, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast reconstruction and an assistant Army secretary.

The corps, Strock said, "is deeply saddened and enormously troubled" by the finding.

Strock said every section of I-walls will eventually have to be replaced because they proved ineffective during Katrina. The four breaches occurred when storm waters were several feet below the tops of the walls, meaning they had failed well below the maximum forces they had been designed to withstand.

The report also puts in the historical record a formal acknowledgment of the scope of the disaster, which killed 1,293 people.

"The flooding caused a breakdown in New Orleans' social structure, a loss of cultural heritage and dramatically altered the physical, economic, political, social and psychological character of the area," it said. "These impacts are unprecedented in their social consequence and unparalleled in the modern era of the United States."

Although many of the detailed technical findings had been released earlier in preliminary reports by the corps, the report contained a large amount of new information:

• Southern Louisiana is sinking much faster than generally recognized and levees were at substantially lower elevations relative to sea level than they were designed to be. In some cases, levees were 2 feet below their designed elevations. Moreover, the corps deliberately decided not to reexamine the problem, even as other federal agencies were recognizing the problem.

• The city's pumping system, which provides the only way to remove water from a city below sea level, wasn't designed to operate during a major storm and that the impact of the flooding could have been reduced if the city had not lost its ability to pump water after Katrina. Because most of the region's pumps were inundated by the flood, it took 53 days to pump out the city, allowing the floodwaters to saturate and destroy structures.

• 25% of all the housing units in southern Louisiana were destroyed by Katrina. In New Orleans, the proportion is believed to be higher.

Strock said the repaired sections of levees are now the strongest parts of the system. The repairs were supposed to be completed by today, but are behind schedule by about two months. The enormous undertaking required heavy construction work on 169 miles of damaged or destroyed levees.

Although the breaches caused most of the flooding, a significant part of the Katrina damage occurred because the storm was larger than the system was designed to resist.

While wind speeds had dropped sharply by the time the hurricane hit New Orleans, its power over the Gulf of Mexico had created the largest ocean surge to ever hit the North American continent, the report said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Promises To Disclose Haditha Findings (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

The White House said Thursday that it took nearly a month for President Bush to learn that the military was investigating reports that Marines murdered unarmed civilians in Iraq.

On Tuesday, the White House said Bush was briefed "soon after" the opening of the probe, which was prompted by inquiries about the Nov. 19 incident from Time magazine.

A reporter from the magazine asked U.S. military officials on Feb. 10 about the circumstances surrounding the alleged massacre, in which 24 people in Haditha, an insurgent stronghold in western Iraq, were killed following a bomb attack on a military convoy in which a Marine died. Four days later, on Feb. 14, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of Multinational Corps Iraq, ordered an investigation into the incident, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday.

But, Snow said, Bush was not informed about the existence of the investigation until March 11, when he was briefed by national security adviser Stephen Hadley.

A preliminary report on March 3 recommended additional inquiry. Chiarelli received initial findings from that on March 9 and asked for the further review, which still is ongoing, Snow said. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were informed the next day and Bush the day after, on a Saturday.

Time reported the investigation on March 19.

Bush pledged Thursday that the results of the inquiry will be made public.

"The world will see the full and complete investigation," he said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House. "If there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account."

A senior defense official said last week that military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines.

The Iraqi government is conducting its own investigation.

Based on the timeline given by Snow, the U.S. military appears to be conducting four investigations into different aspects of the incident, including into why the American military's initial statement about the incident described it as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement, which said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, has led some to allege a coverup.

The president said the ethical training ordered for U.S. troops in Iraq came as a result of the Haditha investigation.

"This is just a reminder — for troops in Iraq or throughout our military — that there are high standards expected of them and that there are strong rules of engagement," said Bush, who said he has spoken to Pace about the matter several times.

"At the same time what you're seeing is the Marine Corps reminding our troops about what it means to be a Marine — what it means to uphold the honor of that corps, and what it means to adhere to the rules of engagement that we expect our soldiers to adhere to."

Investigators Of Haditha Shootings Look To Exhume Bodies (WP)

By Josh White And Thomas E. Ricks

Criminal investigators are hoping to exhume the bodies of several Iraqi civilians allegedly gunned down by a group of U.S. Marines last year in the city of Haditha, aiming to recover potentially important forensic evidence, according to defense officials familiar with the investigation.

A source close to the inquiry said Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have interviewed families of the dead several times and have visited the homes where the shootings allegedly occurred to collect as much evidence as possible. Exhuming the bodies could help investigators determine the distance at which shots were fired, the caliber of the bullets and the angles of the shots, possibly crucial details in determining how events unfolded and who might have been involved.

The possible evidence was disregarded at first because the slayings originally were not treated as crimes.

NCIS officials said the Nov. 19 incident was not reported to them as a criminal case until nearly four months later -- on March 12 -- and the failure of the Marine Corps to request assistance from investigators sooner could create legal complexities.

The delay already has presented many hurdles for investigators, who have had to rely on dated information, witnesses and suspects who had months to tailor their stories, and a lack of fairly routine forensic evidence that should have been collected at the time the civilians were killed, according to Defense Department officials, defense attorneys and sources close to the criminal probe.

"We are definitely starting with a full count," said one official close to the investigation, who spoke anonymously because he was not authorized to discuss the case. "There's plenty of shoulda, woulda, coulda to go around in this case. We have lots of disadvantages going in, but we will re-create the incident as best we can."

The NCIS is an independent criminal investigative agency that is not in the military chain of command. Its probe has included as many as 50 special agents, forensics investigators and support personnel operating in Iraq and in the United States, the largest homicide investigation of its type since the war in Iraq began in 2003, according to Navy officials.

Ed Buice, a spokesman for the NCIS at the Washington Navy Yard, said yesterday that criminal investigators learned of the Haditha incident on March 12 -- nearly 16 weeks after it occurred -- when the Marine Corps officially requested an investigation. The probe began immediately, and three NCIS agents based in Iraq went to Haditha within 24 hours, Buice said.

"The investigation is labor-intensive, complex and time-consuming," Buice said. "NCIS is committed to following up on any and all tangible leads and evidence."

Buice said the investigation is ongoing and "will remain open until after the findings are adjudicated." While Defense Department officials anticipate potential charges of murder, dereliction of duty and obstruction of justice, the NCIS has not yet reported its findings, and military commanders ultimately will decide what, if any, judicial procedures to initiate.

The NCIS will be looking at the days leading up to the roadside bombing that killed a member of the Kilo Company Marines and allegedly set off an emotion-laced spree of shootings in a series of homes near the explosion. The gruesome death of Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, 20, of El Paso, Tex., occurred shortly before Marines allegedly shot and killed a number of civilians, including women and children.

Now, officials close to the case said, investigators are starting with the men who allegedly were in the houses when shots were fired and working their way out from there.

Sources close to the case said the military is assembling a team of experienced prosecutors for the Haditha shootings case. Defense officials said the Pentagon and the Marine Corps are taking the investigation very seriously.

"I think it's going to be a very difficult case for them to prove," said Vaughan Taylor, a former military prosecutor and instructor in criminal law at the Army's Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School. On balance, he said, he would rather be a defense counsel in the case than prosecute for the government.

"I think there's plenty of avenues for defense in this case -- the fact that it wasn't initially investigated, the fact that there's been plenty of time for witnesses to play with stories. There's a lot of wiggle room in there."

The gap between the incident and the beginning of the NCIS investigation is going to cause major problems in prosecuting any charges, a Marine officer familiar with the case agreed. "They have huge proof problems," he said, citing the lack of identified bodies.

"The long and the short of it is, until they prove the cause of death," they don't have anything, said one civilian defense lawyer representing a Kilo Company Marine. "Photographs won't be enough to do it. Good luck with that."

Marine spokesmen at the Pentagon and at Marine Corps Forces Central Command have declined to comment, citing the investigation.

A separate investigation has found several failures in the aftermath of the shootings, according to top officials familiar with the probe. These include Marines giving false statements and officers in the chain of command not providing proper oversight in the weeks and months that followed. That probe, by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, is expected to be finished this week.

Yesterday, the military announced that Marines and soldiers stationed in Iraq will undergo core values training to reinforce how troops should act on the battlefield. The move is a sign that commanders and leaders in Washington are concerned about the ramifications of the Haditha shootings in Iraq and at home.

Aine Donovan, director of the Ethics Institute at Dartmouth College and a former Naval Academy professor, said Marines have more ethics training than most troops and that there is no excuse for what happened.

"If you look at what happened in Haditha, you had soldiers stressed to the point of no return, and they snapped," Donovan said. "This will be remembered as the worst episode of this war. This will damage the entire profession. You're never going to restore peace by killing civilians."

President Bush said yesterday that the training "is just a reminder for troops either in Iraq or throughout our military that there are high standards expected of them, and that there are strong rules of engagement."

Bush added that "if there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account," and said the nation has "a willingness to deal with issues like this in an upfront way and an open way and correct problems."

Marine Brass Seem Exonerated (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

U.S. Marine Corps headquarters in Washington did not learn of the killing of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha until early March, a timeline that appears to exonerate the highest ranks of the Marine Corps from any cover-up or failure to act.

The U.S. military command in Baghdad learned of the civilian killings in February and began two investigations: one criminal and one administrative.

The administrative probe by Army Brig. Gen. Eldon Bargewell is focusing on whether any information was covered up along the Marine Corps chain of command. This is because the 2nd Marine Division issued a press release Nov. 20 saying Iraqi civilians had been killed in Haditha the previous day by an improvised explosive device (IED) and in a firefight with insurgents.

Officials now acknowledge that the statement was inaccurate. Evidence shows the civilians were killed deliberately by Marines' gunfire during sweeps after an IED killed one of their battlemates.

One key question is: Did senior Marine Corps officers hear of the accusations and fail to act between the time of the Nov. 19 incident and February, when a Time magazine reporter brought the charges to the attention of the Baghdad command?

A timeline that the Marines provided yesterday to The Washington Times would appear to exonerate Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine Corps commandant, and his staff.

DOJ_NMG_0031236

Col. David Lapan, a Marine Corps headquarters spokesman, said the commandant and his staff were apprised in early March by Marine commanders in Iraq. He said Gen. Hagee subsequently received briefings on the criminal probe and then dedicated a tour of Iraq to telling Marines the importance of ethical conduct and the rules of war.

Gen. Hagee yesterday returned from that tour, which began Friday. Col. Lapan said Gen. Bargewell has not interviewed Gen. Hagee.

Col. Lapan, who was in Iraq at the time of the incident as spokesman for the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, said the press release was issued by the division in Ramadi, not by MEF headquarters at Camp Fallujah, where he worked. He said such press statements typically are based on combat reports filed by those who conducted and led the missions.

Col. Lapan said he did not hear of the Haditha accusations until after he left Iraq and returned to the United States.

Gen. Bargewell's administrative report is expected to reveal who filed, or knew about, the false report that led to the press release.

The U.S. military in Baghdad yesterday offered its condolences to the families of civilians purportedly killed by Marines, the closest the command has come to admitting that the deaths were unwarranted.

Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the coalition force in Iraq, issued the "heartfelt condolences" as the new Iraqi government said it would conduct its own investigation. Some local politicians want the Marines charged and tried in Iraq.

Gen. Caldwell announced that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top tactical commander, has ordered troops to undergo renewed values training over the next 30 days to make sure that all forces understand the rules of war.

"It's to reinforce and sustain training that all the troops of the coalition forces received before they go here," Gen. Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad. "It's values-based. And, obviously, his intent is to make sure that it adheres to legal, moral and ethical standards that every military member should be adhering to on the battlefield."

Marine sources said yesterday that it is not clear when Gen. Bargewell will file his report. It is also not clear when the Naval Criminal Investigative Service will conclude its probe into whether the Marines should be charged with crimes, including murder.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees plan to hold hearings into Haditha once Gen. Bargewell completes his investigation. Plans call for decisions on charging the Marines, who belong to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment, at Camp Pendleton, Calif., to fall to Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler. He is the top Marine in U.S. Central Command, which oversees operations in Iraq.

U.N. Fails To Pass On Haditha Reports (WSJ)

U.N. FAILED in January to pass on initial reports of Haditha massacre.

An international official blames "disorganization" for lapse by U.N.'s Iraq mission, which should have informed U.S. ambassador of sketchy allegations. White House says Bush didn't hear about November killings until March, a month after press inquiries prompted commanders' investigation.

Iraqi government will also investigate, while U.S. forces get refresher training on battlefield conduct. Fallout may crimp soldiers' ability to act in Ramadi, an insurgent stronghold.

Shaky Iraqi regime couldn't easily stomach a major new U.S. crackdown, an observer notes.

ROBERTS COURT LOOMS as factor in 2006 elections.

Justices prepare to rule on series of controversial issues at close of first session under Bush's new chief justice. Each side hopes that decisions, to be issued at 10 a.m. each Monday this month, will fire up ideological base as Republican and Democratic candidates square off for control of Congress.

Rulings are expected on military trials for Guantanamo detainees, Texas redistricting driven by DeLay, Vermont's campaign-finance laws, and application of Clean Air Act. With O'Connor gone, close cases may turn on maverick Justice Kennedy, who has infuriated conservatives by citing international law and opposing a voter initiative challenging gay rights.

WHITE HOUSE WOOS Europe but tensions remain over human rights.

After turnabout on direct talks with Iran, Bush will seek trans-Atlantic agreement on reining in Tehran's nuclear program at European Union summit in Vienna. But push is strained by divide over Guantanamo; while European nations want detention camp shuttered and Bush has signaled support, U.S. officials say there are no plans to do so.

Bush weighs human-rights digs of his own at Russia's Putin, who has turned increasingly autocratic. The president plans one-day stopover in Ukraine, Russia's adversary. Before July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg, U.S. officials may attend a gathering of democracy advocates organized by chess champion Garry Kasparov.

One wild card: maintaining Western access to Russia's oil and gas fields, which Putin is making more difficult.

PROPONENTS FRET about prospects for civilian nuclear deal with India.

Pact opening up sale of U.S. technology is top Bush priority, and backers say it has majority support in Congress. But opponents could add "poison pill" amendments that might force New Delhi to scotch agreement to separate civilian and military nuclear programs.

Administration still hopes to win approval before the August recess, despite tight legislative calendar. One new asset: next Treasury chief Henry Paulson, who worked India market as Goldman Sachs CEO.

"I wouldn't throw up the white flag," says Stephen Biegun of Ford Motor, a big corporate backer.

DEFECTION: Some neoconservatives who backed Iraq war slam Bush's outreach to Iran, arguing U.S. policy could be held hostage by Chinese and Russians. "Rice has perfected the primacy of short-term solutions regardless of long-term ill," says former Pentagon official Michael Rubin, now at American Enterprise Institute.

DEFLATION: Greenspan's retirement disappoints A-list journalists and politicians in a way unrelated to economic performance. It ends the Fourth of July fireworks party that the erstwhile Federal Reserve chairman and wife Andrea Mitchell threw annually atop Fed building, overlooking Washington Monument.

DECIDED: Bush's statement that new Treasury chief will advise on "broad" range of issues reflected outcome of Paulson's negotiations over his role. Blogger Robert Waldmann cracks that selection of Goldman Sachs executive means White House was "scraping the top of the barrel."

DOUBTS: Executive branch might be unable to implement Senate immigration bill even if Congress enacts it. Bill would require immigration service to handle 12 million illegals according to length of U.S. residence, processing some within 90 days. Current capacity "is not there," says agency director Emilio Gonzalez, noting the government's 4,000 "adjudicators" already have "day jobs" processing seven million legal immigrants yearly.

Troops Will Get "values" Training (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

WASHINGTON — All 150,000 coalition troops in Iraq will undergo refresher training in “core warrior values” over the next month as top military commanders deal with the fallout from allegations of a Marine massacre last November.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli ordered commanders Thursday to show troops in Iraq — more than 130,000 of them Americans — slides that depict professional military values and the importance of disciplined conduct in combat.

As many as 24 Iraqi civilians died in Haditha after a bomb killed a Marine on Nov. 19. The incident has spawned two investigations: one to determine whether the Marines committed crimes and another to see whether there was an attempted coverup. Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman, said the allegations against the Marines prompted the training.

It's important that troops “take time to reflect on the values that separate us from our enemies,” said Chiarelli, the No. 2 U.S. general in Iraq.

Also Thursday, President Bush promised to disclose the results of the Haditha investigations. Iraq, meanwhile, launched its own investigations of the deaths, the Associated Press reported. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the killings “a horrible crime.”

The incident at Haditha and the investigations may lead to a wider examination of how U.S. troops are fighting the war in Iraq, said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution.

"Some people in the U.S. military have not been discriminating enough in the use of firepower," O'Hanlon said. "This may be the spark for that debate."

David Segal, a military sociologist at the University of Maryland, said the incident in Haditha will change the way troops are trained. "We're going to spend more time talking about how Iraq is different from the kind of wars we fought in the past," Segal said. "We're dealing with an insurgency, not a conventional war."

In Iraq, Lance Cpl. Justin White, 20, of Lexington Ky., said Marines already receive adequate training. He said they have pre-deployment briefings and read policies every 15 days. Squad leaders also go over rules on escalation of force before every patrol.

"It's put in our heads over and over," White said.

After a Cabinet meeting Thursday, Bush said the allegations against the Marines show "that there are high standards expected of (troops) and that there are strong rules of engagement."

Ey said rules require troops to fight only enemy combatants and to treat civilians humanely.

U.S. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who has called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces, said no training can prepare troops for the stress created by the constant threat of a roadside bomb or attack.

"It's the kind of war that's almost impossible to train for," said Murtha, a 38-year veteran of the Marines who served in combat in Vietnam.

U.S. Troops To Review Ethics While Iraq Investigates Haditha (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, June 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A top U.S. commander in Iraq on Thursday instructed all coalition forces to undergo a special training course in "moral and ethical" values following allegations that U.S. Marines shot dead 24 Iraqi civilians in the western town of Haditha last fall.

The move came as Iraq's new government called for U.S. forces operating in Iraq to be subjected to greater accountability and ordered its own investigation into the events of last Nov. 19, when a group of Marines allegedly went on a shooting rampage after one of their members was killed by a roadside bomb and then purportedly sought to cover up the deaths

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki condemned what he called a "terrible crime in which women and children were eliminated" and vowed to establish procedures to monitor and restrain the behavior of coalition forces in Iraq.

"These forces do not respect the citizens, some of whom are crushed by tanks, others shot," he said at a news conference after heading a meeting of his still incomplete Cabinet. "We must speak with them and fix a definition of the obligations of foreign forces."

Al-Maliki said he would establish a special committee to investigate the Haditha incident and would demand an apology from the United States for the killings, something the U.S. military has consistently refused to do when confronted with instances in which civilians are killed.

The disclosures, first reported by Time magazine in March, have been slow to register with a cynical Iraqi public inured to such allegations by repeated reports of U.S. abuses, some but not all of them founded.

But at a time when al-Maliki's 11-day-old government is struggling to assert his authority over an increasingly lawless country, another scandal involving U.S. forces risks damaging the credibility of his efforts in the eyes of many Iraqis, in the way that the Abu Ghraib disclosures tainted the U.S. image.

In Washington, President Bush reiterated promises that investigation results into the deaths of the civilians would be made public.

"The world will see the full and complete investigation," he said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House. "If there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account."

The training effort marks the first attempt by the U.S. military to limit the fallout of the brewing scandal and the first implicit acknowledgement that the current training effort may fall short of what is required for American soldiers operating in the Iraqi environment.

In a statement, the military said that multinational force commander, Lt. Gen Peter W. Chiarelli, had instructed all his subordinate commanders to conduct training for their troops in "core warrior values … highlighting the importance of adhering to legal, moral and ethical standards on the battlefield."

The training will include a slide show and training "vignettes" and will focus on three main areas: "professional military values," Iraqi cultural expectations and the impact of actions that are "contrary to professional military values," the statement said. All soldiers will be required to undergo the training in the next 30 days, at sessions to be held in the locations where they are based, U.S. military officials said.

The statement did not mention the Haditha incident and said that the overwhelming majority of the 150,000 or so coalition forces currently based in Iraq "perform their jobs magnificently every day."

However, it added, "Unfortunately, there are a few individuals who sometimes choose the wrong path."

The U.S. military has launched two investigations into the incident, one by the multinational force in Iraq, which will address questions of policy, procedures and training arising out of the incident, U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said at a briefing in Baghdad.

The second is being conducted by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which is focusing on allegations of criminal misconduct. The findings of that investigation will be reported to the commanding general of the Marines for appropriate action, he said.

"This tragic incident is in no way representative of how coalition forces treat Iraqi civilians," he said.

The allegations, if substantiated, are likely to reinforce Iraqi perceptions that U.S. forces regularly and randomly shoot civilians. Though the U.S. military says it routinely investigates all allegations involving American forces, it has consistently refused to release figures concerning the number of civilians killed or injured by U.S. forces, saying that such figures are not kept.

"About three or four, at least" investigations into shooting incidents involving U.S. forces are currently under way, Caldwell said, without giving details.

Most allegations surround incidents at checkpoints in which U.S. forces open fire on civilians who fail to respond to signals to stop or who approach too fast, such as the one earlier this week in which two women, one of them pregnant, were shot dead as they approached a hospital in the northern town of Samarra.

In the United States, military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi man in April near Baghdad, a defense lawyer told The Associated Press on Thursday. The eight men are being held at Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base north of San Diego, said Jeremiah Sullivan III, who represents one of the men.

Caldwell said the military is also re-examining the U.S. rules of engagement in Iraq to find ways to restrict what the U.S. military calls "escalation of force."

"Gen. Chiarelli in the last several months has made a very concerted effort to reduce the possibility of having to move to escalation of force and he's taken some real, deliberate steps and guidance in that respect," he said.

The Haditha incident is different, however, in that the Marines involved appear to have gone into homes and deliberately shot civilians in an act of revenge for the death of a Marine in a roadside bombing. Witness accounts given to reporters have described how the Marines barged into four houses near the site of the explosion, shooting wildly at the families inside.

According to The Washington Post, investigators have subsequently discovered an attempt to cover up the killings by explaining them away as the result of the roadside bomb. Death certificates show that victims the Marines claimed were killed in the explosion were in fact shot, the newspaper said.

A brief statement by the Marines on Nov. 20 said that a "U.S. Marine and 15 civilians were killed yesterday from the blast of a roadside bomb in Haditha."

An additional eight "gunmen" were killed after they opened fire on the Marines, who returned fire, the statement said.

But according to Time, witnesses say the Marines acted that day as if they were intent on taking revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0031240

"You could tell they were enraged," Taher Thabet, a local trainee journalist who first informed Time about the killings, told the magazine. "They did not only kill people, they smashed furniture, tore down wall hangings and when they took prisoners, they treated them very roughly. This was not a precise military operation."

The Indictment Of U.S. Troops Was Inevitable (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

You knew it had to happen. Haditha, an "incident" involving American troops in Iraq, is now part of the erosion of support for the war in Iraq. The Iraq Syndrome has finally arrived. * * *

This past Monday, Memorial Day, a driver down Manhattan's fast West Side Highway would have slowed at 46th Street to allow the crossing of a constant stream of visitors heading to the USS Intrepid, the aircraft-carrier museum on the Hudson River. It was a beautiful day but a hot day to stand on long lines in the open sun. A small squadron of planes flew up the Hudson in the solemn missing-man formation, with one plane trailing. Amid the sunshine, the chairman of the Intrepid museum, Arnold Fisher, said something to the gathered crowd no one could have expected to hear.

Mr. Fisher, whose family runs the Fisher House Foundation for the military, suggested that the men and women at arms were being forgotten. And he apologized to them. "I apologize to you for carrying the burden of this nation's commitment to freedom and liberty alone." Mr. Fisher's bitterness over the troops is a Cassandra cry, a portent. But why now?

Opinion polls put support for the war below 40%. Still, it has become obligatory now as a nod across the political spectrum to the corrosive Vietnam Syndrome, to reassure that one's opposition is only to the war, not to the men fighting it.

Really? How does that work?

Arnold Fisher said the troops were forgotten, but they are very much on the minds of the news cycle just now. This Memorial Day week the news is preoccupied with stories of the Marine squad that allegedly killed civilians at Haditha, a town in Iraq. The narrative of this story has pretty much set in already: It's another My Lai, we all know they did it, the brass covered it up, and prison sentences for homicide are merely a formality.

Haditha is indeed the new Abu Ghraib. What this most importantly means is that any U.S. military action overseas now, no matter its level of justification, can be taken down by the significance assigned to events by the modern machinery of publicity. This explains why the U.S. commanders in Iraq announced yesterday that all soldiers in the next 30 days would take what the headlines are calling "ethics training." Of the some 150,000 U.S.-led troops there, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the U.S. combat commander in Iraq, said "99.9% of them perform their jobs magnificently." Yes, and 99.9% of them, after all they've been through, will deeply resent the clear inference they lack "core values." Is that different than standard "Corps values"?

Stories of apparently malfeasant U.S. troop behavior are arriving daily now. A military truck whose brakes failed from overheating crashed and killed Afghan civilians. Press reports are now fly-specking whether the troops shot over or at the rock-throwing mob of more than 300 that surrounded them. Every one of these troops surely knows the story of Mogadishu. Been there, never again. But there will be investigations of their behavior.

Finally came the even more lurid pregnant-woman shooting. As transmitted around the world by the BBC: "A pregnant Iraqi woman in labor and her cousin were shot dead by U.S. forces as they rushed to a hospital along a closed road, police and relatives say." The BBC's next four sentences neatly sum up the common story line now in play around U.S. troops: The soldiers said the car failed to heed a stop warning in a prohibited area; the driver said he heard no warning; U.S. troops will be "trained in moral and ethical conduct" and this "comes in the wake" of the Haditha allegations.

In El Paso, Texas, the father of Marine Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, whose death from a roadside bomb is the event said to have precipitated the Marine shootings at Haditha, said simply: "I don't even listen to the news." This may be the widespread reaction as the Haditha story overwhelms all else -- enough, I don't want to hear about it.

And there begins the Iraq Syndrome.

Some elements of the newly ascendant Democratic left may welcome it, but no serious person in American politics should.

The Vietnam Syndrome, a loss of confidence in the efficacy of American military engagement, was mainly a failure of U.S. elites. But it's different this time. This presidency has been steadfast in war. No matter. In a piece this week on the White House's efforts to rally the nation to the idea of defeating terrorism abroad to thwart another attack on the U.S., the AP's Nedra Pickler wrote: "But that hasn't kept the violence and unrest out of the headlines every day." This time the despondency looks to be penetrating the general population. And the issue isn't just body counts; it's more than that.

The missions in Iraq and Afghanistan grew from the moral outrage of September 11. U.S. troops, the best this country has yet produced, went overseas to defend us against repeating that day. Now it isn't just that the war on terror has proven hard; the men and women fighting for us, the magnificent 99%, are being soiled in a repetitive, public way that is unbearable.

The greatest danger at this moment is that the American public will decide it wants to pull back because it has concluded that when the U.S. goes in, it always gets hung out to dry.

Two major military reports will come out soon on the Haditha incident, and no one will gainsay justice if that is required. But the atmosphere around this event is going to get uncontrollably manic, and that will feed the dark, inward-turning sentiments already poisoning the country's mood over issues like the immigration debate.

Good for Democrats? Don't count on it. After this, the public appetite for a Democratic president's "humanitarian" military intervention in a Darfur or East Timor will be close to zero.

One suspects that U.S. troops were party to some awful events in the Pacific and European theaters of World War II, all gone in the mists of history and the enemy's defeat. Not now. Gen. Chiarelli's magnificent "99.9%" notwithstanding, it's the phenomenon of the so-very-public 0.01% -- at Abu Ghraib, on an Afghan street, at Haditha -- that is breaking America's will this time.

Iraqi Accuses U.S. Of 'Daily' Attacks Against Civilians (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 1 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki lashed out at the American military on Thursday, denouncing what he characterized as habitual attacks by troops against Iraqi civilians.

As outrage over reports that American marines killed 24 Iraqis in the town of Haditha last year continued to shake the new government, the country's senior leaders said that they would demand that American officials turn over their investigative files on the killings and that the Iraqi government would conduct its own inquiry.

In his comments, Mr. Maliki said violence against civilians had become a "daily phenomenon" by many troops in the American-led coalition who "do not respect the Iraqi people."

"They crush them with their vehicles and kill them just on suspicion," he said. "This is completely unacceptable." Attacks on civilians will play a role in future decisions on how long to ask American forces to remain in Iraq, the prime minister added.

The denunciation was an unusual declaration for a government that remains desperately dependent on American forces to keep some form of order in the country amid a resilient Sunni Arab insurgency in the west, widespread sectarian violence in Baghdad, and deadly feuding among Shiite militias that increasingly control the south.

It was also a sign of the growing pressure on Mr. Maliki, whose governing coalition includes Sunni Arabs who were enraged by news of the killings in Haditha, a city deep in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province. At the same time, he is being pushed by the Americans to resolve the quarreling within his fragile coalition that has left him unable to fill cabinet posts for the Ministries of Defense and the Interior, the two top security jobs in the country.

Military and Congressional officials have said they believe that an investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis in Haditha on Nov. 19 will show that a group of marines shot and killed civilians without justification or provocation. Survivors in Haditha say the troops shot men, women and children in the head and chest at close range.

For the second day in a row, President Bush spoke directly about the furor surrounding the case. "Obviously, the allegations are very troubling for me and equally troubling for our military, especially the Marine Corps," President Bush said Thursday, in response to a question from a reporter after a meeting of his cabinet. Referring to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, he added, "I've spoken to General Pace about this issue quite a few times."

Investigators are examining the role of senior commanders in the aftermath of the Haditha killings, and trying to determine how high up the chain of command culpability may rest.

Marine officials said Thursday that Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, who was the top Marine Corps commander in Iraq during the Haditha killings, had been set to be promoted to become the service's senior officer in charge of personnel, a three-star position.

General Johnson is widely respected by the Marine Corps' senior leadership, yet officials said it was unlikely that the Pentagon would put him up for promotion until the Haditha investigations were concluded.

The Washington Post reported Thursday that a parallel investigation into whether the killings were covered up has concluded that some officers reported false information and that superiors failed to adequately scrutinize the reports about the two dozen deaths.

The newspaper said that the inquiry had determined that Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, a squad leader present at Haditha, made a false statement when he reported that a roadside bombing had killed 15 civilians. The inquiry also said that an intelligence unit that later visited the site failed to highlight that civilians had gunshot wounds.

In Baghdad, senior Iraqi officials demanded an apology and explanation about Haditha from the United States and vowed their own inquiry.

"We in the ministers' cabinet condemned this crime and demanded that coalition forces show the reasons behind this massacre," Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zubaie, one of the most powerful Sunni Arabs in the new government, said in an interview.

"As you know, this is not the only massacre, and there are a lot," he said. "The coalition forces must change their behavior. Human blood should be sacred regardless of religion, party and nationality."

Mr. Zubaie, also the acting defense minister, acknowledged that Iraqi officials would probably not be able to force the extradition of any troops suspected of culpability in the Haditha killings. But he said a committee of five ministers, including defense, interior and finance, would investigate the killings with the expectation that American officials would turn over their files. "We do not have the security file because it is in the hands of the coalition forces," he said. "We hope there will not be obstacles ahead."

The crisis over Haditha and other disputed killings in Sunni areas comes just as it appears that military operations may be needed to retake some Sunni areas at risk of falling to the insurgency.

This week American forces ordered 1,500 troops from Kuwait into Anbar Province, a stronghold of the Sunni insurgency, in the latest sign that insurgents and terrorist groups including those led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi control much of the sprawling desert region.

In interviews on Thursday, two senior Republicans — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Senator John McCain of Arizona, who is next in line to be committee chairman — both said it was too soon to tell whether the episode would undermine support for the war. Still, both expressed concern.

Senator Warner, who has promised to hold hearings as soon as the military completes its investigation, said he had been urging Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to wrap up the inquiry as swiftly as possible.

"In the interim, frankly, the public opinion on this matter is being influenced by misinformation, leaks and undocumented and uncorroborated facts," he said.

Mr. McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam for more than five years, said the incident harked back to the My Lai massacre during the war in Vietnam. He added, "It certainly is harmful, but I can't assess the extent of the damage."

Neither he nor Mr. McCain would say whether Mr. Rumsfeld should be called as a witness.

"I think it depends on what we find out," Mr. McCain said. "I can't say until we really know what happened. There are allegations, and I emphasize allegations, that there was a cover-up. If so, then obviously more senior people would have to be the subject of hearings."

On Wednesday, American troops near the restive city of Samarra shot and killed two Iraqi women, including one who might have been pregnant and on her way to a hospital, after their car did not heed what the American military command said were repeated warnings to stop.

At a news conference in Baghdad, a senior American military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, said that "about three or four, at least," allegations of wrongdoing by American troops were being investigated and that anyone found guilty of offenses in those incidents or in the Haditha case would be punished. "This tragic incident is in no way representative of how coalition forces treat Iraqi civilians," he said.

In Baghdad, the top American ground commander in Iraq ordered that all 150,000 American and allied troops in the country receive mandatory refresher training on "legal, moral and ethical standards on the battlefield."

In a statement, the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, did not specifically cite the civilian deaths in Haditha as the reason for the unusual order.

But he said commanders would be provided with training materials and sample vignettes to use to instruct on professional military values and conduct in combat, as well as Iraqi cultural sensitivities.

Baghdad To Investigate Haditha Killings (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann In Baghdad

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Iraq's new government on Thursday launched an investigation into the alleged killing of up to 24 civilians in the town of Haditha by US marines last year.

The Pentagon has already launched its own inquiry, but the government probe will also look into other allegations of misconduct by the US-led forces in Iraq and at the way troops behave toward the civilian population after they have come under attack.

The inquiry comes as prime minister Nuri al-Maliki attempts to assert his government's authority over security issues in the country. On Wednesday he announced a state of emergency in the southern city of Basra.

On Friday he signalled his concern over the events in Haditha, a town in a predominantly Sunni Muslim area north-west of Baghdad, saying: "We cannot forgive violations of the dignity of the Iraqi people."

In the wake of the Haditha incident, the US generals in charge of the multinational forces in Iraq (MNFI) yesterday ordered all troops to review their training on core ethical and moral values for the battlefield. The spokesman for the MNFI, Maj Gen Bill Caldwell, said in Baghdad that all personnel would look again at training that they had already received before coming to Iraq.

The Iraqi government investigation will be carried out jointly by the ministries of justice and human rights along with security officials, said one of the prime minister's advisers.

He said a mechanism should be devised for American and Iraqi troops' response in case they come under attack.

The Haditha incident happened in November last year after an American convoy was ambushed near the town in the Anbar region and one marine was killed. After the attack, marines allegedly went on a rampage, going into houses and killing unarmed civilians, including women and babies. There are also allegations that the events were subsequently covered up.

The MNFI spokesman defended the record of the US-led troops in Iraq, saying that "99.9 per cent of all men and women" in the forces adhere to the highest standards and any violations will be punished. He said that apart from Haditha, there were several investigations taking place into alleged misconduct, but did not specify them.

Maj Gen Caldwell praised the new government's firm stance and said that he had noticed a "shift" in the last two weeks, with the Iraqi army and security forces taking "greater control".

Al-Maliki Vows To Fill Defense, Interior Posts (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced yesterday he would fill vacancies at the crucial defense and interior ministries over the weekend, despite failing to reach an agreement on candidates with Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian parties.

The appointments, which must be approved by parliament, are the keystone of Mr. al-Maliki's plan to take complete control of security around Iraq from U.S.-led forces within the next 18 months.

In violence yesterday, a mortar barrage struck a number of houses in Baghdad's southern Dora district. A first barrage of seven mortar rounds killed nine and wounded 40, while another five rounds killed four and wounded 29. Mortar attacks are usually carried out by insurgent groups.

Earlier, a bomb struck a group of construction workers seeking jobs in central Baghdad, killing at least two and wounding 18, police said.

Mr. al-Maliki apparently decided to go ahead with the appointment of ministers for defense, interior and national security -- a lesser post -- to end two weeks of uncertainty. The two key posts were temporarily being held by Mr. al-Maliki and one of his deputy prime ministers since the Cabinet was sworn in on May 20.

Mr. al-Maliki said disagreements among the political blocs proved insurmountable so he decided to "present the names that we believe in to parliament to let it ... decide the issue, because total agreement by all the blocs is almost impossible."

Leaving a Cabinet meeting, the Shi'ite prime minister said "the names of the interior and defense ministers will be announced at parliament's next session" on Sunday, ending protracted negotiations with Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

He did not divulge the names of the candidates, who must be approved by an overwhelming majority in the 275-member parliament.

Mr. al-Maliki reportedly has three candidates for each of the posts, just in case parliament rejects his first choice. The candidates come from a pool that has been discussed at length by negotiators in recent weeks.

The posts, especially defense and interior, are considered an integral part of Mr. al-Maliki's plan to take control of security over Iraq's 18 provinces from U.S.-led forces. The transfer is key to an overall American exit strategy that would allow the eventual withdrawal of its 130,000 troops.

It has been agreed that the defense ministry post will go to a Sunni Arab. But some candidates were rejected by Shi'ites who claimed they had ties to the former regime of Saddam Hussein, or by Kurds who said they were connected to a campaign against their community.

The interior ministry post will go to a Shi'ite. But Sunni Arabs complained that many Shi'ite candidates had ties to militias.

A U.S. military spokesman, meanwhile, said American forces are "very concerned" about the situation in Ramadi in the volatile Anbar province because al Qaeda in Iraq is taking advantage of sectarian differences to make inroads in the city.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell confirmed that about 1,500 combat troops have been moved from a reserve force in Kuwait into Anbar province, which surrounds Ramadi, to help authorities establish order.

New 'Iraq Massacre' Tape Emerges (BBC)

BBC News, June 2, 2006

New footage The BBC has uncovered new video evidence that US forces may have been responsible for the deliberate killing of 11 innocent Iraqi civilians.

The video appears to challenge the US military's account of events that took place in the town of Ishaqi in March.

The US said at the time four people died during a military operation, but Iraqi police claimed that US troops had deliberately shot the 11 people.

A spokesman for US forces in Iraq told the BBC an inquiry was under way.

The new evidence comes in the wake of the alleged massacre in Haditha, where US marines are suspected of killing up to 24 Iraqi civilians in November 2005 and covering up the deaths.

The incident is being investigated by the Pentagon.

The US military has announced that coalition troops in Iraq are to have ethical training following the furore surrounding the alleged killings.

For the next 30 days, they would receive lessons in "core warrior values", a military statement said.

The news of ethical training for US-led troops is likely to be greeted with cynicism by many Iraqis, the BBC's Ian Pannell in Baghdad says, as the troops have long been accused of deliberately targeting civilians.

Cross-checked

The video pictures obtained by the BBC appear to contradict the US account of the events in Ishaqi, about 100km (60 miles) north of Baghdad, on 15 March 2006.

The US authorities said they were involved in a firefight after a tip-off that an al-Qaeda supporter was visiting the house.

According to the Americans, the building collapsed under heavy fire killing four people - a suspect, two women and a child.

But a report filed by Iraqi police accused US troops of rounding up and deliberately shooting 11 people in the house, including five children and four women, before blowing up the building.

The video tape obtained by the BBC shows a number of dead adults and children at the site with what our world affairs editor John Simpson says were clearly gunshot wounds.

The pictures came from a hardline Sunni group opposed to coalition forces.

It has been cross-checked with other images taken at the time of events and is believed to be genuine, the BBC's Ian Pannell in Baghdad says.

Marines To Face Charges In Iraqi's Death (AP)

By Seth Hettena

AP, June 1, 2006

Military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi civilian in April, a defense lawyer said Thursday.

The eight men are being held in the brig at Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base north of San Diego, said Jeremiah Sullivan III, who represents one of the men.

The men served in Iraq with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, and are members of the battalion's Kilo Company. The highest-ranking serviceman is a staff sergeant.

Sullivan said he learned from Marine Corps attorneys that the charges have been drafted and official charging documents could be given to the men as early as Friday.

The Iraqi man was killed west of Baghdad on April 26. His death was unrelated to the shootings of as many as two dozen civilians in the western Iraqi city of Haditha. The Pentagon is investigating troops from the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment in that case.

The Marine Corps and Pentagon spokesmen have refused to comment on any aspect of the Iraqi man's death since an investigation was announced May 24.

However, a Pentagon official said Thursday that charges are expected to be brought "very soon." The official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss charges before they are filed, could not confirm the specific counts.

Sullivan said the eight men are being held in solitary confinement.

"There's concern about the publicity of Haditha having a detrimental impact on the case," he said. "My concern is that the whole politics of this. There's an assumption that these guys are guilty before there's been an opportunity for a thorough, impartial investigation."

Murder Charges Likely For Marines In Iraq Death (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The Marine Corps will file criminal charges, including some murder counts, against several enlisted Marines and a Navy corpsman in the fatal shooting of an Iraqi civilian in April, officials close to the investigation said Thursday.

The Marines and the corpsman were brought back to Camp Pendleton in recent weeks as the Naval Criminal Investigative Service looked into the April 26 shooting of a man in Hamandiya.

The troops, with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, may also have attempted a cover-up by planting evidence near the body to suggest that the man was an armed insurgent digging a hole to plant a roadside bomb.

The decision to file charges comes amid two investigations of allegations in a separate case that Marines killed at least 24 Iraqi civilians, including women and children, Nov. 19 in Haditha, west of Baghdad.

An administrative investigation headed by a two-star Army general has concluded in the Haditha case that the Marines killed the civilians without provocation, some execution- style, and then lied to cover up their conduct. A separate investigation of the incident could lead to criminal charges, including murder and dereliction of duty counts.

Murder charges in the Hamandiya case would be the first brought against Marines based at Camp Pendleton in the death of an Iraqi.

Commenting on the case this week on ABC television, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a retired Marine colonel and decorated Vietnam veteran, said that "some Marines pulled somebody out of a house, put them next to an [improvised explosive device], fired some [AK-47s] so they'd have cartridges there. And then tried to cover that up."

Besides the murder counts, the charges are expected to include conspiracy. Under the military system, the charges will go to a proceeding called an Article 32, akin to a preliminary hearing.

A hearing officer will then recommend to the commanding general whether the case should go to a court-martial. The commanding general can reject the recommendation.

When the Hamandiya charges will be filed is unclear. A spokesman at Camp Pendleton would say only that "the investigation is still ongoing and no charges have been preferred."

The officials who spoke about the case asked for anonymity because they had not been authorized to speak publicly.

More than a dozen Marines are in the brig or restricted to the base as part of the Hamandiya investigation, although only eight are expected to be charged.

Keeping Marines who are under investigation in the brig is unusual, suggesting that the Corps is concerned the suspects may try to flee. Marines involved in the Haditha case are at Camp Pendleton but are not in the brig.

Marine brass have been briefing key members of Congress on the investigations in the Haditha and Hamandiya incidents.

Both involve Camp Pendleton Marines, but those in Haditha were with the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment, 1st Marine Division. The battalion was on its third deployment to Iraq when the killings occurred.

Although no Marines have been charged with murdering an Iraqi, a major and a sergeant were convicted in 2004 of lesser charges stemming from the June 2003 death of an Iraqi prisoner at a detention camp near Nasiriya. The prisoner was reputed to have ties to Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and was suspected of complicity in the ambush of a U.S. convoy.

The major was convicted of maltreatment of prisoners and dereliction of duty; the sergeant was convicted of assault and dereliction. Neither was sentenced to the brig.

Army personnel in Iraq have been embroiled in similar investigations, some involving murder charges, but none of the cases has received as much notoriety as Haditha. One reason may be the presence of incriminating photos and videos of the Haditha victims, taken by Iraqis and Marines. Also, that case appears to involve at least a low-level cover-up.

One of the main objects of the administrative Army investigation is to determine whether the cover-up extends beyond the Marines on the scene to high-ranking officers who knew, or should have known, that the troops' original report that the Iraqis were killed in crossfire or by an insurgent bomb was false.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee went to Iraq last week to lecture troops on the need to follow the Geneva Convention and other rules of warfare concerning noncombatants.

Hagee praised the "99.9%" of Marines who follow their training not to fire on civilians. He plans similar visits to Camp Pendleton and other stateside bases.

The Haditha investigation focused on a dozen Marines.

Three or four are considered to have fired the fatal shots and may be charged with murder. A similar number may have failed to stop the shootings or helped file a false report to superiors. The others may have been too far away to be involved, officials familiar with the inquiry said.

Three officers with the Haditha battalion were relieved of duty in April by Maj. Gen. Richard Natonski, commanding general of the 1st Marine Division. Natonski said only that he had "lost confidence" in their leadership.

Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, the battalion commander of the three-five, and Capt. Luke McConnell, commander of Kilo Company, are being scrutinized under the military doctrine of "command responsibility," in which a commander can be held accountable for the actions of subordinates even if he knew nothing about those actions.

Capt. James Kimber, commander of India Company, was relieved because of disputes unrelated to Haditha, according to his attorney and officials close to the investigation. Kimber and his family are reacting angrily to his name being mentioned in connection with the killings.

"He was caught up in this, and he was thrown in [by the commanding general] because they needed another head," said Kimber's father, Richard, of Gaithersburg, Md. "This has ruined his Marine career, and it's very unfair."

Although the Haditha and Hamandiya incidents appear to involve similar accusations, the cases have been treated differently.

Only after Time magazine began investigating the Haditha case in January and February did the Marine Corps back off from its assertion that the Iraqis had been killed in crossfire or by an insurgent bomb.

But in the Hamandiya case, an investigation was begun more promptly. Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, the top Marine in Iraq, took the unusual step last month of issuing a statement that "sufficient information existed to recommend a criminal investigation."

Marine brass are worried that the incidents could harm the Corps' reputation and further erode public support for the U.S. mission in Iraq. With that in mind, the Marine Corps has promised to make the Army's administrative investigation of the Haditha killings public as soon as possible.

"This is bad," said one senior officer. "We've got to keep it from being worse."

In another allegation of misconduct by U.S. forces, the BBC on Thursday aired videotape that it said supported the Iraqi version of disputed killings near the city of Balad in March.

The U.S. account says troops seeking a suspected insurgent attacked a house, killing the man as well as two women and a child who were inside.

But Iraqi witnesses, including police officers, told The Times the day of the incident that troops had entered the house, hog-tied 11 residents and shot them through the head.

The BBC did not air most of the videotape, saying the images were too grisly to be shown.

U.S. officials told the BBC that the incident was under investigation.

Army Dog Handler Convicted Of Abuse (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

FORT MEADE, Md. -- A military jury yesterday convicted an Army dog handler of abusing an Abu Ghraib detainee in a trial that produced evidence of high-level pressure and ground-level confusion regarding interrogations at the prison in Iraq.

Sgt. Santos A. Cardona is the 11th soldier convicted of crimes stemming from the abuse of detainees at the prison in late 2003 and early 2004.

Sgt. Cardona, 32, of Fullerton, Calif., was convicted of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault for unlawfully threatening a detainee with his dog.

But the panel of four officers and three enlisted soldiers acquitted Sgt. Cardona of some of the most serious charges he faced, including unlawfully having his dog bite a detainee and conspiring with another dog handler to frighten detainees into soiling themselves.

He faces maximum imprisonment of 31/2 years.

Sgt. Cardona, a 121/2-year veteran, stood at attention in his green dress uniform as the verdict was read in court.

He was convicted of allowing his dog to bark within inches of the face of detainee Kamel Miza'l Nayil in December 2003.

Prosecutors had portrayed Sgt. Cardona as part of a small group of corrupt soldiers who enjoyed tormenting prisoners -- even competing with another dog handler to frighten detainees into soiling themselves.

"This is all for their amusement," Maj. Christopher Graveline said Tuesday in his closing argument.

Sgt. Cardona's civilian defense attorney, Harvey J. Volzer, said the military policeman had done what his training and senior officers demanded: Protect fellow soldiers and scare detainees.

Sgt. Cardona released his dog to bite detainee Mohammed Bollendia after Mr. Bollendia ran at and struck another military policeman, Cpl. Charles A. Graner Jr., witnesses for both sides testified.

The prosecution said the MPs provoked the attack and could easily have restrained Mr. Bollendia.

Mr. Volzer said Sgt. Cardona's dog, Duco, barked at prisoners because he was supposed to.

None of the offenses was said to have occurred during interrogations.

However, Sgt. Cardona's defense team focused on interrogation policies -- in particular, the changes in rules and command that followed Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller's visit to Abu Ghraib in late August and early September 2003, when Gen. Miller was commander of the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Gen. Miller wrote in a subsequent report that the military police who guarded detainees at Abu Ghraib should become "actively engaged in setting the conditions" for interrogations.

Marines humiliated

The Marine Corps is livid over the mistreatment of three Marines at the hands of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in Philadelphia last month.

According to a Marine Corps memo we obtained, three Marines were "humiliated" by TSA security guards while escorting the body of Marine Sgt. Lea R. Mills, 21, who was killed April 28 along with two others in Al Anbar province, Iraq, by an improvised explosive device.

Sgt. Mills' body was being moved from Dover Air Force Base through Philadelphia International Airport en route to her final resting place in Gulfport, Miss., on May 3. The three Marines who were accompanying the casket, Sgt. John C. Stock, Cpl. Aaron J. Bigalk and Cpl. Jason A. Schadeburg, were forced to remove their dress blue uniforms, belts and shoes, which were then scanned. They were then "patted down" by TSA inspectors.

One of the Marines had his shoes taken away for scanning, but they were never returned and he was forced to retrieve them.

"All the Marines said they felt humiliated by this treatment," the report said. "The Marines had orders in hand that tasked them to serve as official casualty escorts. Sgt. Stock was carrying Sgt. Mills' personal effects and Cpl. Schadeburg was carrying the flag from Sgt. Mills' casket. These items were in hand in plain view."

One Marine called the TSA "morons" for mistreating the casualty escorts, and said, "This is enough to make one's blood boil."

A TSA spokesman said the three Marines did not know the right procedures for escorting a fallen soldier, and could have avoided the search by passing through an official screening area. The TSA officers did not know the Marines were escorting a fallen comrade, and the agency "regrets" the miscommunication, the spokesman said.

Armitage on Iraq

Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage is adding his voice to critics of Pentagon civilian and military war planners who said there were not enough troops to produce a successful outcome in Operation Iraqi Freedom.

"I think there were some clear misjudgments, including the number of troops that would be required to secure the peace after combat," Mr. Armitage told the Georgetown Journal of International Affairs.

Asked what was most surprising about the Iraq war, Mr. Armitage stated: "The most surprising thing is that we failed yet again to realize a basic historical lesson: Only a soldier with a bayonet can take and hold ground. Only a soldier with a bayonet can bend an enemy to our will."

The failure to understand that was the United States' "biggest mistake," and the biggest lesson to be learned, he said.

"Clearly we had enough troops to win a great victory, a speedy victory and a very humane victory," Mr. Armitage said. "We didn't have enough troops to secure the peace. That is self-evident."

Beijing lobbying

The Chinese Embassy continues to lobby Congress with impunity on the issue of Taiwan. The latest effort was a recent letter to members of the House Armed Services Committee aimed at China-related provisions of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill.

DOJ_NMG_0031249

Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong warned that provisions increasing military ties between the Pentagon and Taiwan and improving Taiwan's defenses against a Chinese attack "will do serious harm to China-U.S. relations" if enacted into law. Mr. Zhou said the new provisions would create a military alliance between the United States and Taiwan and violate diplomatic communiques governing U.S.-China ties.

He also warned that the bill's provisions on selling submarines to Taiwan are boosting Taiwan's forces for independence and are going in a "dangerous direction."

The letter asked the congressmen to "use your important influence" to block the pro-Taiwan provisions.

The letter has angered several lawmakers who view it as foreign government interference in the congressional legislative process.

The main lobbying firm representing the embassy is Jones Day, which is registered with the Justice Department as a foreign agent for China.

The Chinese government has stepped up its lobbying of Congress in the past several years, yet similar activities by Taiwan have been viewed in the past as illegal influence activities and have prompted FBI investigations.

Militia madness

Iraq's hodgepodge of Shi'ite militias is becoming just as troublesome as the Sunni insurgents who regularly attack American forces and assassinate Iraqi government leaders.

A Pentagon report sent to Congress this week blames Shi'ite militias, especially the one controlled by firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, for kidnappings, death squads and kangaroo courts. In the south, they also are infiltrating local police forces to exercise control.

More troubling, Iran is supporting the private armies by, among other favors, providing weapons, says the Pentagon's "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq" report, "reinforcing Sunni fears of Iranian domination and further elevating ethno-sectarian violence."

The Shi'ite militias not only attack rival Sunni Muslims, they also attack coalition troops. "Because of Iranian-sponsored training and technological support, these operations are among the most lethal and effective conducted against coalition forces."

Meanwhile, violence is going up, not down, as American troops enter their fourth year in Iraq. The number of weekly attacks averaged more than 600 between February and May, compared with 450 during roughly the same period last year.

"Reasons for the high level of attacks may include terrorist and insurgent attempts to exploit a perceived inability of the Iraqi government to constitute itself effectively, the rise of ethno-sectarian attacks follow the Golden Mosque bombing and enemy efforts to derail the political process leading to a new government," the Pentagon report said.

Pacific defense

The Air Force sent a message to troops this week explaining the redeployment of forces in the Pacific. The message left no gray area on what the mission is of U.S. Forces, Japan, as 8,000 Marines move from Okinawa to Guam. The shift puts more emphasis on air power to deter aggression.

"Should deterrence fail," the message states, "USFJ conducts and supports combat operations in the region to defend Japan."

Insurgency Out, Anarchy In (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

President Bush has told us that the question of whether to withdraw from Iraq is one that his successor will have to deal with — not him. I don't think so. Mr. Bush is not going to have that luxury of passing Iraq along. You see, the insurgency in Iraq is in its "last throes" — just like Dick Cheney said. Unfortunately, it's being replaced by anarchy in many neighborhoods — not democracy. And I don't believe the American people will put up with two and half more years of babysitting anarchy instead of midwifing democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0031250

The report that U.S. marines were involved in a massacre of Iraqis in Haditha — which the Pentagon needs to clarify fast — is a tragic reminder that a foreign occupation by U.S. forces can't go on for years. Most U.S. soldiers in Iraq have done heroic work, but occupations that drag on inevitably lead to Hadithas.

Right now we are paying for all the Bush team's missteps in Iraq: allowing looting after the fall of Baghdad, disbanding the Iraqi Army without an alternative security force or enough U.S. troops in place, fostering a culture of torture at Abu Ghraib and then letting the politics in Iraq drift for months without any outcome.

All of this created a security vacuum that has allowed a rogue's gallery of sectarian militias, death squads, gangs and Al Qaeda operatives to mushroom in Basra, Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle. The end result: while the mainstream Iraqi Sunnis have now joined the government, in a major way, this has not brought more stability. Because between the sectarian militias now murdering each other's civilians, tit for tat, and Al Qaeda just blowing up Iraqi civilians randomly, the new government can't get going. Too many Iraqis are paralyzed by fear.

Indeed, there has been a subtle but important change in the violence in Iraq. The main enemy in many places is no longer the Sunni insurgency. It is anarchy. Mini-wars of all against all. As the BBC reported Wednesday from Basra: Prime Minister Nuri Maliki "has declared a monthlong state of emergency in Basra, which has been plagued by sectarian clashes, anarchy and factional rivalry." That's what happens in a security vacuum.

Once this kind of militia madness takes root, it's very hard to uproot. U.S. troops can't do it, because it would require searching homes, neighborhood by neighborhood. Only a cohesive Iraqi national army could do that. And that can only be the product of a real national unity government, in which all parties feel they have a fair share of the pie and are committed to investing in an Iraqi army — not their own militia.

And such a national unity government can only be the product of Iraq's leaders deciding whether they love their kids more than they hate each other. That is the most important question Iraqis must answer. It can't be avoided any longer. That being the case, it is time for America to starting talking "deadlines." Too many Iraqi factions think they can just keep wrestling each other for small advantage while the country burns, but the U.S. Army provides a floor of security that prevents total chaos. The Iraqi parties need to know that we are not going to be played this way forever. Only an Iraq that can come together and make a fist can crush this militia culture.

Salvaging Iraq is still hugely important — for itself and for the region, which is facing two big trends. One is a population explosion, producing millions of young people looking for work. And the other is a huge explosion of windfall oil profits. Today, many autocratic Arab regimes are using these oil profits just to buy off their population explosions — in the form of government jobs and subsidized food and fuel — not to educate and empower their youth for the 21st century. But when the price of oil falls, and it will eventually, and these populations continue to rise, we will see destabilizing social explosions throughout the Arab world. It would be very helpful to have a different model in place in Iraq before that happens.

But the hour is late and the enemy is unique. We are not losing Iraq to the Iraqi Vietcong — traditional nationalists. Iraq has a freely elected nationalist government. No, we are losing in Iraq to sectarian theocrats, Islamo-fascists and local and regional tyrants, who have only one thing in common: the belief that America and its Iraqi allies must fail, that neither modernity nor democracy must be allowed to take root in Iraq.

It will be a global tragedy if they succeed, but it is hard to fight an enemy whose only concern is that you lose, not what happens after. It is impossible, though, without Iraqi leaders who can make a fist. We can't keep asking Americans to sacrifice their children for people who hate each other more than they love their own children.

Delegation Divided On Progress In Iraq (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

Members of a congressional delegation to Iraq will return home from the Middle East this weekend with differing opinions about progress in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0031251

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican and one of several lawmakers touring the region, predicted yesterday that within a year, the United States and its partners will transition to providing more logistical support and medical assistance, allowing some troops to return home.

"As Iraqis lead, the U.S. role will be reduced. Iraqis are going to have to use their hands rather than rely on the hands of Americans to do things," Mr. Allen said on a call from Kuwait City.

If trends continue, the troop presence in Iraq will be "purely minimal" within five years, he said.

By contrast, Rep. James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, said he was "highly disappointed and quite frankly shocked" at the lack of success of reconstruction efforts and domestic peacekeeping.

"You don't have good success in community building unless you involve the indigenous people in the effort," he said. "They have to feel ownership, and with that comes a certain amount of pride and propriety -- important ingredients if you are going to try to do something that is sustaining."

He noted corruption within the Iraqi police force and the lack of electricity for many citizens but said he was impressed by the effectiveness and efficiency of the military effort.

"Next year this time, I don't think we can get the military out of there," Mr. Clyburn said.

The troubled areas, he said, "are having success now, but we're talking about 14 provinces ... [most] not anywhere near where they need to be."

The lawmakers agreed that Kurdistan is enjoying prosperity. Mr. Allen described the region as a "boomtown," with new hotels and homes under construction.

Also on the trip were House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and Republican Reps. Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey and Sam Graves of Missouri.

Mr. Hoyer said it was crucial for lawmakers to see the events on the ground in Iraq to help Congress determine "the right policies moving forward."

Mr. Allen, who has been mentioned as a presidential candidate in 2008, first faces a re-election challenge this fall.

Democrats Harris Miller and Jim Webb will meet in a primary match June 13. Statewide polls favor Mr. Allen by double digits but show he is more vulnerable than he was last year because of sinking Republican ratings and an aggressive campaign from both Democrats hoping to topple him.

When asked whether his hawkish stance would affect his race when support for the war is slipping in Virginia, Mr. Allen praised the troops and replied: "The troops don't care about political sniping or grandstanding. Those who take the big picture rather than the partisan political picture realize this is history being made."

Iraq Veteran Sues Moore Over 9/11 Film (WP/AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

BOSTON -- A veteran who lost both arms in the war in Iraq is suing filmmaker Michael Moore for $85 million, alleging that Moore used snippets of a television interview without his permission to falsely portray him as anti-war in "Fahrenheit 9/11."

Sgt. Peter Damon, a National Guardsman from Middleborough, is asking for damages because of "loss of reputation, emotional distress, embarrassment, and personal humiliation," according to the lawsuit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last week.

Damon, 33, claims that Moore never asked for his consent to use a clip from an interview Damon did with NBC's "Nightly News."

He lost his arms when a tire on a Black Hawk helicopter exploded while he and another reservist were servicing the aircraft on the ground. Another reservist was killed in the explosion.

In his interview with NBC, Damon was asked about a new painkiller the military was using on wounded veterans. He claims in his lawsuit that the way Moore used the film clip in "Fahrenheit 9/11" _ Moore's scathing 2004 documentary criticizing the Bush administration and the war in Iraq _ makes him appear to "voice a complaint about the war effort" when he was actually complaining about "the excruciating type of pain" that comes with the injury he suffered.

In the movie, Damon is shown lying on a gurney, with his wounds bandaged. He says he feels likes he's "being crushed in a vise."

"But they (the painkillers) do a lot to help it," he says. "And they take a lot of the edge off of it."

Damon is shown shortly after U.S. Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., is speaking about the Bush administration and says, "You know, they say they're not leaving any veterans behind, but they're leaving all kinds of veterans behind."

Damon contends that Moore's positioning of the clip just after the congressman's comments makes him appear as if he feels like he was "left behind" by the Bush administration and the military.

In his lawsuit, Damon says he "agrees with and supports the President and the United States' war effort, and he was not left behind."

He said that, while at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center recovering from his wounds, he had surgery and physical therapy, learned to use prosthetics and live independently. He also said that Homes For Our Troops, a not-for-profit group, built him a house with handicapped accessibility.

"The work creates a substantially fictionalized and falsified implication as a wounded serviceman who was left behind when Plaintiff was not left behind but supported, financially and emotionally, by the active assistance of the President, the United States and his family, friends, acquaintances and community," Damon says in his lawsuit.

Moore did not immediately return calls seeking comment Wednesday. A message was left for Moore at a personal number in New York and with HarperCollins, publisher of Moore's 2002 book, "Stupid White Men...And Other Sorry Excuses for the State of the Nation!"

A spokesman for Miramax Film Corp., also named as a defendant, did not immediately return a call.

Damon did not immediately respond to a request for an interview.

"It's upsetting to him because he's lived his life supportive of his government, he's been a patriot, he's been a soldier, and he's now being portrayed in a movie that is the antithesis of all of that," Damon's lawyer, Dennis Lynch, said.

Damon is seeking $75 million in damages for emotional distress and loss of reputation. His wife is suing for an additional $10 million in damages because of the mental distress caused to her husband, Lynch said.

War Protest Intensifies, But Navy Ship Sails On Time (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

SEATTLE, June 1 — After nearly a week of protests intended to delay a large Navy cargo ship from sailing to the war in Iraq, the vessel sailed out of Olympia on time Wednesday, port officials said. But the protests, which were raucous at times, could portend a summer of escalating tensions in the port.

The police said 20 protesters, most from Evergreen State College here, were arrested earlier in the week on misdemeanor charges of attempted trespass and were then released. Two others were charged with a separate offense stemming from a clash with the police.

About 70 police officers in riot gear were deployed at the port, where the Pomeroy, a 950-foot cargo ship, was being loaded with material from nearby Army units bound for Iraq.

In the past week, the ship was greeted by 150 to 200 protesters who shouted at crew members and soldiers, and staged a so-called die-in to protest the war.

At one point, the police used pepper spray to move back a group that had breached a gate, sheriff's deputies said. The deputies also said a stone and two plastic bottles were thrown at officers.

The protests, based at the college, have been going on for about two years, organizers said. But this week signaled a change in tactics.

Dan Kimball, chief criminal deputy for the Thurston County Sheriff's Department, said Thursday, "The people who've been protesting have been mostly peaceful and quiet, but it definitely changed this week into some more aggressive civil disobedience."

DOJ_NMG_0031253

A protest leader, Larry Mosqueda, said the demonstrations were intended to call attention to the "illegal and immoral" war in Iraq and the role of the port, which is publicly owned.

"If you raise the stakes, the costs of the war go higher," said Mr. Mosqueda, a professor of political economy at Evergreen State.

Port officials said they had "overwhelming support" from the public in allowing the Navy to use the harbor. The protests had no effect on port operations, they said.

Afghan Leader Condemns U.S. Gunfire After Crash (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

KABUL, Afghanistan — Afghan President Hamid Karzai denounced U.S. soldiers on Thursday for having fired their weapons to escape a mob in Kabul. A member of his Cabinet, meanwhile, said the Afghan government has launched its own investigation into how a traffic crash Monday spiraled into the worst violence in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

“The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that,” Karzai said in a radio address to the nation in Pashto, his native language. However, he left unclear whether he was accusing the American soldiers of firing into the crowd.

Karzai spoke a day after Afghanistan's parliament passed a non-binding resolution that called for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann said in an interview broadcast Thursday by National Public Radio that U.S. troops here couldn't be punished under local law. “But should the investigation reveal some wrongdoing, I'm sure the military would follow up on its own,” he said.

Karzai's government, backed by a 23,000-strong U.S.-led coalition and 9,000 NATO troops, already is fighting an intensifying Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern Afghanistan.

Kabul, however, has been relatively free of violence.

Monday's violence appears to have been unrelated to the Taliban rebellion. It started when a U.S. military truck careened downhill into a crowded intersection on the outskirts of downtown Kabul. The truck hit as many as 12 vehicles and killed five people.

The U.S. military said the truck's brakes had gone out. But bystanders reacted with fury to what many here saw as a deliberate act of aggression by U.S. soldiers.

“It's an accident if it involves one car, but not when it involves several cars,” Kabul bookseller Mohammed Daoud, 36, said Thursday.

As hundreds of Afghans rushed at the stalled American convoy, U.S. troops opened fire — but only over the heads of the crowd, according to the U.S. military.

After the convoy fled, rioters trashed the offices of the U.S. aid group CARE and looted shops for hours. U.S. military spokesman Col. Tom Collins said Wednesday he had been informed by the Afghan Ministry of Health that the toll from the unrest had risen to 20 dead and more than 160 wounded

By Thursday, Kabul's streets had mostly returned to their typical chaos: moneychangers shuffling thick decks of afghanis, the local currency; teenage boys peddling cellphone cards; merchants pushing carts filled with mangos.

One thing had changed: Hundreds of Afghan soldiers, police and plainclothes security personnel patrolled the streets and bazaars, overseeing the activity in an obvious show of force.

Karzai's government is trying to figure out what prompted the violent outburst after the crash.

“An investigation is going on to find out why a traffic accident became the cause of a violent demonstration,” Masauda Jalal, a women's rights official and member of Karzai's Cabinet, said Thursday. She said the government knows the “U.S. military would not deliberately hurt Afghan civilians,” but “the public's awareness is lower.”

“There was some anti-American element,” Neumann told NPR. “But actually, from my own observation, it was less focused anti-American than I think is being portrayed.”

DOJ_NMG_0031254

A common theory is that the crowd's spontaneous protest "was hijacked by criminals and armed men," said Nader Naderi, spokesman for the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission.

Many here worry that the speed with which anarchy engulfed Kabul on Monday exposed the government's weakness. "Karzai has no power," said driver Malik Jan, 46. "His police couldn't stop the demonstrations."

Karzai Condemns Gunfire By U.S. Troops (AP)

By Edward Harris

AP, June 1, 2006

President Hamid Karzai on Thursday condemned the use of gunfire by U.S. troops to suppress Afghans angered by a traffic accident involving a military truck that sparked the worst riots in the capital since the fall of the Taliban.

Speaking in his native Pashto language, Karzai used phrases that left open whether the U.S. troops had fired into a crowd that had gathered at the scene of Monday's accident, or only over their heads. But he was strongly critical.

"The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that," Karzai said in a national radio address. "I have to say, all the time we tell them to be careful because we have one joint aim, which is the struggle against terrorism."

A U.S. military spokeswoman had no immediate comment on Karzai's brief address, which is likely to cause some friction between his U.S.-backed government and Washington amid growing disenchantment among Afghans over America's powerful presence in the country.

Afghan authorities and the U.S. military are investigating the crash in which a U.S. truck that the military says suffered brake failure rammed into cars at an intersection, killing up to five people.

Investigators are also looking at whether U.S. troops fired on Afghans angered by the accident, which sparked citywide rioting, the worst since the 2001 ouster of the Taliban. Hundreds rampaged through Kabul, shouting "Death to America!" In all, about 20 people died, mostly from gunshot wounds, Afghan authorities said.

AP Television News video from Monday shows the mounted machine gun of a U.S. Humvee firing over the heads of Afghans shortly after the accident. Many Afghans at the scene and some officials say the U.S. troops also fired into the crowd. The U.S. military has only confirmed that its soldiers used their weapons in self-defense.

On Thursday, a top judge said foreigners could be tried for crimes committed in Afghanistan, after lawmakers passed a nonbinding resolution calling for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann, however, said that American troops in Afghanistan couldn't be punished under local law.

"But should the investigation reveal some wrongdoing, I'm sure the military would follow up on its own," he told National Public Radio in an interview broadcast Thursday.

He said the U.S. military hadn't signed any pact with Afghanistan that would allow local prosecutors to try U.S. forces in an Afghan court.

"I don't want to turn lawyer without being absolutely sure of my grounds, but you really can't fight a war that way," he said.

The deputy chief justice of Afghanistan's Supreme Court, Abdul Malik Kamawi, said his interpretation of the law is that foreigners who commit a crime in the country are subject to trial there.

The lawmakers' motion can't compel the judiciary to pursue any charges against U.S. troops, and no senior Afghan executive official has indicated they want to.

There also is outrage in Afghanistan over civilian deaths caused by coalition military action against Taliban guerrillas. The latest incident occurred last week, when a U.S. airstrike killed at least 16 civilians in a southern village. A rights group said as many as 34 civilians died.

Neumann said it didn't add up to rising hatred against Americans — or a push to get U.S troops to leave Afghanistan.

"I do not see any groundswell of anti-Americanism or any desire that we leave," he told NPR.

Where Does Karzai Go From Here? (CSM)

By Rachel Morarjee

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031255

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Mustafa surveys the broken shelves and shattered glass of his jewelry shop in Kabul, and breathes a sigh of relief when he sees soldiers from the Afghan National Army on the streets.

"Bringing the Army out is the only decent thing [President] Karzai has done in four years. Now the soldiers are here, the police can't steal and hassle people and we feel safe," he says, as a crowd of shopkeepers nod in agreement.

Their shops were at the heart of the worst street violence to hit the Afghan capital since 2001, after a US military traffic accident triggered a riot that engulfed the city leaving 14 dead and over 100 injured.

Haji Mohammed Akram, a shop owner who watched police flee their posts as guards from the Kabul bank opposite his shop fired on armed looters, says he can feel his hopes of peace ebbing. "If this is what happens when we have a traffic accident, can you imagine how quickly the city would fall if the enemy attacked?" he asks.

Four days later the streets are quiet, but confidence in President Hamid Karzai's government is at an all-time low. Residents and observers say that the government needs to restore credibility by reforming the Afghan police and insisting on better conduct for foreign troops.

"Clearly the government was totally unable to respond to the crisis. If this is the state of our police force then we are in serious trouble," says a Western diplomat, noting the violence unmasked weaknesses within the government. As the riots raged on Monday, Interior Ministry officials in charge of the police took their phones off the hook, while Karzai failed to make a public statement on TV until the riots - lasting some eight hours - had run their course.

"It was a wake-up call.... It underlined how badly things have gone and how we are nowhere near where we need to be," the diplomat adds.

After electing a Parliament and a president, Afghanistan has been hailed as a success story and frequently compared favorably with Iraq, where security is much worse. However, some of the initial accomplishments here are being overshadowed. Militias run riot, the police force barely functions, and most Afghans have seen little change in their lives, making it easier for a resurgent Taliban to recruit.

To halt the downward slide Karzai must look squarely at the reasons which fueled the riots, diplomats and businessmen say.

"The situation is not of his own making, but Karzai is locked in a palace and surrounded by people who tell him everything is hunky-dory. He needs to reach out," says Daud Sultanzoi, an MP for Ghazni Province where the Taliban insurgency has worsened. Palace officials could not be reached.

At the root of the problem is a corrupt, badly paid, and poorly organized police force with low morale. The force is chronically undersupplied, in some places lacking the basics of vehicles and weapons to do more than limited foot patrols. The Taliban often overrun poorly defended police stations in the south, sapping morale. Some police terrorize the general populace - and they are the only face of the government most Afghans see on a daily basis.

Monday's rioting in the capital demonstrated that for many police, concerns for personal safety and sympathy for those in the streets weighed more heavily than their duty to protect property and life. "The police took off their uniforms and joined the looters, so I am worried about the future," says Qasim, a security guard from Badakhshan who works in Kabul.

Lack of nonlethal weapons made crowd-control difficult.

"Why were the police so weak, why didn't they respond? We need special guns, water cannon, rubber bullets. There was no way to deal with unrest in the city," says Shukria Barekzai a legislator in Kabul.

Lack of jobs and a growing despair about the future further fueled the riot. Five years after the fall of the Taliban many parts of Kabul still have no sanitation, intermittent electricity, and open sewers running beside streets clogged with Land cruisers packed with foreigners and the new narco-elite. Reconstruction has come to Afghanistan - including schools, roads, and plans for pipelines - but many residents say it's too little and too slow.

Lastly, resentment against the foreign military presence is growing. US and NATO convoys drive around aggressively, frequently pushing Afghans off the road in their haste to reach destinations safely.

A week before the Kabul crash some 30 civilians had been killed by a US airstrike near Kandahar. Karzai paid a rare visit to the injured survivors and summoned the commander of coalition forces to a meeting over the incident. Such moves can deflect some of the anger - temporarily.

"This wasn't the first accident the Americans had and it won't be the last. They came to bring peace, but if they keep killing Afghans we will riot again," says a shopkeeper at the crash site in northern Kabul who asked not to be identified.

Ambassador Predicts Taliban Ferocity (WT)

By Jason Motlagh

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The Taliban will wage its fiercest campaign of attacks in the coming months in an attempt to hamper the transfer of security duties in Afghanistan from the U.S. military to NATO, Kabul's ambassador in Washington says.

"During the upcoming months, the Taliban will resort to the utmost violence to prevent reconstruction and discourage NATO countries from further deployment," Said Jawad told The Washington Times.

More than 300 people have been killed and thousands displaced in the past two weeks as Taliban insurgents, with the help of al Qaeda allies, stepped up the frequency and sophistication of attacks for a summer fighting season.

Mr. Jawad estimates that 20 to 25 heavily armed militias are operating in five southern provinces with 3,000 to 5,000 men bent on testing the resolve of Western forces.

A continued "spike in terrorist activity" is likely, "especially where NATO troops are scheduled to be deployed," he said.

The swell of Taliban activity coincides with a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from militant strongholds in the south, where NATO forces have begun assuming security operations.

The multinational force, led by Britain and Canada, will boost troop strength to about 21,000 from 9,000 by July, while the United States plans to draw down its 23,000-strong presence by 6,500.

Afghans living in distant provinces where infrastructure and economic opportunities have been slow to improve have "some concerns at the local level about the commitment and capability of NATO," Mr. Jawad said. "They will have to see that NATO is as committed as the United States."

The Bush administration and military commanders are confident the situation will improve.

Half of the 141 American servicemen killed in action in Afghanistan since the 2001 invasion died last year.

"We are winning, but the war is not yet won," Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, head of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said at a Pentagon press briefing last month.

He said the Taliban resurgence in the southern provinces is primarily a result of the fledgling Afghan government's inability to combat them, not a testament to the movement's strength.

The Taliban also has been emboldened by more advanced weaponry and greater mobility within the country and across the porous border to terrorist safe havens in Pakistan, Mr. Jawad said. "This is something even the government of Pakistan does not dispute."

Pakistan-based foreign militants with links to al Qaeda and experience in Iraq have been offering large bounties to Afghans to kill U.S. soldiers and have encouraged the wider use of suicide bombings and kidnappings, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported recently.

Mr. Jawad said the Taliban relies on "intimidation tactics" such as hiding in villages, burning down schools and medical clinics, and killing moderate tribal leaders and clergy to create a climate of fear.

He said it was critical that the international community help reinforce the capacity of the cash-strapped Afghan government to deliver services "so the presence of the state will be felt in areas experiencing attacks."

Don't Undercut The Afghan Army (WP)

By Vance Serchuk

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Four years ago this spring the United States began building an Afghan National Army, which has since emerged as arguably the least ambiguous success story of the postwar reconstruction here. While military power in Afghanistan was once synonymous with partisan, warlord-run militias, the new army is a multiethnic, battle-hardened and increasingly professional force -- tangible proof of how nation-building can work in even the unlikeliest of places.

Unfortunately, this accomplishment is under threat, not just from a resurgent Taliban but from the Bush administration itself, which is keen to trim its contributions to the Afghan army. Against Kabul's objections, the U.S. military hopes to cut the planned end-strength of the Afghan defense sector by more than 25 percent; rather than building the 70,000-man force previously agreed upon, the goal is now 50,000.

The Pentagon defends this downsizing with rhetoric about "sustainability." As one of the world's poorest countries, Afghanistan needs an army it can afford, commanders here argue, and a 70,000-man force is simply too expensive.

The problem with this is that Afghanistan has struggled throughout its history to generate the resources needed for its security, and the Pentagon's proposed cuts do little to resolve this. In fact, the U.S. military's own number crunchers predict the Afghans won't be able to pay for even a 50,000-man force until 2063. And that's under a best-case scenario -- assuming robust, unbroken economic growth for the next 50 years, and that the equipment we are buying the Afghans today doesn't wear out in the interim. (The World Bank's less rosy estimates put affordability somewhere in the early 26th century!)

But if talk about affordability is rooted in futuristic fantasy, the U.S. military's emphasis on it has a host of pernicious, real-world consequences in the here and now. For starters, it infuriates our allies in Kabul, who argue, rightly, that 70,000 is already a minuscule force given the size of their country and the manpower-intensive nature of counterinsurgency.

U.S. military commanders here acknowledge that a smaller army will mean that Kabul must accept a higher degree of "risk," but they defend their approach, citing current intelligence about the size of the Taliban and other potential threats.

But this intelligence assumes that Afghanistan's security situation is relatively static; it fails to take into account the probability of strategic surprise. With Pakistan to the south, Iran to the west, and Russia and China in Central Asia, who can say with any confidence what Afghanistan's neighborhood will look like in four or five years? Even inside the country, U.S. predictions about the insurgency have boomeranged over the past 18 months, from confident predictions of an imminent Taliban collapse to confident predictions of a long, hard slog.

What makes the Pentagon's approach all the more shortsighted is the genuine desire of many Afghans -- this week's rioting notwithstanding -- for a strong, long-term alliance with Washington. To the extent the Pentagon goes cheap on the Afghan army now, it will not only alienate our friends but also constrain their ability to stand with us in the future. Kabul's solidarity in a confrontation with Tehran, for example, will be affected by whether it has enough troops to defend its western border with Iran and at the same time hold the line against the Taliban in the south. A smaller army will make this much harder.

Given how little sense it makes, what is driving the Pentagon's new fixation on affordability? Part of the explanation lies with a shift in authority over the United States' Afghan policy. A year ago, the power was squarely in Kabul, in the hands of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Lt. Gen. David Barno, who were both committed to a strategic partnership.

With their departure, authority has now shifted to the U.S. Central Command and the Pentagon, which have decidedly different priorities. Asked about the guidance they receive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on building the Afghan army, officers here often cite the same three questions: Why is it taking so long, why do you need so many people, and when can we leave?

It's hard to imagine a worse trifecta. Rather than viewing the Afghan army as a short-term, stopgap expenditure that should go away over time, the Bush administration needs to start treating military assistance to Kabul as a guaranteed, stable commitment -- much like U.S. aid to front-line states during the Cold War.

At some point, one hopes, Afghanistan will be able to shoulder more of its own defense costs. For now, though, the emphasis shouldn't be on the army Afghanistan can afford but on the one it needs: a force that can defeat the Taliban and become a long-term partner in the war on terrorism.

Thursday, Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned the U.S. military for using gunfire to quell the rioters. An investigation is underway to determine whether U.S. troops fired into or over the crowd.

Most Afghans want foreign help, but they do not want to become "collateral damage" of foreign occupiers — whether from the United States, the United Nations or even relief agencies. As Washington struggles with how best to support Karzai, the U.S. and NATO need to redouble their efforts to defeat the resurgent Taliban while also protecting the civilian population. And to do that, they must improve living standards — ultimately the only way to end 25 years of bloodshed, violence and chaos in Afghanistan.

Anti-Americanism was by no means the only cause of the Kabul rioting. It may have been instigated or encouraged by Karzai's political opponents from the Northern Alliance, whose remaining militias were told three weeks ago that they had to disband by Tuesday, or by Taliban sympathizers. There also is an inevitable gap between Afghans' expectations of help from the international community and the lagging relief effort. Angry, poor and unemployed Afghans need someone to blame.

But the deeper problem is that Afghanistan, like Iraq, cannot be rebuilt cheaply or quickly while an insurgency rages. The Taliban appears to be targeting aid and reconstruction workers; on Tuesday, terrorists on motorcycles attacked and killed four humanitarian workers driving in northern Afghanistan, which has generally been calmer than the Taliban strongholds along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Crushing the insurgency won't be easy. The international community must immediately focus on building roads and providing electricity to blacked-out Kabul, whose economy cannot grow without transportation and power. Arab and Persian Gulf states, flush with oil wealth, have made meager pledges to Afghanistan. They should give the $90 million that will be needed for diesel fuel to keep Kabul electrified for the next two years while transmission lines are being built to bring power from Central Asia.

The U.S. and NATO also will have to invest the military resources to crush the Taliban decisively — and insist that Pakistan do the same. Without security, aid and reconstruction cannot proceed in rural areas. President Pervez Musharraf's pleadings notwithstanding, Pakistan isn't doing all it can to stop Taliban infiltration across the Afghanistan border.

Finally, the United States must begin to treat Afghanistan as a sovereign state whose citizens' lives have to be protected. A start would be for Washington to sign a "status of forces agreement" to govern the behavior of U.S. military forces there. Lessons in driving and crowd control wouldn't hurt, either.

Justice Awards CSC $42 Million Litigation Case Management Contract (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department has awarded Computer Sciences Corp., a contract worth $42 million to build the department's new Litigation Case Management System (LCMS), which will give the various litigating divisions greater data sharing capabilities.

The system will include a centralized application and database with unique interfaces for various divisions of the agency. The interfaces will allow employees in the Antitrust, Civil Rights, Criminal, Environmental and Natural Resources and Tax divisions, as well as the 94 U.S. Attorney offices, to access data unique to the respective agencies.

At the same time, LCMS will be a single repository where Justice executives can access all litigation case management information and reporting. It will also improve the quality of data used for reporting to Congress, the Office of Management and Budget and other agencies, according to a department announcement.

Justice said the award utilized the National Institutes of Health, Chief Information Officers Solutions and Partners 2 contract, a governmentwide procurement vehicle that provides federal agencies with a streamlined method to acquire information technology services and solutions.

Justice plans to phase in the LCMS program by 2010. The first phase will assess the needs of attorney supervisors and Justice executives to manage caseloads and performances. This phase, to be completed during fiscal 2007 and 2008, will create a common access solution for the U.S. Attorneys' Offices, and includes data exchanges with external systems such as Sentinel, the Victim Notification System and the Consolidated Debt Collection System,

The remaining six litigating divisions will complete LCMS between fiscal 2008 and 2010.

Justice said the LCMS program is an important investment under the OMB Case Management Line of Business program. In support of the line of business program objectives, the LCMS program developed a target architecture and infrastructure for sharing case-related information within and among Justice components and partner agencies. The goal is to capture information once and make it available to all authorized users, according to the statement.

Justice Taps CSC For Bellwether Case Management System (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department this morning unveiled a new $42 million contract with Computer Sciences Corp. for the Litigation Case Management System, a standardized environment intended to improve management of legal resources and allow attorneys to share and manage trial information.

Justice now has dozens of litigation case management systems because each of the department's U.S. Attorney's offices nationwide has had the autonomy to tailor systems to its own needs. In addition, the department's six divisions that send platoons of trial attorneys into courtrooms have developed separate case management systems.

The Justice system forms an important part of the Office of Management and Budget's Case Management System Line of Business.

That line of business also includes the FBI's failed Virtual Case File and its successor, the fledgling Sentinel project. OMB also has directed Justice, leader of the case management line of business project, eventually to develop an administrative case management system.

LCMS is intended to serve as a template for other litigation case management systems used by attorneys across the federal government.

"The Department's Antitrust, Criminal, Civil Rights, Civil, Environment and Natural Resources, and Tax divisions, as well as the U.S. Attorney's offices, will use the LCMS to facilitate the transfer of information through the use of common solutions and data standards," Justice said in a statement.

Justice used the National Institutes of Health, Chief Information Officers Solutions and Partners 2 contract, a governmentwide procurement vehicle that provides federal agencies with a streamlined method for buying IT goods and services. The department valued the award at $42 million.

"I expect LCMS to provide a valuable service to the department's seven litigating divisions," said Justice CIO Vance Hitch in a statement. "LCMS will allow the department to reduce operational costs and act more like a unified law firm by effectively and appropriately sharing information between the litigating divisions and with the department's executive leadership."

LCMS will use a centralized but flexible application and database, with unique user interfaces for each of the litigating divisions to accommodate their respective needs, Justice said.

LCMS' architecture is designed allow Justice officials to have a single repository for all litigation case management information and reporting, the department said.

LCMS also is intended to improve the quality of the data the department reports to Congress, OMB and other partner agencies, Justice said.

The department said it plans a phased and incremental approach for reaching its long-term litigation case management goals.

The project's first phase will mainly serve the needs of attorney managers and senior leaders to manage attorneys' caseloads and performance, Justice said.

Under this phase, Justice expects to adopt a common LCMS for the 94 U.S. Attorney's Offices during the 2007 and 2008 fiscal years. The first phase includes data exchanges with external systems such as Sentinel as well as Justice's own Victim Notification and Consolidated Debt Collection systems.

Justice plans to roll out LCMS to its six other litigating divisions between 2008 and 2010.

LCMS is contributing to the development of the National Information Exchange Model to assist in the development of a true standard for information sharing across federal agencies, Justice said.

Justice and the Homeland Security Department established NIEM to develop the data and exchange standards for information sharing across federal, state and local law enforcement and homeland security agencies.

The LCMS target architecture and infrastructure is intended to help capture case-related information once and then promote effective data sharing within and between Justice's divisions as well with as partner agencies and other authorized users, the department said.

An Executive Steering Committee jointly led by Hitch and the acting deputy director of the Executive Office of the U.S. Attorneys, Steve Parent, is overseeing LCMS. The committee also includes members from each of the department's litigating divisions, Justice said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Regulators Drop Civil Case Against Frank Quattrone (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Wall Street regulators dropped civil charges against Frank Quattrone, giving the former investment-banking star his third win in three months in cases that arose from the Internet-stock bubble of 1999-2000.

He still faces a possible retrial on criminal obstruction-of-justice charges.

The National Association of Securities Dealers this week withdrew "spinning" charges first brought in March 2003 that Mr. Quattrone improperly used the lure of sought-after initial public offerings to win financing business as head of technology banking at the then-named Credit Suisse First Boston securities unit of Credit Suisse Group, now simply Credit Suisse. The NASD also dropped stock-research bias charges.

In a statement, Mr. Quattrone said he had "complied with the rules and regulations" throughout his 23-year career in banking and was "pleased that justice has been done." The NASD asked to withdraw the charges because many potential witnesses weren't any longer under its jurisdiction as registered securities-industry employees, and thus couldn't be compelled to testify. Quattrone lawyer Kenneth Hausman also argued witnesses' memories might be impaired because the case was based on events that occurred between 1998 and 2001, five to eight years ago.

The NASD's case had been deferred pending the outcome of criminal obstruction charges against Mr. Quattrone in 2003. Those charges were based on his endorsing a colleague's email in 2000 urging his group members to "clean up" files in accordance with company policy during investigations of how the firm allocated hot IPOs. Mr. Quattrone denied any intent to obstruct the probes.

But the regulatory actions began toppling March 20, when a federal appeals court overturned the banker's May 2004 obstruction conviction, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors at his second trial, returning the case to prosecutors for a possible third trial. Although prosecutors and defense lawyers have since conferred, no retrial decision has been announced.

Four days later, Mr. Quattrone won his second victory when the Securities and Exchange Commission overturned an NASD order barring him for life from the securities industry for failing to provide some requested testimony in the civil "spinning" case. The SEC said the NASD should have considered his argument that he had the right to avoid self-incrimination in the criminal obstruction case.

The NASD's appetite for aggressive enforcement action may have been tempered by another high-profile defeat the agency suffered in March, some regulatory experts said. An NASD spokeswoman declined to comment. On March 3, a hearing panel rejected NASD charges that Invemed Associates Ltd., run by Wall Street power broker Ken Langone, improperly shared customer profits by receiving oversize commissions from clients who got hot IPOs. Invemed denied any agreement to share profits.

Mr. Quattrone's former employer, Credit Suisse First Boston, paid $200 million in 2003 to settle civil charges of "spinning" and fraudulent research based partly on actions by Mr. Quattrone's group. But Quattrone lawyers argued that the rules in effect at the time, since bolstered, didn't bar his actions.

NASD Ends Case Against Quattrone (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

Frank P. Quattrone, the most prominent banker in Silicon Valley during the 1990's technology boom, won a third major legal battle yesterday as securities industry regulators dropped all charges against him.

The decision comes just two months after a federal appeals court overturned his conviction on charges of obstruction of justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission reversed a decision to ban him for life from the securities industry.

If prosecutors decide against retrying Mr. Quattrone, speculation is already rife that he could return to deal making in the Valley, where he helped companies like Cisco Systems and Amazon.com go public.

Yesterday's decision by NASD, which polices the brokerage industry, to dismiss its own case is notable because it was the accusations in the case — that he illegally doled out hot initial public offerings to corporate clients in exchange for business — that prosecutors later cited in his criminal trial to suggest that he was trying to cover up that activity and obstruct justice.

The dismissal is also notable because Mr. Quattrone's former firm, Credit Suisse First Boston, now Credit Suisse, paid $100 million to settle similar charges against the firm with the NASD in 2002.

Still, Mr. Quattrone faces the possibility that prosecutors could bring the obstruction of justice case against him again. But some legal experts suggested that with the dismissal of the NASD's 2003 case, momentum might be building for the criminal case to be extinguished, too.

"It's very unusual for regulators to dismiss charges they brought themselves — I think it's telling," said John J. Fahy, a former federal prosecutor now at the law firm of Fahy Choi in Rutherford, N.J. "This was an iffy case from the beginning. Now you're left with a house of cards that has completely fallen apart."

Not all legal experts, however, are in agreement that prosecutors will not try to bring the case again.

"It cuts both ways," said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at the law firm of McCarter & English. "On one hand, the underlying charges have been eroded. On the other, if the government doesn't pursue it, it represents a full-scale retreat on a case the government brought with considerable fanfare. It's safe to say that there will be some serious plea discussions."

Whether Mr. Quattrone will return to the finance world is a hot topic around Palo Alto and Menlo Park. In large part, he remains a beloved figure among many of the companies and colleagues that thrived with his help. And if prosecutors drop the charges against him, Mr. Mintz said, "in some quarters, he'd be viewed as a hero."

While he may never return to a major Wall Street firm, some in the Valley suggest he could start his own firm or try his hand at investing.

Still, Mr. Fahy said that even if Mr. Quattrone was not tried again, "There's the stigma."

"It's what Ray Donovan, the former secretary of labor said when he was acquitted: 'Where do I go to get my reputation back?' "

The obstruction of justice case centered on a single e-mail that Mr. Quattrone forwarded to his colleagues endorsing a colleague's message that urged his staff to "clean up those files" in December 2000.

The government contended that Mr. Quattrone was trying to destroy evidence that was part of an investigation into whether the firm was allocating stock offerings to clients in return for business.

Mr. Quattrone was tried twice. In the first case, in 2003, a mistrial was declared after the jury deadlocked; the next year, another jury convicted him, but an appeals court overturned that verdict, saying that the judge gave erroneous instructions to the jury.

Mr. Quattrone's lawyers argued that NASD did not adopt rules governing the practices in question until 2002.

"Frank Quattrone played by the rules, and the practices at issue were legal, common in the industry, and approved by C.S.F.B.'s senior management and legal counsel at the time," said one of Mr. Quattrone's lawyers, Kenneth G. Hausman, a partner at Howard Rice Nemerovski Canady Falk & Rabkin in San Francisco, in a statement yesterday.

In the statement, Mr. Quattrone said, "I am pleased that justice has been done, and truly grateful for the support of my family, friends, and clients who stood by me during these challenges, as well as for the expert work of my legal team."

Regulators Drop All Charges Vs. Quattrone (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Securities industry regulators have dropped all charges against former star technology banker Frank Quattrone over how his investment bank allocated shares of hot stocks during the late-1990s Internet boom.

The ruling Wednesday by a hearing officer of the National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, was the third in a trio of legal victories for Quattrone. In March, the Securities and Exchange Commission overturned a lifetime ban from the industry against Quattrone, and his conviction on charges of obstructing justice was thrown out by a federal appeals court.

Quattrone was the king dealmaker of the Internet stock boom who made a fortune helping bring some of the hottest new Internet companies to the market at his Wall Street investment bank, Credit Suisse First Boston, which has since changed its name to Credit Suisse (USA) Inc. He was convicted in May 2004 on federal charges of obstruction of justice, after his first trial ended in a hung jury. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the conviction in March, granting Quattrone a third trial.

The NASD in March 2003 had charged Quattrone with "spinning" - giving corporate executive clients the chance to buy into coveted initial public offerings as a way to win their companies' investment-banking business - from July 1998 to December 2001. The hearing officer on Wednesday granted a motion by the organization's enforcement department to withdraw the charges.

Quattrone had asserted that he was not responsible for making or supervising IPO allocations at CSFB and that NASD rules did not prohibit the conduct in question.

"Throughout my 23-year career, I have upheld high standards of integrity and professional conduct in my work and complied with the rules and regulations," Quattrone said in a statement issued Thursday. "I am pleased that justice has been done, and truly grateful for the support of my family, friends and clients who stood by me during these challenges, as well as for the expert work of my legal team."

Enron's Quiet Outages (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

Uncharged in the Fraud, Directors Settled, Resigned, Lay Low

A week after a Houston jury convicted former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay of fraud, one of the Houston oil company's onetime directors says he still can't believe Lay knew about accounting schemes that caused the firm's 2001 implosion.

"I'm convinced he didn't know what was going on. . . . I just can't bear the picture of him going off to jail," said Charls E. Walker, a Potomac-based economist and lobbyist who joined the Houston energy company's board before it was known as Enron.

As for his own role as a member of the board of directors from 1985 to 1999, Walker, 82, is regretful. "I was duped. Part of the problem was putting so much confidence in Ken's integrity and ability. . . . We were taken for a ride."

Walker is unusual among the 18 former Enron directors in that he is still willing to talk about the company and the role he played in it. All of the others either declined to comment or failed to return messages left at their homes and workplaces.

After enduring widespread public criticism and congressional scrutiny in 2001 and 2002 for failing to spot or stop Enron's mounting financial troubles, most of the board members have largely gone underground. Many of them resigned from -- or did not run again for seats on -- a number of corporate boards, and those who are still in the public eye have largely removed references to Enron from their biographies.

"They have experienced an extraordinarily difficult couple of years," said Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Center for Corporate Governance. "They've become the poster children of failed directors."

Compared with Lay and other top Enron executives who face lengthy prison terms, the former Enron directors got off lightly. They have faced no government sanctions, and their personal financial costs have been relatively small. Yet outside directors are almost never held responsible for corporate malfeasance, and the fact the Enron's former directors paid any price at all is testament to the depth of public anger over the collapse of what was once ranked the nation's seventh-largest company.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has not taken any formal action against the former Enron directors, but Enron investors sued them, alleging that all 18 had engaged in insider trading by selling shares while they knew more than the public about Enron's complicated financial structures.

Last year, 10 directors agreed to pay a total of $13 million out of their own pockets to settle the shareholder lawsuit. Each director's contribution was based on 10 percent of the profit he or she realized from selling Enron stock. The largest share by far -- more than $5 million -- came from Rebecca Mark-Jusbasche, the former chairman and chief executive of Enron International.

The overall settlement, shared by investors and Enron's creditors' committee, also included a payment of $155 million from Enron's officers and directors insurance policy and covered the other eight directors -- including Walker -- who did not profit from personal stock sales during Enron's collapse and against whom claims were dismissed.

Personal payments by directors are extremely rare. The only other settlement of this size and type in recent history involved the WorldCom Inc. directors. William Lerach, the class-action attorney who represented investors, said the plaintiffs were trying to send a message to other boards. "For those directors who sit on the boards of big companies where there is an egregious failure, they better be prepared to have their own pocketbooks hit," Lerach said.

Many Enron board members were prominent people, including academics, former government officials and top corporate executives. Some of the best known were Wendy Gramm, a former Commodity Futures Trading Commission chairman and senior scholar at George Mason's Mercatus Center; Robert Jaedicke, former dean of the Stanford University business school; and the current and former M.D. Anderson Cancer Center presidents John Mendelsohn and Charles A. LeMaistre.

Enron directors were serving on the boards of nearly two dozen other public companies or mutual fund families at the time of Enron's collapse. Gramm resigned almost immediately from the Invesco Funds board, and Jaedicke stepped down from the California Water Service Board.

But efforts in 2002 by organized labor to get former Enron director Frank Savage, a professional money manager, booted off the boards of Lockheed Martin Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. did not immediately bear fruit. Only 28 percent of Lockheed Martin shareholders withheld their votes, and he remains on the board.

"He's a valuable board member and has a long and distinguished association with our company," said Lockheed spokesman Jeff Adams. Savage resigned from the board of Qualcomm in 2004.

Similarly, Enron board member Norman P. Blake Jr., the former chairman of Comdisco Inc., remains on the board of Owens Corning, where he has served as a director since 1992. Company spokesman Jason Saragian said: "Our board reviews our director's independence and effectiveness as a part of good governance practices. Mr. Blake has capably met the requirements."

The union campaigns fell short in part because Enron was the first spectacular corporate collapse and shareholder activists were still feeling their way, said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "This was before the use of the withhold vote as a tactic had really been refined. Enron gave the boost to all the reforms that followed," he said.

Over time, many of the former Enron directors have dropped off other boards. Right now, though, six of them sit on the boards of at least eight companies or mutual funds.

Analysts and even one of the Enron board members agreed that the public scrutiny and vilification they endured had positive results. "What the whole episode has done is to bring out corporate policies for a badly needed ventilation for the American people," Walker said.

Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee went further. "Directors are doing better. . . . The audit committee is coming to learn a great deal more," he said. "There is now the fear waking up and finding yourself on the bridge of the Titanic and you've just hit the iceberg. The embarrassment cost has definitely gone up."

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Lessons Of The Stock Options Scandal (FT)

By Harvey Pitt

Executive compensation is handled badly by far too many publicly held companies. Contrary to some views, it is not the amount of compensation that is the problem. Rather, it is the methodology by which companies award compensation and then monitor whether they have received performance, or merely a pulse, for the pay they provide.

Issues of amount and methodology tend to be conflated and then confused as compensation continues to rise, often faster than many companies' profits. As if this were not bad enough, we now have an unfolding scandal over alleged backdating of option grants to senior executives. Even though it is unlikely we will find much of this misconduct occurring after Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted, this is more than of historical interest. There are important lessons to be learnt from this scandal.

For one thing, options backdating may be used by those who fear current efforts to repair what is wrong with SOX. Hastily and badly drafted, SOX suffers from multiple deficiencies. But, in the context of options backdating, one note-worthy provision is section 403, requiring options grants to be reported in two business days. This has diminished the apparently widespread practice of backdating options to take advantage of a low in the company's share price or an expected rise in price.

While there is a need to refine SOX – at a minimum, its one-size-fits-all philosophy should be changed – this scandal will be used by opponents of change to argue that any tinkering with the statute could undermine important benefits the statute provides.

Options backdating calls a company's internal controls into question. Many discussions of backdating options start with the observation that backdating is not, per se, illegal. That is wrong. Options backdating frequently involves falsification of records used to gain access to corporate assets. That conduct violates the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and its internal controls requirements. If corporate directors were complicit in these efforts, state law fiduciary obligations are violated. Backdating is not only illegal and unethical, it points to a lack of integrity in a company's internal controls.

With more and more companies being identified as having a backdating problem, the issue for regulators, prosecutors and plaintiffs' attorneys is who was at fault. Already, executives have resigned or been fired, with more casualties sure to follow. But from the company/shareholder perspective, the question is more properly one of how to move forward. For that, solutions must start with the board of directors and its compensation committee.

Compensation decisions should not be treated as if they were trivial. Boards and compensation committees must develop a sensible methodology for determining what they expect from senior managers and how to measure performance. The huge amount of unrealised gains amassed by some senior executives shows that we are talking about large amounts of money.

Among other things, compensation committees need to develop objective standards for each senior manager to achieve. They need to avoid reliance on subjective or easily manipulated criteria such as share price or earnings per share and decide what each standard is worth as a portion of total compensation. Measurements must be developed that are well understood by managers and those who monitor actual performance. A discussion of compensation should provide transparency into compensation standards and decisions, setting out what standards are applied, how well they are fulfilled and what consequences flow. Committees need to monitor the reporting of options and compare them with the dates on which grants were supposed to take place.

Larger public companies should also consider appointing an internal compensation officer. He or she could ensure that compensation decisions are handled appropriately, recorded and then carried out. Similarly, compensation consultants should be paid for meaningful analysis and advice, not for the rote ways in which so many of these consultants operate. Often, these consultants are hired for compensation committees by senior management. If this ever made sense, it no longer does. Consultants should be selected by compensation committees and be wholly independent of management.

The standard drill many compensation consultants follow is to identify five comparable companies, calculate the spread of compensation for each major management position, and tell compensation committees to pay their officers at least 75 per cent of the average. The fact that companies actually have paid, and sometimes extravagantly, for this kind of advice is a testament to the fact that you can sell almost anything. Nor should compensation lawyers be overlooked. They need to do a better job of explaining, and then monitoring, compensation requirements, processes and decisions.

In the light of the backdating scandal, it seems that more and more members of compensation committees, not to mention others, were unaware of the negative tax significance of getting options grant practices wrong. When the totals are tallied, we may well be talking more than $1bn (£532m) in lost tax deductions for those companies involved. This means that, at many companies, getting options grants wrong may result in significant restatements of financial results.

Finally, the accounting profession needs to reconsider its standards. At present, if companies are manipulating their documentation, it is unlikely that accountants will find it, no matter how bright or diligent. But the considerable breadth of this problem to date suggests that auditors need to spend more time with their audit clients identifying critical controls, and then evaluating how well those controls are applied and how easily they can be avoided.

When I was at the US Securities and Exchange Commission, we often remarked on the driverless car syndrome: when corporate fraud occurred, very often those who served in positions of responsibility would deny that they were driving at the time of the wreck. The only way to avoid a recurrence of this scandal is to make sure many different hands are at the wheel.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Poll: Americans Support Searches (ABC)

By Gary Langer

ABC News, June 2, 2006

June 1, 2006 -- In the rift between Congress and the Justice Department, Americans side overwhelmingly with law enforcement: Regardless of precedent and the separation of powers, 86 percent say the FBI should be allowed to search a Congress member's office if it has a warrant.

That view is broadly bipartisan, this ABC News poll finds, ranging from 78 percent among Democrats to 94 percent of Republicans.

The issue erupted last week, after the FBI searched the offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., in a corruption investigation. Congress leaders objected, and George W. Bush put a 45-day hold on the seized documents to allow for negotiations.

The issue arises at a time of various investigations of alleged wrongdoing in Congress, including those focused on the activities of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Indeed this poll finds broad public skepticism about congressional ethics: Sixty-five percent of Americans give a negative rating to the ethics and honesty of members of Congress. More, 54 percent, rate their own member's ethics positively, but that's down from 69 percent in a 1989 poll.

Allow FBI to Search a Congress Member's Office?

Yes

No

Nonetheless, support for FBI searches is about equally high whether people see Congress as honest or not. That suggests that the interests of law enforcement to investigate wrongdoing simply prevails in the public's mind over concerns about separation of powers, precedent, and the possibility prosecutors could use such searches to try to intimidate lawmakers. The question in this poll described both sides of the argument.

Politically, the Democrats have a small edge in perceived honesty, but there's not much advantage for either party on this issue. Sixteen percent of Americans think Democrats are generally more ethical and honest than Republicans; nine percent think the opposite. But most by far — 72 percent — say there isn't much difference between them.

However slight, that seven-point Democratic edge is their best in occasional polls over the last 17 years.

This Is Not Your Forefathers' Jefferson (USAT)

By Chuck Raasch

WASHINGTON — The case of William Jefferson would make the writers of the Constitution cringe.

Some 219 years after they met in Philadelphia to prescribe the duties of three branches of government, a big test of their separation-of-powers principle has arisen. But rather than being staked on issues or war or civil liberties, it is about alleged corruption of a member of Congress.

The FBI, part of the executive branch, raided the congressional office of Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat under investigation for allegations he accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes.

There are serious constitutional issues at stake. But the way that leaders in the House of Representatives reacted looked on Main Street like yet another example of Washington politicians putting themselves above the law.

Leaders in both parties decried the FBI's May 20 raid as a violation of their separate power under the Constitution.

The key words are in Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution. It prevents any member of Congress from being arrested while Congress is in session, except if they commit "Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace..." Section 6 later states that "for any Speech or Debate in the House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The FBI may have violated the latter clause by removing documents from Jefferson's office, some congressional leaders and constitutional scholars argue.

The problem for congressional leaders is that there are two separate spheres in this debate. One involves a constitutional test, the other a smell test. House members' knee-jerk defenses — calling hearings and news conferences to express outrage about the violation of their turf — overlooked the reality that most Americans are probably in the smell-test, corruption-is-bad sphere.

Two people have pleaded guilty for bribing Jefferson in exchange for his alleged help getting business for American companies in Africa. Jefferson maintains his innocence and has pledged to stay in office.

The FBI says it has Jefferson on tape accepting a $100,000 payment from a government informant, and $90,000 of it ended up wrapped in tin foil in a freezer in his Washington home. That bundle of cold cash is around $15,000 more than the average American family's yearly income.

Had the average American been suspected of doing what Jefferson is alleged to have done, no one in Congress would have protested when the FBI came knocking.

Critics depicted the raid as more power-grabbing by the Bush administration, which has sought to greatly expand its investigative powers in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Bush declared a 45-day cooling off period while the lawyers and politicians sort it out.

Bush was already under assault from political foes and constitutional scholars for establishing secret terrorist prisons overseas and authorizing wiretaps without a warrant. But when his FBI sent a few agents to search the papers of a politician being investigated for corruption, Congress bared teeth that it hadn't displayed over the other controversies.

This House has already seen former Republican Majority Leader Tom DeLay step down because of ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican, has been sentenced to prison for accepting bribes for steering defense contracts to constituents.

Until recently, this House mothballed its ethics committee amid political disputes and allegations that an ex-member, Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W. Va., steered federal contracts to non-profits run by ex-aides and business associates.

The Constitution's Article I, Section 2 says that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States..."

Your next chance to exercise that constitutional right comes Nov. 7 at a polling station near you.

Congress And Justice Dept. May Both Be Overreaching (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department is probably correct in saying that it was legally entitled to search a congressman's office last month. But in ignoring history and established conventions in that case, some legal scholars say, the Bush administration has again unsettled widely shared understandings of constitutional relationships and freedoms that have existed for generations.

As with the administration's assertions that it may ignore a law on domestic eavesdropping, reinterpret other laws through presidential signing statements and prosecute journalists under espionage laws, specialists in constitutional law and history said, the Justice Department's justification for the search is an aggressive use of executive power.

In the search case, there is broad academic consensus that the constitutional protection for Congressional speech and debate does not extend to evidence of criminal conduct, even if it is in a Congressional office.

That means the Justice Department was probably entitled to seek — and a federal judge probably correct in authorizing — a warrant to search the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, notwithstanding objections by leaders of Congress.

But having the legal power to conduct a search of another branch of government does not mean it is a wise or prudent thing to do. No other administration has ever done it. In ordering a 45-day cooling-off period, during which the solicitor general will hold the seized materials, President Bush seemed to allow time for reflection on the difference between what the executive branch may do and what it should do.

At the same time, Congressional leaders may have overreached in describing the search as a flagrant violation of the Constitution.

Indeed, the argument that Congressional offices are immune from law enforcement searches has something in common with the argument that the president has the authority to reinterpret the bills he signs into law, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University.

"They have no taproot in the constitutional document," Professor Kmiec said of arguments. "They're all sound and fury."

Several legal scholars went further, saying they found it hard to take at face value the objections of many legislators about the search of Mr. Jefferson's office.

"Like a lot of these issues where separation-of-powers rhetoric is deployed and where you see cross-party lines of agreement, there's often a competing story," said Daryl J. Levinson, a law professor at Harvard. "Here the story that leaps out at you is that the Republicans are worried that they're next."

The judge who authorized the warrant in Mr. Jefferson's case, Thomas F. Hogan of Federal District Court in Washington, will hear arguments on June 16 about whether to order the materials returned. Judge Hogan has in other contexts been unsympathetic to claims of privilege, having last year ordered the jailing of Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times, for refusing to testify about a confidential source.

Mr. Jefferson and many of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle have said that the speech-and-debate clause in the Constitution should have barred the search. The clause says that members of Congress "shall not be questioned in any other place" about "any speech or debate in either house." The courts have interpreted the clause broadly. Information concerning almost all legislative activity, including stolen documents received from a tobacco whistle-blower, for instance, have been held to be protected. But materials concerning activities unrelated to the official legislative process are not subject to the privilege (bribery being an obvious example).

Mr. Jefferson's lawyers used sweeping language in their motion seeking the return of the seized materials, invoking, for instance, "the delicate balance of our democratic system." Justice Department lawyers countered that Mr. Jefferson's real goal was to frustrate the very possibility of the search of a Congressional office.

"Representative Jefferson's view of the privilege, taken to its logical conclusion," the Justice Department argued in a filing on Tuesday, "would allow a member of Congress to prevent law enforcement officers from ever obtaining evidence of a crime simply by putting the evidence in a filing cabinet in his office that might contain privileged documents."

At a hearing of the House Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, its chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, said the committee intended to summon Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, to justify the search. He added that the committee was drafting legislation to prohibit such searches, modeled on a 1980 law that limits searches of newsrooms.

The clash between the two branches on this relatively minor point, at least as compared with the legal issues surrounding efforts to combat terrorism, raises questions about whether the Constitution's intricately constructed sets of institutional counterweights have fallen out of balance.

In other contexts, too, some scholars say, prudence and discretion have taken a back seat lately to uncompromising legal arguments. Phillip J. Cooper, a professor of public administration at Portland State University, for instance, faulted Mr. Bush for his enthusiastic use of signing statements.

"What we're seeing here," Professor Cooper said, "is a very consistent, systemic use of this little-known device to expand the authority of the president, constrain the authority of Congress and, in some cases, simply to supplant the authority of the judiciary."

What is missing nowadays, legal experts say, is the restraint and cooperation presupposed in the Constitution and noted by Justice Robert H. Jackson in his famous concurrence in the 1952 Supreme Court decision that turned back the Truman administration's attempt to seize the steel industry during the Korean War.

"While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government," Justice Jackson wrote. "It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity."

Brushback Hearing (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

In baseball, the hurler intimidates the batter with a brushback pitch. In soccer, the official warns an unruly player by pulling out a yellow card.

Politicians in legal jeopardy thunder and moan, threatening prosecutors while cloaking their pressure tactics in the grand language of constitutional rights and democracy.

So don't be fooled by the hearing before the House Judiciary Committee on the Justice Department's supposed violation of congressional rights in an FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's office in a bribery investigation.

The hearing was dominated by talk of abuses of power by long-dead monarchs and the need of the people's representatives for untrammeled communication with their constituents.

But Rep. James Sensenbrenner's committee was really sending a message as the House confronts a far-reaching corruption investigation: Nice little Justice Department you have there, Mr. Attorney General. Too bad if anything were to happen to it. Stop messing with us before we mess with you.

How else to explain this from Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.): "We have the power to impeach the attorney general. Now, I'm not sure that articles of impeachment are going to come out today. I think we're a couple shakes short of a quorum for that purpose. Although I suspect members would quickly be here if it was brought by the chair."

Why would House Republicans be so concerned with Jefferson, a Democrat from Louisiana who, according to prosecutors, kept $90,000 in cash in his freezer?

One answer is high principle. The more plausible answer is that Republicans are worried that the next shoes to drop in the congressional probes will belong to Republican members. Using a Democrat's case now to protect Republican members in the future is not so much clever as transparent.

If Wisconsin's Sensenbrenner and his fellow Republicans had shown an exquisite concern with civil liberties and accountability in the past, their challenge to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales might be seen as part of a consistent libertarian sensibility.

One of the witnesses called to justify the Republicans' assault, maverick conservative legal theorist Bruce Fein, had the intellectual honesty to put the issue in a larger context. He charged that "the Bush administration has been bent on a scheme for years of reducing Congress . . . to an extra in a Cecil B. DeMille political extravaganza."

But Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) called the committee's bluff when he noted the "number of examples of overreaching by the executive branch where there's been a total lack of oversight by this Congress." He cited such issues as torture, the treatment of detainees and enemy combatants, and data-mining operations by the National Security Agency.

"Now you've got a stampede by some members of Congress to make Capitol Hill a safe haven for hiding evidence of criminal wrongdoing," Van Hollen said in an interview yesterday. "Issues important to the American people have been totally ignored. But as soon as they come knocking on the doors of Congress, [House members] scramble to protect themselves."

According to 2005 Census Bureau estimates, there are 296,410,404 people in the United States. The Judiciary Committee is clearly concerned with the rights of 435 House members and -- give them the benefit of the doubt -- 100 senators. Someday, the committee will get around to thinking about the rights of the remaining 296,409,869 of us.

Of course it's true that the Justice Department could have shown more regard for congressional prerogatives, perhaps by informing the speaker and the minority leader in advance of the search. And blanket sweeps of congressional offices by the executive would indeed be a clear violation of the Constitution's "speech and debate" clause protecting senators and representatives from executive intimidation.

But this was no politically motivated search. The evidence indicates it was a response to Jefferson's attempts to withhold evidence. Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) has rebuked leaders of both parties for their self-protective zeal. The speech-and-debate clause, he said, "should not be in any way interpreted as meaning that we as members of Congress have legal protections superior to those of the average citizen." Amen.

Here's the implication of the hearings: The current House leadership will permit the executive to claim broad privileges as long as Congress can also claim broad privileges. Such an interpretation of the "separation of powers" would bring an end to "checks and balances."

So keep an eye on the leadership of the Justice Department. Here's hoping that it resists political pressure -- whether from Congress or the White House -- and allows its prosecutors to proceed with legitimate investigations of corruption.

Poverty Marked 'Dollar Bill' (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Rep. William J. Jefferson was once famous in Louisiana circles as the sharecropper's son who made his way to Harvard, steered by parents who preached the value of education.

Today, Jefferson is infamous nationally as the Louisiana Democrat who stashed $90,000 of alleged bribe money in his kitchen freezer.

Those who have watched his career's spectacular rise and potential fall believe the terrible poverty he escaped was ultimately his undoing. He rose to become his state's first African American congressman since Reconstruction, but people who know him say he still had a thirst for wealth.

"His perceived flaw among his peers has always been that, shaped by his humble beginnings, Bill loved money and desperately wanted to be a rich man," said Allan Katz, a New Orleans-based political consultant who has known Jefferson for more than 30 years. "It was the Deep South kind of hardship that shaped African American backgrounds."

One of 10 children, Jefferson, now 59, grew up in one of the poorest parts of Louisiana. He was good with a hunting rifle and told a story that showcased his dead aim: If his father needed three rabbits, he would give his son three bullets. But according to Katz, the family told the story another way.

"They had a gun and could only afford one bullet at a time…. If he missed, the family didn't eat," Katz said.

The lessons of poverty were apparently lasting. An accomplished attorney and aspiring politician, Jefferson became known early on for a pursuit of money that earned him the nickname "Dollar Bill."

As local legend goes, the name came from Jefferson's mentor — legendary New Orleans Mayor Ernest N. "Dutch" Morial. Morial had asked his protege for some legal work and was given it — along with a staggering bill. Outraged, Morial coined the moniker.

It followed Jefferson harmlessly enough until last month, when the FBI reported capturing the eight-term congressman on videotape accepting a leather briefcase with $100,000 in alleged bribe money from an undercover informant in front of a northern Virginia hotel. Of those marked bills, $90,000 wound up in Jefferson's freezer, the FBI said after a search of Jefferson's Washington home.

No charges have been filed against the congressman, and Jefferson has been forceful in his denial of wrongdoing. "There are two sides to every story," he recently said, adding that he could not answer specific questions on the advice of his lawyers.

But the clumsy bravado outlined in government documents has held Washington rapt. According to a 95-page affidavit filed by the FBI, Jefferson demanded bribes in exchange for helping iGate Inc., a Kentucky-based technology company, win Internet and telephone service contracts in Africa. The company's chief executive, Vernon L. Jackson, pleaded guilty last month to bribing Jefferson with more than $400,000 in cash and millions of shares of company stock.

In a related allegation, the FBI said Jefferson offered to help a Virginia businesswoman win similar contracts in exchange for a kickback, proposing she deliver a substantial amount of money to move the deal along. "Cash," he allegedly instructed in a note to her. She reportedly cooperated with investigators and taped the conversation.

Despite his reputation for wanting wealth, many who know Jefferson were shocked by the allegations because, by most measures, he has achieved success. Like many lawmakers, he keeps two homes, one in Washington and one in his district — a wood two-story house on Marengo Street in the racially diverse Uptown neighborhood. He drives a Lincoln Town Car.

The only clue to a motive came from the evidence against him: "I make a deal for my children," he allegedly said on tape, while demanding that his stake in a Nigerian venture be raised from 7% to 30%.

Already, the case has had a far-reaching impact in Washington. An FBI search of Jefferson's congressional office May 20 sparked a blustery showdown between the executive and legislative branches over separation of powers, causing President Bush to call a 45-day cooling-off period.

And it has upset the dynamic of the approaching November elections, when Democrats had hoped to make GOP corruption a cause for reclaiming control of Congress. Democrats have been highlighting the misdeeds of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), now in prison on bribery and tax evasion charges, and of GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now cooperating in one of the largest corruption probes in recent memory. But the Jefferson case has made it harder for Democrats to grab the high moral ground.

Jefferson has resisted calls for his resignation, while his staff offers up an emotional defense.

"He puts his district's interest before anything, and more specifically before party interests," said his communications director, Melanie Roussell.

Gangly and impeccably dressed, Jefferson has a reputation for impressive lawmaking skills and a thirst for education that continued into adulthood.

Raised on a farm in rural Lake Providence to sharecropper parents who did not graduate from high school, he flourished at the East Carroll Training School for the Colored.

He went on to Southern University A&M College — considered a flagship of Louisiana's African American university system — and then to Harvard Law School.

He began as a lawyer, but his passion was politics. He made history with his 1991 election to Congress. Along the way, he married Andrea Green, a former vice chancellor of Southern University in New Orleans. They raised five daughters, three of whom followed their father to Harvard Law.

A member of the influential Ways and Means Committee and an advocate of trade to alleviate poverty in Africa, Jefferson continued his education even while in Congress. He earned a master's degree in tax law from Georgetown University in 1996, and after Hurricane Katrina he helped pass tax-related legislation to benefit New Orleans.

Frustrated that he could not speak the local language on trade trips, he took up French and Spanish, according to Nicole Venable, a former senior policy advisor to Jefferson and until last November his chief of staff.

Until the scandal broke, Jefferson's seat was considered one of the safest in Congress. There was even talk of a budding Jefferson dynasty, with some political observers anticipating that one of his daughters would eventually take his seat.

"He could have stayed there until he retired, or died," said political consultant Katz.

Already, at least five still officially undeclared challengers are vying for his seat. But many constituents say they remain enamored of his rags-to-riches rise and his work on their behalf.

Still, there is a sense of damage in a place that, with another hurricane season just started, doesn't need one more burden.

"We are so traumatized," said Stephen Sabludowsky, a New Orleans-based attorney and publisher of BayouBuzz.com, a website about everything Louisianan. "We're going through so many things, we don't want the world's attention on us again."

Sabludowsky has urged Jefferson to resign rather than saddle the beleaguered city with a distracted congressman. He did so reluctantly, though, describing Jefferson this way: "Incredible … just in terms of his intelligence, his political acumen, the influence that he has….

"That's what makes this such a shame," Sabludowsky said.

Raid Controversy Has Roots In US Constitution (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, June 2, 2006

A controversy over federal agents raiding the office of a congressman has its roots in the formation of the U.S. Constitution more than 200 years ago.

The controversy involves Congressman William Jefferson, a Democrat from Louisiana.

Jefferson is the subject of a federal bribery investigation that involves the promotion of business interests in West Africa. He denies any wrongdoing.

What has upset members of Congress from both parties is an FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's Washington office on May 20.

William JeffersonRepublican James Sensenbrenner chairs the House Judiciary Committee. He says the FBI raid on a congressman's office violates a central tenet of the U.S. Constitution known as the separation of powers.

"The separation of powers and the checks and balances were put into our Constitution by the framers to make sure that no person or no branch of government got too powerful," said Mr. Sensenbrenner.

In the early days of the American Republic, the revolutionaries who won independence from Britain were determined not to replace a powerful English monarch with an equally potent American president.

So the founders devised a system of separate powers whereby the Congress made the laws, the executive branch, led by the president, enforced the laws, and the judicial branch, led by the Supreme Court, interpreted the laws to make sure they conformed with powers set forth in the U.S. Constitution.

Lawmakers upset with the FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's office are concerned with what they view as an attempt by the executive branch, in the form of the Justice Department, to intimidate a member of the legislative branch.

Charles Tiefer is a law professor at the University of Baltimore in Maryland. He testified at a recent hearing called by members of Congress angry about the search of Congressman Jefferson's office.

"Now this raid had all the elements of unconstitutional executive intimidation," he said.

Another witness, George Washington University law Professor Jonathan Turley, said the office search represented a break in tradition that goes back 219 years to the formation of the Constitution in 1787.

"But there has been a tradition of mutual respect and mutual restraint between the branches. What occurred on that Saturday night shattered that tradition," he noted.

But not everyone sees the Jefferson raid as a violation of the Constitution.

The Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, spoke on Fox television.

"If there are accusations of bribery, of having lost the trust, abused the trust of the American people, criminal activity, no House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," said Mr. Frist.

Some members of Congress have urged President Bush to order the Justice Department to return the documents seized from Congressman Jefferson's office.

The Washington Post reported that some high level Justice Department officials signaled they might resign if the White House forced the return of documents.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says his department has the right to investigate allegations of corruption in Congress and is respectful of the separation of powers.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales"Personally, in the department collectively, we have a great deal of respect for the Congress as a co-equal branch of government, as a separate and independent branch of government," said Mr. Gonzales.

Congressman Sensenbrenner says he intends to call Attorney General Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller to testify about the Jefferson case before his committee.

In the meantime, President Bush has ordered the materials seized in the raid sealed for 45 days in hopes that the Justice Department and House leaders can work out their differences over the case.

Tampa Tribune, June 2, 2006

Many members of Congress are outraged that the FBI raided the offices of Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson and took legislative files along with the evidence they sought for a bribery investigation. But accusations that the FBI trampled the doctrine of separation of powers are wildly overblown.

Still, President Bush was smart to seal for 45 days the papers and computer hard drive taken from Jefferson's office May 21. That gives time for all legal angles to be reviewed and for guidelines to be written on how the president's agents should handle suspected lawbreakers who serve in Congress.

The Constitution anticipated attempts to harass Congress. It says that senators and representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same." But the writers of the Constitution never envisioned an office hideout for elected felons.

The blustering about separation of powers on Capitol Hill suggests reasonable guidelines are overdue. Is a raid in the dead of night, as done to Jefferson, advisable? What safeguards should apply when agents seize lawmaking documents?

If rumors are true about the breadth of the improper generosity of certain lobbyists, those assigned to write the guidelines have no time to dally.

Dan K. Thomasson column: Congress Finally Losing Patience With FBI (SCRIPPS)

By DAN K. THOMASSON, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress' relationship with the FBI always has been Frankenstein-like with the father of the monster regarding his creation with cautious affection rooted in fear. The result has been fawning accommodation and unlimited tolerance for whatever the bureau demands, no matter how outrageous or unwarranted, a willingness to excuse what clearly was the inexcusable from Waco to Ruby Ridge to 9/11.

Long before agents stormed into the Capitol Hill office of Louisiana Democratic Rep. William Jefferson, setting off a minor constitutional crisis in their pursuit of evidence of criminal activity, there were allegations of the bureau's insensitivity to the separation of powers. But while some members of Congress complained about abuse of their rights _ Hale Boggs, Democratic majority leader, railed long and loud on the House floor about bureau encroachment _ most seemed unwilling to challenge the increasingly powerful national police force whose then-leader J. Edgar Hoover was said to have secret dossiers on nearly every official in Washington.

Whether Hoover's secret files ever really existed _ they have never surfaced _ didn't really matter. What was important was that everyone in Congress thought they did and acted accordingly. That included giving top priority to the bureau's often outlandish budget and increased manpower requests at the expense of other under funded, under staffed federal law enforcement agencies; treating every bureau mistake with kid gloves, looking the other way as the bureau gobbled up more and more turf from sister institutions, and generally ignoring their mandated congressional oversight responsibilities

Time and again, through one Hoover successor after another, the Congress not only tolerated bureau incompetence but also accepted the FBI's oft repeated excuse that whatever the failing, it had been the direct result of insufficient manpower. The message was clear: More troops would correct the problem.

That approach worked wonders, boosting the bureau to 12,000 agents, a huge budget, an army of support employees and a reach that went well beyond the nation's boundaries. The bureau led a charmed life on Capitol Hill. That is until Sept. 11, 2001, when forces led by Osama bin Laden revealed just how ineffective this bureaucratic giant was when it came to carrying out its responsibility for protecting the nation from just such incidents. The number one domestic defender against the kind of terrorism the rest of the world had long suffered was so incompetent that it had missed a series of opportunities to thwart the entire affair, at times ignoring the obvious signs and stifling the warnings of its own dismayed agents.

The bureau was for the first time since the days of John Dillinger under severe criticism from its former allies in the House and Senate as one commission after another found it wanting. There was even serious discussion about relieving it of its counter intelligence mission. The new director, Robert Mueller, met every challenge with the promise of reform, pledging to change the thrust from chasing bank robbers to stopping terrorists. But more than 80 years of culture built on after-the-fact investigating is difficult to change.

Now the bureau's woes have been exacerbated by the Jefferson affair resulting in outrage from the leaders of both parties in Congress and embarrassment to a president who badly needs a better relationship with the legislative branch. In an effort to cool down the rhetoric and avoid the growing constitutional brouhaha, President Bush ordered that whatever the bureau took from Jefferson's office be sealed for 45 days. It hasn't deterred a House committee from conducting hearings on possible constitutional violations. The committee's chairman, James Sensenbrenner, is contemplating legislation to prevent a recurrence.

While this encroachment can be expected to pass, it clearly is another blow to the FBI's reputation. A number of constitutional scholars believe the action leaps the barrier separating the branches of government. Clearly evidence gathered prior to the raid points to Jefferson's involvement in a bribery scandal. Why the bureau and its Justice Department bosses felt it necessary to step over a line it has come close to in the past but avoided crossing until now is anyone's guess. Perhaps it is best to chalk it up to continuing bad judgment.

Whatever the reason, the Prometheus that remained unchained so long faces a new challenge to stay that way and to prevent the growing number of lawmakers who would relieve it of its responsibilities from succeeding. Maybe more agents are needed.

Firms Wary About Holding Customer Records (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Top U.S. law enforcement officials have told Internet companies they must retain customer records longer to help in child pornography and terrorism investigations, and they are considering asking Congress to require preservation of records.

Industry representatives are expected to meet Friday with Justice Department officials, a week after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller first raised the issue with executives from several Internet service providers, including AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

The subject has prompted alarm from some executives and privacy advocates, especially after Gonzales' Justice Department took Google to court earlier this year to force it to turn over information on customer searches. Civil liberties groups also have sued Verizon and other telephone companies, alleging they are working with the government to provide information without search warrants on subscriber calling records.

Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who attended the first meeting, said Thursday that some executives raised privacy concerns at the meeting. But she said Gonzales has not made any decisions about how to proceed and that the department would be mindful of the privacy issue.

"We are looking at whether requiring longer data retention or asking ISPs to do it informally is something we want to pursue," Brand said.

Mueller suggested a period of two years and said terrorism investigations also would be helped by such a rule, several people who attended the meeting said. Gonzales was focused on child pornography cases, they said.

Any proposal would not call for the content of communications to be preserved, would keep the information in the companies' hands and could be obtained by the government through a subpoena or other lawful process, Brand said.

Still, one Internet executive familiar with the meeting said one worry is that once retained, the records could be made available for any criminal investigation or civil case, "down to a bad divorce, up to a music company asking for people who visited a file trading site."

The executive, who requested anonymity because it was private meeting and the talks were still continuing, said the industry was likely to oppose any legislation for financial, privacy and technical reasons. The department's recent clash with Google probably will make the companies more resolute in their opposition, the executive said.

Several companies said they work hard to protect children online and often work with law enforcement.

"But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety, and availability of low-cost or free Internet services," Microsoft said in a statement.

In a statement, Google said, "Any proposals related to data require careful review and must balance the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

The meetings are an outgrowth of Gonzales' interest in beefing up child porn investigations, some of which he said have been hampered by Internet companies' failure to retain records long enough.

Gonzales, who first raised the issue in an April speech, did not name any companies or cases. But a Justice Department official said some of the information provided by Justin Berry, a child pornography victim who testified to Congress in April, did not lead to arrests because authorities who sought help from ISPs were told the records no longer existed.

Berry criticized the department for acting too slowly on information he provided on 1,500 pedophiles. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because investigators still are looking into Berry's case.

At the moment, there are no broad requirements for preservation of data, although federal authorities can request records be maintained for up to six months when they suspect a crime has been committed.

U.S. Wants Companies To Keep Web Usage Records (NYT)

By Saul Hansell And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department is asking Internet companies to keep records on the Web-surfing activities of their customers to aid law enforcement, and may propose legislation to force them to do so.

The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales held a meeting in Washington last Friday where they offered a general proposal on record-keeping to a group of senior executives from Internet companies, said Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the department. The meeting included representatives from America Online, Microsoft, Google, Verizon and Comcast.

The attorney general has appointed a task force of department officials to explore the issue, and that group is holding another meeting with a broader group of Internet executives today, Mr. Roehrkasse said. The department also met yesterday with a group of privacy experts.

The Justice Department is not asking the Internet companies to give it data about users, but rather to retain information that could be subpoenaed through existing laws and procedures, Mr. Roehrkasse said.

While initial proposals were vague, executives from companies that attended the meeting said they gathered that the department was interested in records that would allow them to identify which individuals visited certain Web sites and possibly conducted searches using certain terms.

It also wants the Internet companies to retain records about whom their users exchange e-mail with, but not the contents of e-mail messages, the executives said. The executives spoke on the condition that they not be identified because they did not want to offend the Justice Department.

The proposal and the initial meeting were first reported by USA Today and CNet News.com.

The department proposed that the records be retained for as long as two years. Most Internet companies discard such records after a few weeks or months.In its current proposal, the department appears to be trying to determine whether Internet companies will voluntarily agree to keep certain information or if it will need to seek legislation to require them to do so.

The request comes as the government has been trying to extend its power to review electronic communications in several ways. The New York Times reported in December that the National Security Agency had gained access to phone and e-mail traffic with the cooperation of telecommunications companies, and USA Today reported last month that the agency had collected telephone calling records. The Justice Department has subpoenaed information on Internet search patterns — but not the searches of individuals — as it tries to defend a law meant to protect children from pornography.

In a speech in April, Mr. Gonzales said that investigations into child pornography had been hampered because Internet companies had not always kept records that would help prosecutors identify people who traded in illegal images.

"The investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers," Mr. Gonzales said in remarks at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va. "This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time," he said.

An executive of one Internet provider that was represented at the first meeting said Mr. Gonzales began the discussion by showing slides of child pornography from the Internet. But later, one participant asked Mr. Mueller why he was interested in the Internet records. The executive said Mr. Mueller's reply was, "We want this for terrorism."

At the meeting with privacy experts yesterday, Justice Department officials focused on wanting to retain the records for use in child pornography and terrorism investigations. But they also talked of their value in investigating other crimes like intellectual property theft and fraud, said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington, who attended the session.

"It was clear that they would go beyond kiddie porn and terrorism and use it for general law enforcement," Mr. Rotenberg said.

Kate Dean, the executive director of the United States Internet Service Provider Association, a trade group, said: "When they said they were talking about child pornography, we spent a lot of time developing proposals for what could be done. Now they are talking about a whole different ball of wax."

At the meeting with privacy groups, officials sought to assuage concerns that the retention of the records could compromise the privacy of Americans. But Mr. Rotenberg said he left with lingering concerns.

"This is a sharp departure from current practice," he said. "Data retention is an open-ended obligation to retain all information on all customers for all purposes, and from a traditional Fourth Amendment perspective, that really turns things upside down."

Executives of several Internet companies that participated in the first meeting said the department's initial proposals seemed expensive and unwieldy.

At the meeting scheduled for today with executives of Internet access companies, Justice Department officials plan to go into more detail about what types of records they would like to see retained and for how long, said a Justice Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It will be much more nuts-and-bolts discussions," he said, adding that the department would stop short of offering formal proposals.

Online Privacy Again At Issue (LAT)

By Joseph Menn

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Big Internet and telephone companies are girding to fight an unprecedented call by the Bush administration for them to keep detailed records of customers' online activities for two years.

The request by Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III would dramatically expand the government's ability to track what people do online and with whom they communicate.

It follows disclosure this year that the Justice Department had solicited potentially billions of online search queries from some of the same companies and that the National Security Agency had requested calling records of virtually all U.S. customers.

Gonzales and Mueller asked Google Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL and other companies to preserve the data at a May 26 meeting, citing their value to investigations into child-pornography distribution and terrorism. Internet companies typically keep customer histories for only a few days or weeks.

The Justice Department said Thursday that it was not seeking to have e-mail content archived, just information about the websites people visit and those with whom they correspond.

Beyond law enforcement, though, the trove also could be available to lawyers arguing civil lawsuits — including divorce cases and suits against people suspected of swapping copyrighted movie and music files online. Privacy advocates fear the user histories could be exploited by criminal investigators conducting inappropriate exploration or pursuing minor cases.

"This is not simply limited to kiddie porn or terrorism. It's a real break with precedent," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the nonprofit Electronic Privacy Information Center. "Data retention is open-ended. The government is saying, 'Keep everything about everyone and we'll sort it out later.' "

Individual legal battles increasingly include court-approved requests for records from Internet access providers who might have online evidence of criminal activity or an affair. Often those requests yield little because the target can no longer be linked to a specific computer's Internet address or because the e-mails and records of website visits have been deleted.

None of the Internet companies has publicly opposed the request. But they noted concerns over privacy in statements Thursday. People familiar with the company executives' reaction to the Justice Department's request described alarm — tempered mainly by assurances from Gonzales and Mueller that the discussions were preliminary.

Many of the companies appeared to be emboldened by recent precedents set by Google and Qwest Communications International Inc., both of which resisted broad requests for data from the Justice Department and the NSA, respectively.

Without addressing the substance of the meeting with Gonzales and Mueller, Verizon Communications Inc. spokesman David Fish said the company "has a strong history of protecting customer communications and related records." He noted that the Internet access provider battled requests for customer data from the Recording Industry Assn. of America.

Google said a solution "must balance the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

If companies refuse to cooperate, the Justice Department said it might propose legislation to force the companies to keep records longer. Specifically, the Justice Department wants information linking those online to the Internet addresses assigned to personal computers. In addition, it wants data tying those Internet addresses to destinations on the Web and to e-mail sent and received.

Currently, court orders can force e-mail providers, Internet access providers and others to turn over records — when they have them. The speed with which online footprints fade has frustrated law enforcement. Police, for instance, have testified before Congress they often run into dead ends in child-sex cases.

In an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va., Gonzales said the reluctance of service providers to keep records longer "has hampered our ability to conduct investigations in this area."

The Justice Department said Thursday that it was not interested in reading the e-mails of ordinary Americans.

"The attorney general made perfectly clear that if the Department of Justice decides to ask Congress for a data-retention requirement, the department would not propose that content be included in such a requirement," spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

Law enforcement officials would still need some legal instrument, such as a subpoena or search warrant, to look at the data. But FBI agents have the additional power to request information secretly, without a court order, through so-called national security letters.

Five companies and one trade group attended last week's meeting with Gonzales and Mueller, first reported by the online technology news website CNet. Besides Google, AOL and Verizon, executives were sent from Microsoft Corp. and Comcast Corp., according to several people briefed on the session.

Acknowledging the sensitivity of the project, the Justice Department on Thursday took the unusual step of discussing the plan with such likely critics as the Cato Institute, a public-policy research organization, and the Electronic Privacy Information Center. Further meetings with telephone and Internet companies are set for today.

"What's special here is the scale," said Ohio State University law professor Peter Swire, a privacy expert who attended Thursday's meeting at the Justice Department. "The Justice Department is discussing requiring records for chat, e-mail, and Web surfing — that's billions of encounters per day."

As things stand, a few industries are required to keep information on customers. A growing number of financial firms must know enough about their clients to be able to report activity that could involve hiding illicit profits. Phone companies must keep records on who called whom for 18 months, and Justice Department and Homeland Security officials in April told the Federal Communications Commission that period should be extended.

With Internet records, "you're in a different ballgame," said Jim Harper, an information policy specialist at the Cato Institute. "You're talking about a massive transfer of power."

Justice Department Asking Internet Companies To Save Data (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, June 2, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is considering asking Congress to rewrite the rules that govern how Internet companies cooperate with law enforcement agencies, despite objections raised by the tech industry and privacy experts.

During the last week, Gonzales has met with privacy experts and with major Internet companies to discuss a proposal that would require Internet companies like Google, Yahoo, AOL & Microsoft and Internet service providers like Verizon, AT&T and Comcast to retain records relating to their customers' online behavior for up to two years.

Current regulations require companies to preserve data that is the subject of specific criminal investigations while law enforcement collects evidence that could support a warrant.

``This is a radical departure from current practices," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who meet with justice department officials Thursday. ``We've opposed it because we think it creates an unnecessary risk to privacy and security of Internet users."

Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman, said the purpose of the meetings with the Internet companies and others is ``to solicit their input and seek their assistance in formulating proposals and recommendations on the issue of data retention."

Internet companies retain vast databases containing the personal information of their customers for a variety of commercial reasons, but the information can also be useful to law enforcement pursuing criminal investigations.

At a speech on April 20 before the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Gonzales said ``the failure of some Internet service provides to keep records" has hampered the government's ability to conduct investigations into alleged child exploitation.

Roehrkasse said Gonzales had made clear that government employees would only have access to the information through ``appropriate legal processes," such as a subpoena, which is subject to judicial review, or in the course of investigations that were authorized by the department's criminal division, or undertaken in conjunction with investigations by any of the 94 U.S. Attorney's offices around the country.

Microsoft, AOL, Google Asked By U.S. To Keep Internet Records (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, June 2, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. is asking Internet companies including Microsoft Corp., Google Inc. and AOL to preserve records of customers' Web activity to aid terrorism and child pornography investigations.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller made the request last week at a meeting with industry executives, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. More talks are scheduled for today and tomorrow. Also included in the discussions are representatives from victims' rights groups, privacy advocates and law enforcement officials, he said.

``We have begun initial discussions with Internet service providers and others on this issue of data retention to help the department with bolstering its investigative efforts," said Roehrkasse.

Gonzales is pressing Internet companies for more cooperation as the Justice Department focuses on terrorism and child pornography cases. The move has prompted complaints from privacy advocates and led to a clash earlier this year with Google, the word's largest search engine.

The agency has asked Internet companies to retain records such as lists of e-mails sent and received or information on Web searches. Authorities wouldn't ask the companies to keep the content of e-mails and would use standard legal channels, such as seeking a subpoena, before obtaining information, Roehrkasse said.

The Justice Department has no legal authority to require companies to keep data on their customers and would need to ask Congress for that ability, Roehrkasse said. He said there has been no decision on how long companies would need to store the records.

Retaining Records

New York-based Verizon Communications Inc., the No. 2 U.S. telephone company, and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp., the largest U.S. cable provider, were among the companies at last week's meeting, Roehrkasse said. AOL is the Internet unit of New York-based Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company.

Gonzales said in April that Internet service providers had hurt child pornography probes by not keeping data long enough. He said he would personally reach out to chief executive officers of leading providers to resolve the problem.

``The investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers," Gonzales said in a April 20 speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Virginia. ``This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time."

Privacy Concerns

Earlier this year, the Justice Department sparred with Google over a request for information on its customer searches. In March, a federal judge ordered the Mountain View, California-based company to turn over some of the records demanded by the government.

Google initially had refused to give the government the information citing privacy concerns. Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft, AOL and Sunnyvale, California-based Yahoo! Inc. cooperated with the Justice Department. Yahoo is the most-visited U.S. Web site. Microsoft, the world's biggest software company, owns the MSN Internet service.

``We strongly support Attorney General Gonzales' interest in assuring that the Internet is safe for everyone, especially children and families," Phil Reitinger, senior security strategist for Microsoft, said in an e-mailed statement. ``But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety, and availability of low-cost or free Internet services."

Muhammad Sentenced To Six Life Terms (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

A Montgomery County judge yesterday sentenced sniper John Allen Muhammad to six consecutive life sentences for his role in the 2002 shootings that terrorized the D.C. metropolitan area.

"You came into this county and randomly murdered innocent and defenseless people. You would have murdered more people, but you got caught," Circuit Judge James L. Ryan said to Muhammad, the mastermind of the shootings.

"The citizens have, to the best of their ability, recovered and will continue to recover," he said. "But you, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope, no future." Muhammad, 45, said nothing but looked at the judge with his arms crossed.

As Muhammad was handcuffed and led out of the Rockville courtroom, family members of the sniper victims and onlookers broke into applause.

Muhammad and his accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, shot 13 persons in three weeks, killing 10 and wounding three. A jury Tuesday convicted Muhammad of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County.

In 2003, a Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death for the slaying of Dean Harold Meyers.

State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Muhammad will be shipped back to Virginia "within 48 hours." Mr. Gansler chose not to seek the death penalty for the killings, instead gaining multiple life sentences with no possibility of parole as insurance in case the Virginia death sentence is ever overturned.

Muhammad now heads back to Sussex State Prison's death row, where, according to a spokesman for the Virginia Attorney General's Office, he could be executed as soon as three years from now. Muhammad has exhausted his direct state and federal appeals in that case, but habeas corpus appeals still remain.

A federal law-enforcement official, however, said Muhammad will be "moved to the front of the line."

Before the judge imposed his sentence, family members of victims spoke in court about their loss.

Nelson Rivera, whose wife, Lori-Ann Lewis Rivera, was gunned down at a Kensington gas station, said his daughter says she wants to die so that she can be reunited with her mother.

"He not only killed my wife, he killed me, he killed my daughter and all the rest of the family," an emotional Mr. Rivera said.

"The day Conrad died, a piece of me went with him," said Sonia Wills, the mother of Conrad E. Johnson, who was fatally shot on Oct. 22, 2002. "I'll never get over Conrad," Mrs. Wills said, addressing Muhammad directly.

"I refuse to call your name, sir. You took my son, sir, in the hopes that you would snatch your children," she said. "You are the devil's advocate. You will never see or hear of your children again." Muhammad looked down as the family members spoke.

"It's a shame you cannot look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives you have ruined," Mrs. Wills said.

Ola Martin, whose brother James D. Martin was the first Montgomery County sniper victim, emphasized her brother's belief in "respect and courtesy" for all people.

"Jim spent his life fighting for the rights of others, and yet this coward, this bully, this cold-blooded killer, robbed him of all his rights," Mrs. Martin said.

During the trial, Malvo, 21, called the man who was once a father figure for him a "coward" who pulled the trigger in 10 of the 13 shootings.

Malvo also testified that Muhammad hates the United States and believes that "the white man is the devil."

DOJ_NMG_0031280

Malvo has signed a plea agreement and will be transferred back to Red Onion State Prison in Southwestern Virginia once he has been sentenced.

A Chesapeake, Va., jury in 2003 found Malvo guilty of his role in the Meyers murder and sentenced him to life in prison with no parole possibility.

"I am not proud of myself, and I'm just trying to make amends, if possible," Malvo said when asked why he testified against Muhammad.

The six victims killed in Montgomery County were:

• James D. Martin, 55, government analyst, fatally shot on Oct. 2, at 6:02 p.m., outside a Shoppers Food Warehouse in Wheaton.

• James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39, landscaper, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 7:41 a.m., while mowing grass in White Flint.

• Premkumar A. Walekar, 54, cab driver, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 8:12 a.m., while pumping gas in Aspen Hill.

• Sarah Ramos, 34, housekeeper, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 8:37 a.m., while sitting on a bench in Silver Spring.

• Lori-Ann Lewis Rivera, 25, mother and homemaker, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 9:58 a.m., while vacuuming a minivan in Kensington.

• Conrad E. Johnson, 35, bus driver, fatally shot on Oct. 22, at 5:55 a.m., on his Ride-On bus in Aspen Hill.

Muhammad Gets 6 Life Terms In Md. Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 2, 2006

(AP) - ROCKVILLE, Md.-Twice-convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad was sentenced Thursday to six consecutive life terms in prison with no possibility of parole, a sentence prosecutors consider insurance in case his Virginia death sentence is ever overturned.

"You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future. You will spend every day for the rest of your life locked in a cage," Montgomery County Circuit Judge James Ryan said.

Muhammad, 45, showed no emotion as the sentenced was announced. He stood with his arms crossed, looking directly at Ryan. Some in the audience applauded.

After representing himself throughout the monthlong trial, Muhammad chose not to speak at his sentencing. J. Wyndal Gordon, an attorney helping him, said Muhammad told him, "I said everything I wanted to say."

Several relatives of victims spoke before the sentencing, including Nelson Rivera, who described how his young daughter wanted to die so she could be reunited with her mother, Lori Lewis-Rivera.

"He not only killed my wife, he killed me, he killed my daughter and all the rest of the family," Rivera told Ryan.

Muhammad was convicted Tuesday of six counts of murder for six of the 10 deadly sniper attacks that terrorized the Washington area in October 2002. He was already under a death sentence in Virginia for a killing there.

This time, Muhammad's young accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, took the stand for the first time to testify against him. Malvo told jurors how the older man, his one-time mentor, trained him to shoot and drew him into a sinister plan to kill people, including children, indiscriminately.

Jurors deliberated less than five hours before finding Muhammad guilty.

Malvo, sentenced to life in prison in Virginia, had agreed to plead guilty in the Maryland killings. He was not promised leniency but told jurors he wanted to face the man who he said trained him to be a killer.

He called Muhammad a "coward" and, at one point, glared at him, saying: "You took me into your house and you made me a monster."

Muhammad called him "son" and questioned Malvo's credibility, saying the 21-year-old had problems with exaggeration and memory.

He also claimed he was framed by investigators who planted and fabricated evidence and said he was the victim of a broad law enforcement conspiracy.

Muhammad's legal adviser argued to the judge Thursday that Muhammad did not get a fair trial, saying evidence and witnesses that could have proven his innocence were not allowed into the courtroom.

"We came here to search for justice, we came here to seek the truth, to find out what happened in those 23 days in October," he said. "We fell short. I don't think anyone can celebrate the convictions in this matter."

Muhammad could be returned to Virginia's death row as early as Thursday afternoon, according to Darren Popkin, Montgomery County chief deputy sheriff. Malvo likely will remain in Maryland until he formally enters a plea in October.

Other states still have outstanding charges against Muhammad from earlier shootings, including Louisiana and Alabama. It will be up to Virginia whether to send him away again for further prosecution.

Muhammad Gets Six Life Terms (BSUN)

By Andrea F. Siegel

The Baltimore Sun, June 2, 2006

ROCKVILLE -- More than three years after a sniper's bullet felled Conrad Johnson as he stood in the doorway of a Montgomery County bus, Sonia Wills had the opportunity Thursday to confront her son's convicted killer.

Calling John Allen Muhammad the "devil's advocate," Wills bore into the 45-year-old Gulf War veteran as he looked downward, toward papers at the defense table.

"It is a shame you will not look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined," Wills told Muhammad.

Wills was one of four relatives of Muhammad's victims who spoke at a hearing at which he was sentenced to six consecutive life terms with no possibility of parole for sniper shootings in Montgomery County in the fall of 2002.

Though the relatives of victims expected no apology from Muhammad, several expressed revulsion at his refusal to acknowledge the grieving speakers.

Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan pointedly noted that Muhammad would live out his days "locked in a cage" while grieving families and a terrorized community would forge ahead with their lives.

"You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence," Ryan told a grimacing Muhammad, who stood with his arms folded across his chest as he awaited sentencing.

"You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future," Ryan said before imposing the maximum sentence.

Shortly afterward, deputy sheriffs returned Muhammad to a prison in Waverly, Va., where he is on death row for a seventh sniper slaying, said Montgomery County Sheriff's Department Deputy Chief Darren Popkin.

Outside the courtroom, Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, a candidate for Maryland attorney general, said that anyone who questioned whether the county that suffered the most should try this case "should be ashamed of themselves."

Some had criticized the expense of the trial, with the cost of housing and providing security for Muhammad and Malvo exceeding $600,000. Gansler and others argued that the trial was needed as "insurance" in case Muhammad's sniper conviction and death sentence in Virginia were overturned on appeal, and to help the victims' families and the community put the case behind them.

Thursday, the hostility in the full courtroom toward the man believed to have masterminded a violent cross-country rampage with a teenager as his puppet, was palpable. Observers applauded Ryan's sentence as the tearful relatives of victims hugged.

Wills told Muhammad that he would never see his children again -- a reminder of Muhammad's opening remarks from the trial's start nearly a month ago. Maintaining innocence, he had told jurors that losing his children in a custody war was "my 9/11" and that he came east to reclaim them.

The words of Nelson Rivera, whose wife Lori Ann Lewis-Rivera was gunned down as she vacuumed her van, moved people in the courtroom to tears. The couple's 7-year-old daughter, Jocelin, talks of dying so that she can join her mother.

"She knows her mom is dead, but she is just hoping when she is going to die. That is what I am living now because of Mr. Muhammad," Rivera said.

"That worries me," he said outside the courtroom.

Every year, with Mother's Day and her mother's birthday near each other, Jocelin selects a plant in memory of her. Last month, Jocelin chose morning glories for the front of their home outside Sacramento, Calif., Rivera said.

Now, after three trials -- two for Muhammad and one for admitted accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo -- Rivera said he has no answer when she asks why her mother was killed.

"She wants these bad guys to say 'sorry' to her for her mom," Rivera said. "He's cold. No feeling at all."

Though permitted to address the court, Muhammad, who acted as his own lawyer through Tuesday's guilty verdicts, chose to stand in silence Thursday, letting one of his stand-by lawyers take over. Attorney J. Wyndal Gordon said Muhammad told him, "I said all I have to say."

Last Friday, in a nearly 3 1/2-hour rambling closing argument, Muhammad said he had no remorse because he was not guilty.

Victims' relatives said that after Muhammad's closing argument, they were glad that he didn't speak.

Muhammad had contended that he and the state's star witness, Malvo, were framed in a vast law enforcement conspiracy. He continued to call Malvo "my son" throughout the trial, though Malvo blamed Muhammad for indoctrinating him and said the senior member of the sniper team was the triggerman for most of the shootings. Defense lawyer Gordon referred to Malvo as Muhammad's son in brief remarks Thursday.

But Muhammad had produced little to dent prosecutors' overwhelming forensic case, which Malvo capped with a gripping account of the shootings. Malvo has agreed to plead guilty to the same six slayings for which Muhammad was tried.

Through DNA, fingerprints and the bullet analysis, prosecutors linked the duo to the high-velocity rifle stowed behind the back seat of Muhammad's car and to the crimes. A juror said Muhammad's voice in court sounded just like that on a voice recorder found in Muhammad's car.

Three jurors returned to court for the sentencing. One, who asked to be identified only as Debbie, said she was pleased with the sentence but wished that the death penalty had been an option. She said Muhammad's closing argument did not help him.

"You could see the anger behind him, especially during the closing," she said. "He raised his voice, his eyes were wide."

Juror Claudia Lopez-Cuevas, 21, an employee with the Montgomery County Department of Correction and Rehabilitation, disagreed that Muhammad should have received another death sentence.

"Life in prison sounds like he got what he deserved," she said.

"When he defended himself, he showed no remorse. In his mind, he really thinks he didn't do this," she said. "Even though he says he's innocent, the evidence is clear."

Muhammad is unlikely to serve the Maryland sentence, which is to begin after the Virginia death sentence.

The sniper slayings terrorized the Washington region for three weeks in October 2002. Thirteen people were shot, 10 fatally, as people from Baltimore to Richmond lived in fear that they might be next in the cross hairs. On Tuesday, the jury convicted Muhammad in the murders of James D. Martin, 55; James L. "Sonny" Buchanan Jr., 39; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; Sarah Ramos, 34, and Lewis-Rivera, 25; and Johnson, 35.

In court, Gordon started to complain that Muhammad did not receive a fair trial, but Ryan cut him off, saying such statements belonged in an appeals court.

Gordon extended condolences to the victims' families. But, he told the judge, "I'm not convinced Mr. Muhammad is the man."

Despite some contentious moments -- Ryan once threatened to hold Gordon in contempt -- Ryan praised the stand-by legal team for its dedication and long, unpaid hours. Muhammad had fired his public defenders after they said he was mentally ill. The judge promised to search for funds to reimburse the stand-by lawyers from Baltimore -- Gordon, A. Jai Bonner and Russell Neverdon Sr. -- for their expenses.

Asked what Muhammad was writing before he was removed from the courtroom, Gordon replied that Muhammad was signing his appeals notices.

Muhammad Gets 6 Life Terms In Md. (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

As his last act in a Maryland courtroom, John Allen Muhammad chose silence.

The man convicted twice of terrorizing the Washington area with a powerful rifle and an impressionable accomplice betrayed no emotion yesterday as relatives of the people he killed spoke of their loss. He remained impassive as a judge sentenced him to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence," Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan told Muhammad. "You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future. You'll spend the rest of your life locked in a cage."

J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's stand-by lawyers, maintained that Muhammad -- who doggedly defended himself during the month-long trial -- is an innocent man who was not allowed to tell his side of the story.

"We came here in search for justice," Wyndal said. "We came here in the search for the truth, to find out what really happened during those 23 days in October. My humble opinion is that we fell short."

What took place in the snipers' blue 1990 Chevrolet Caprice in October 2002 has never been clearer to the relatives of sniper victims, however, because the Maryland trial included the testimony of Muhammad's accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo.

Yesterday, four of those relatives stood just a few feet from Muhammad and told him of their anger and their heartache.

"You took my son from me in the hopes that you would snatch your children," said Sonia Wills, the mother of sniper victim Conrad Johnson, referring to Muhammad's apparent plot to reclaim the children he had lost in a custody dispute. "I know we will never see Conrad again. And you are the devil's advocate. You will never see or hug your children again. It's only a shame you cannot look at us to see the people you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined."

Muhammad didn't flinch, and his eyes remained cast down.

Nelson Rivera, the husband of Lori Ann Lewis-Rivera, described how much he struggled to explain to his young daughter what had happened to her mother.

"What I want to say is he not only killed my wife," Rivera said. "He killed me. He killed my daughter and all the rest of the family. You have no idea how hard it is to tell a 3 ½-year-old her mom got killed."

Ola Martin-Border, James Martin's sister, said she wishes she could have protected her "little brother" one last time.

"I was his big sister, but I wasn't there to protect him," Martin-Border said. "I would have taken that bullet myself. Gladly. But I wasn't there. I couldn't be there for him. And I couldn't even be there to comfort him."

Their voices, at intervals soft and thunderous, brought tears to the eyes of spectators in the courtroom, some intimately affected by the case.

Outside, State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, flanked by relatives of sniper victims, faced a wall of cameras to hail the sentence.

"Anyone who suggested that this trial shouldn't be brought to Montgomery County should be ashamed," he said of people who questioned the need for another trial after Muhammad had been convicted of murder in Virginia.

His deputy, Katherine Winfree, who prosecuted the case, said that although the county is no stranger to violent crimes, Muhammad is in a league of his own.

"No one has ever stood before a judge in this county with more on his conscience and more crimes to his discredit than John Allen Muhammad," Winfree said.

The trial prosecutors and a small group of sniper task force members left the courtroom sporting weary smiles. Some hugged victims' relatives, revealing bonds forged during the investigation and three trials.

"Yes, it brought them some closure," said Sgt. Roger Thomson, a Montgomery homicide investigator who played a key role in the investigation. "And, yes, it brought some closure to Montgomery County. Justice was done, and I can't wait to get them out of the state. This man -- he can't even look at these people in the face. The only thing you see in his eyes is hate."

Muhammad, 45, has been convicted in seven of the 10 October 2002 sniper slayings and is on death row in Virginia. Malvo, 21, who has been convicted of one killing in Virginia, has agreed to plead guilty to the six Maryland slayings. He is expected to return to Virginia to serve a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Muhammad and Malvo could be prosecuted in other states, including Louisiana and Alabama, where they allegedly shot people.

As Ryan announced the sentence, Muhammad began scribbling on a notepad. Gordon later said he was drafting an appeal to the sentence.

"Mr. Muhammad, on behalf of all the people in this community, I order the sheriffs to take you into their custody, remove you from this courtroom, from this county and from this state," Ryan said. "Sheriff, take this man into your custody."

As he was escorted out in handcuffs, a short but hearty round of applause spread through the room.

Before suppertime, Muhammad had been transferred to the Sussex 1 State Prison in Waverly, Va., home to all death row inmates in that state.

Reputations Bruised As 'bagman' Opens Up (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 2, 2006

A longtime aide to Roscoe Dixon testified Thursday the former state senator had him handle bribe money and that Dixon also sometimes directed him to give portions to Kathryn Bowers and other legislators.

In his second day on the witness stand in Dixon's federal extortion and bribery trial, Barry Myers watched himself on surveillance tapes telling an informant that Dixon trusted him "like a son" and that his boss was paranoid and "scared of his own (expletive) shadow" about getting caught taking payoffs.

Advertisement

In a tape made Feb. 12, 2004, by informant Tim Willis, Myers counts out $100 bills, six stacks of 10 each, that Willis has placed on a coffee table on behalf of a fictitious FBI company called E-Cycle Management, Inc.

Dixon says "Throw me one of them stacks, man," but quickly declines when Myers reaches for one that has red markings on the top bill. Myers then gives Dixon a second stack, which he conceals inside a booklet before leaving.

"It's just that he gets so (expletive) paranoid and shaky, man," Myers tells Willis on the tape after Dixon leaves.

Myers said he kept $2,000 for himself and gave the rest to Dixon later that evening. Myers said Dixon then told him to take $2,000 and deliver part of it to Bowers and part to Dixon's sister, who needed to pay her light bill.

The testimony came on the second day of Dixon's trial in which he is accused of taking $9,500 in illegal payoffs to support legislation favorable to the fake E-Cycle company that was part of the FBI's sting.

Operation Tennessee Waltz, as the agents called it, resulted in 10 indictments, including Dixon, Bowers, John Ford and two other past or present state legislators.

Dixon contends he was entrapped by Willis and undercover FBI agents posing as corrupt businessmen, and that Myers sought payments without Dixon's approval or knowledge.

Myers also was indicted and last year pleaded guilty to bribery and extortion charges and began cooperating with federal prosecutors. He is awaiting sentencing.

"And when did you get this morality attack?" defense attorney Coleman Garrett asked Myers.

"It's not a morality attack," Myers insisted. "I wanted to correct a wrong."

He said he has not been promised anything for his testimony, but that he hopes that by telling the truth "I would get a reduction in my prison sentence."

In afternoon testimony, Myers is heard on tape telling an undercover FBI operative posing as an E-Cycle executive that the "heavy hitters" in the Tennessee legislature were on board with pushing legislation favorable to the company.

He names legislators Dixon, Bowers, Ford and Lois DeBerry, who has not been charged with any crime.

On the tape, Myers tells undercover FBI agent "L.C. McNeil" that he's the man who handles the money for the legislators, who he refers to as "the big juice."

At one point, he says of Dixon, "I'm his boy. I'm his bagman."

On that tape and others played for the jury, Myers talks of concerns of FBI or TBI investigations into bribery schemes and tells McNeil that City Councilman Rickey Peete "went to prison for that, you know, takin' money and stuff."

When McNeil wants to know how he'll be sure the money is getting to Dixon and he's getting something in return, Myers says they could set up a kind of code, where Dixon might call him and thank him for "taking care of Barry." He also said they might refer to the money as "tickets."

One secret video, shot from a hidden camera in the back seat of Willis's car, shows Willis in the driver's seat and Myers in the passenger seat on Aug. 26, 2003. The two had discussed the Children's Dental Clinic, which was trying to get a contract with TennCare, the state's healthcare program for the poor. They can be seen counting out $100 bills into two envelopes, $2,000 in each.

Myers said Dixon told him to take the money to Bowers.

"One was going to Kathryn Bowers and one was going to Roscoe Dixon," Myers testified.

After video of Myers getting out of the car and then returning, he testified: "I just gave Kathryn Bowers the envelope with the money in it. She put it in her car, the trunk."

Myers said that when he later mentioned to Dixon that Willis had the E-Cycle company as a client, the senator "told me to see if I could get anything from Tim." Myers said that meant money.

Defense attorney Garrett noted there was no recording of that exchange.

During a lengthy tape-recorded discussion about E-Cycle, Dixon asks Willis what kind of legislation E-Cycle wants. Willis says once E-Cycle gets a contract, the company could go public and "they'll all be damn near millionaires."

The trial before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla resumes this morning.

Reputations Bruised As 'bagman' Opens Up (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 2, 2006

Reputations went on trial Thursday in federal court when prosecutors played secret tapes that included allegations of payoffs to uncharged politicians.

On those tapes, played during the second day of testimony in former state senator Roscoe Dixon's bribery trial, confessed "bag man" Barry Myers brags to an undercover FBI agent about delivering money to several local public officials.

Myers' credibility also came under heavy attack when he acknowledged embellishing some of his claims involving Dixon.

Among his most explosive claims, Myers said he had delivered money over the years from unnamed businessmen to Lois DeBerry, D-Memphis, speaker pro tem of the Tennessee House.

Myers also named U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. and his father and predecessor in the seat, Harold Ford, saying, "... they send me to pick up bags of money."

The taped statements triggered sharp denials from the uncharged parties. Some expressed frustration that they had no standing to defend themselves from the claims played out in a public court.

"They are totally -- totally -- untrue, with absolutely no basis in fact," DeBerry said. "I'm so disappointed."

Ford Jr., D-Memphis, said he hardly even knows Myers.

"I've never asked anyone to break the law," he said. "It's so crazy, it's hard to even respond."

A law professor cautioned that observers shouldn't put too much stock in claims that arise about uncharged individuals during criminal proceedings.

"This bag man is trying to build up his own credentials in the underworld context," said Ron Rychlak, a former criminal defense lawyer and now a law professor at the University of Mississippi.

"He has every reason in the world to embellish his credentials by tarnishing these other individuals. You can't put too much credence in this kind of stuff."

Indeed, Myers admitted Thursday under cross-examination he had embellished some of his taped claims about Dixon, 56, who's charged with taking $9,500 in bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover corruption sting.

Myers had claimed on one tape that he once covered for Dixon when the senator had an extramarital affair, yet Myers admitted in testimony that there was no affair.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett, who has portrayed Myers as a crook and a liar, got him to admit he had lied when he was first questioned by the FBI about his Waltz involvement, yet Myers said he did it to protect Dixon.

Myers, 39, pleaded guilty last fall to acting as a bag man for Dixon and a second Waltz defendant, state Sen. Kathryn Bowers. He is now a government witness and is awaiting sentencing.

Myers has given often scintillating testimony over the past two days as prosecutors played undercover tapes made during the Waltz probe when Myers had no idea he was being recorded.

In a taped conversation with an undercover agent on May 14, 2004, Myers bragged he had delivered "suitcases of money" over the years to Dixon, and said he delivered money to other African-American politicians, too.

"To be honest with you, most of the money I used to pick up come from white folks ... white males, established businessmen that would send money to Kathryn, Lois, Roscoe and John," Myers says on the tape.

It's a reference to Waltz defendants Kathryn Bowers, Roscoe Dixon and John Ford, as well as Lois DeBerry.

DeBerry has admitted taking $200 from an undercover Waltz agent to gamble in Tunica but hasn't been charged.

On another point in the tape, Myers claims he works for the Ford family, too.

"I don't know if you knew our first congressman, his name Harold Ford Sr. ... His son Harold Jr. I mean they send me to pick up bags of money. ... I mean and trust me (to) bring every penny back."

On a June 2004 tape, Myers said state Rep. Larry Miller, D-Memphis, "got a $5 million contract" with the Tennessee Lottery for a friend, businessman J.W. Gibson, now a Democratic nominee for County Commission.

Gibson's company, Tec-Print holds a subcontract to print lottery tickets, but he and Miller both said there was nothing untoward in the deal.

"What Mr. Myers is referring to, I have no idea," Miller said.

While it may appear to some that names of uncharged parties are being unfairly tossed out at the trial, a former prosecutor said it's unavoidable that some innocent parties become entwined in criminal evidence.

It's up to the jury to decide if Myers is lying about some things, but in the end, Dixon's guilt or innocence will hinge on whether he's seen taking bribes on tape, said former U.S. attorney Hickman Ewing.

"Whether (Myers) is a liar or not, there it is."

Waltz Jurors Watch Senator Take Cash (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), June 2, 2006

MEMPHIS — Federal court jurors watched a video Wednesday showing a state senator picking up a stack of $100 bills put before him by an aide and an FBI informant.

The video clip was played at the trial of former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon's trial on bribery and extortion charges stemming from the Tennessee Waltz corruption investigation.

On the video secretly recorded in February 2004, Dixon aide Barry Myers lays out $6,000 from informant Tim Willis in stacks of $1,000 each on a coffee table. Dixon, sitting on a sofa beside the table, makes small talk with Myers and Willis about politics, business and professional wrestling before getting up to leave for another appointment.

"Throw me one of those stacks," Dixon tells Myers, then pockets the money and leaves.

Testifying as a witness against Dixon, Myers said the money was to pay for the senator's help in getting a favorable state law passed for a company called E-Cycle Management, which was supposedly interested in buying and selling used government computers.

E-Cycle, Myers and Dixon found out later, was a fake company set up by the FBI to snag state lawmakers and other Tennessee officials looking for bribes.

Myers has pleaded guilty to passing along bribes to Dixon and Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis, and is awaiting sentencing.

Myers said he met with Dixon after the videotaped meeting and gave him another $1,000. Myers said he kept $2,000 for himself and set the rest aside to pass along to Bowers and a Dixon relative having financial troubles.

Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, and Bowers are among five current or former state lawmakers charged in the extortion and bribery investigation. Dixon was in the state Legislature for 22 years until his resignation from the Senate a few months before he was indicted last year.

Bowers remains in the Senate and is awaiting trial.

Agents working on the two-year investigation made hundreds of audio and video recordings, most of them with the help of informant Willis, a convicted felon and former business consultant.

In an audio recording played for the jury, Dixon, Myers and Willis talk about changes E-Cycle executives supposedly want to make in the proposed law they have gotten before the state Legislature.

A voice identified as Dixon tells Willis to get more information from E-Cycle executives. "They need to clarify in writing what they want ... they're all over the map," Dixon says.

Willis then asks how much Dixon and Myers need to be paid, suggesting "about six," which Myers said meant $6,000.

Dixon doesn't respond directly to the money question. "Work through Barry ... keep Barry happy," the lawmaker says.

When prosecutor Tim DiScenza asked Myers what that meant, he testified, "Give me the money so it won't pass through his hands."

Myers said Dixon was "paranoid" about handling bribe money himself.

Dixon, accused of seeking a total of $9,500 in bribes, is the first lawmaker charged in the scandal to go to trial.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty and is serving a one-year prison sentence. Former Chattanooga lobbyist Charles Love, a second "bag man" charged with handling bribes for lawmakers, also has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Also awaiting trial are Sen. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga, D-Chattanooga, and former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis.

Two Shelby County officials charged in the investigation have pleaded not guilty, and a Hamilton County commissioner was found guilty at trial and sentenced to three years in prison.

WPTY-TV, June 2, 2006

The so-called "bag man" took the stand Wednesday in the trial of former Tennessee state senator Roscoe Dixon. Barry Myers said he accepted bribe money for Dixon. The FBI videotape shown as evidence during his testimony seems to back up his story!

Prosecutors are just getting started with Myers. It was almost 5pm when he was sworn in, but in that short time jurors got the chance to hear Myers' story behind the video shown earlier in the day. Barry Myers says the video played in court Tuesday shows him accepting $4000 from FBI informant Tim Willis in what was at the time state senator Roscoe Dixon's office. He says he split the money with Dixon.

The bribe was not connected to E-Cycle, the dummy company set up by the FBI to target crooked law makers in the Tennessee waltz sting, but it goes back to a scandal involving the Children's Dental Clinic and TennCare certification.

Lawyers for the government say tapes like this lead to Dixon's investigation. In the tapes Dixon says, "What I want to say is support Kathryn Bowers. She's been fighting for this thing big time." Myers said from the witness stand that Dixon was talking about a pay off.

The tapes also said: Dixon: let's just use Barry. I don't want to touch it, but I'm going to help you because of Barry and that way I can honestly say (unintelligible). . .

Myers: Yeah he didn't (unintelligible). . .

Dixon: and I'll show Barry what to do and Barry knows how to stay in the background.

Jurors see recordings FBI made during Tennessee Waltz probe

MEMPHIS — With $1,000 in hundred-dollar bills wrapped inside a magazine, former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon left the home of a friend who was seeking his help passing legislation.

Prosecutors say it was the Memphis Democrat's first payoff for helping an upstart computer-recycling company get a leg up in securing business from state government.

Earlier in the evening, after Dixon's friend and "bagman" Barry Myers, counted out six piles of $1,000 each onto a coffee table, Dixon had said, "Throw me one of them stacks, man."

This was revealed in a video recording that jurors watched Thursday during the second day of Dixon's federal trial on bribery and extortion charges.

Later that evening in February 2004, Dixon would get even more money from the rest of the $6,000 he had left behind at lobbyist Tim Willis' house for Myers to deliver to him, star witness Myers testified during his second day on the stand.

Dixon would get another $1,000; Myers kept $2,000; and Dixon would direct Myers to divide the remaining $2,000 between then-Rep. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis, and Dixon's sister, who needed help paying her electricity bill, Myers told jurors.

After Dixon left, Myers told Willis — a government informant who was secretly recording their activities — that Dixon took $1,000 immediately so "he could run out to the casinos," the video showed.

The government's case so far has largely relied on audio and video recordings of the former senator and others discussing E-Cycle Management Inc., which wanted the help of lawmakers to pass favorable legislation and was willing to pay them for it.

Some of the recordings have mentioned Bowers, former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis, and House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry, D-Memphis, throwing their support to E-Cycle. Bowers and Ford also have been charged and, like Dixon, pleaded not guilty and are going to trial.

Myers pleaded guilty last August. Dixon is the first to go to trial among the current or former legislators who were charged.

Thursday afternoon, Dixon's attorney quizzed Myers on his motives for involving Dixon, suggesting that Myers had no other real source of income.

Attorney Coleman Garrett also suggested that the $1,000 Dixon took could have been a campaign contribution and that there were no witnesses who saw Myers turn over more money to Dixon.

A Dixon supporter who attended the trial as a spectator said he did not believe the recordings were incriminating.

"You hear them saying to Roscoe, 'I need your support.' Of course, Roscoe will tell a friend, 'You've got my support,' " said Del Gill, 56, an active Democrat in Memphis and retired industrial engineer.

Gill noted that $1,000 is the same amount other legislators, such as Sen. Jeff Miller, who have not been charged in Tennessee Waltz, got from E-Cycle.

Friends such as Gill, along with Dixon's wife, neighbors and pastors, attended the trial Thursday.

In his testimony, Myers said that he told Dixon about Willis' work with E-Cycle and was seeking Dixon's help to help Willis.

Dixon "told me to see if I could get anything from Tim," Myers said.

Federal prosecutors contend that Myers and Dixon had formed a criminal partnership, not just to extort money by using Dixon's public office, but to protect Dixon from prosecution if they got caught.

In the video recording, Willis told Dixon, "I'll have a little something for you." Dixon responded, "Work through Barry. … Keep Barry happy."

Myers told Willis that Dixon was paranoid about getting caught taking bribes, saying Dixon almost got caught in the 1980s Rocky Top scandal. At no time would Dixon take the money directly, Myers said.

That way, if they were ever caught, Myers could take the heat and say the money was being paid to him as a consultant.

Myers described other moments that he served as a loyal bagman for Dixon, telling one undercover agent that when he took a "suitcase of money" to Dixon, the senator got every penny.

Myers did not seem suspicious during the sting.

DOJ_NMG_0031289

In the video recording, Myers told Willis that Dixon was nervous about hidden cameras, not knowing one was trained on him at that very moment.

Prosecutor: Video Shows Bribery Not First For Senator (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 2, 2006

There were more damaging tapes played Thursday in the bribery trial against former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon.

The tapes showed Dixon in the room as large amounts of money were changing hands. Prosecutors said it has happened more than once.

One tape showed Dixon at his desk. He leaned back and watched as money changed hands in front of him.

Prosecutors said an FBI informant handed $4,000 to Dixon's trusted aid Barry Myers. They said that money was so the senator would help a Memphis dental clinic get credentials in TennCare. It was after that transaction the FBI set up a fake company called eCycle and tried to bribe other lawmakers.

Thursday, prosecutors showed another video in which Dixon watched again as an FBI informant put $6,000 on the table. Dixon walked away with $1,000.

Myers, who already plead guilty, testified he took the rest and gave some to Dixon's sister, Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who has also been charged.

Dixon's defense attorney said he wants people to keep an open mind.

"We realize that that was basis for the government's case, and that's what we were confronted with. And that's the hurdles we're going to have to overcome," Coleman Garrett said.

The defense said the FBI entrapped Dixon.

The trial is scheduled to last for three weeks.

Sorich Defense Blasts Prosecution Witness (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 2, 2006

The lawyer for Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief aggressively attacked the credibility of a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial Thursday, suggesting the witness agreed to wear a hidden recording device to shorten his prison stay.

Defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin portrayed retired city official Daniel Katalinic, 54, as a crook with little choice but to help the federal investigation of alleged corruption in the Daley administration.

Katalinic pleaded guilty last year to one mail fraud count, admitting he got $15,000 in bribes from city trucking contractors. He said he hoped his cooperation would earn a lesser sentence—as little as half of the 2-year minimum prison term.

"A year and a day is a real good deal for what you got caught doing, isn't it?" Durkin asked Katalinic during cross-examination.

"I guess so," Katalinic replied, shrugging.

But Katalinic's two-day testimony provided damning accounts of the roles that Durkin's client, Robert Sorich, and three other city officials allegedly played in city hiring. Sorich, Daley's former patronage chief, is on trial with Timothy McCarthy, his assistant in the mayor's office, and ex-Streets and Sanitation officials Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan.

Prosecutors say they schemed to fix jobs and promotions in favor of applicants with clout, including pro-Daley political workers. The fraud allegedly was perpetrated to get around legal restrictions that ostensibly had curtailed the city's long tradition of patronage hiring and machine politics.

Katalinic said he was part of the patronage scheme, leading a "white ethnic" political group of about 300 city workers for Daley, U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and other candidates on commands from the mayor's office. Sorich and McCarthy helped secure jobs and promotions for the most dedicated of his political group, Katalinic said.

He alleged that Sullivan directed him to recruit city workers to make phone calls to potential voters. And he said Slattery complained to him that he could not get jobs and promotions for his own group of 11th Ward political workers, because the pro-

Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization got many coveted spots.Katalinic acknowledged that he agreed to cooperate with investigators after learning that they had caught him on tape discussing bribes he took. Katalinic secretly recorded a conversation with Sorich.

"I bet that was a tough pill to swallow?" Durkin asked Katalinic.

"Yes, it was," Katalinic replied.

"That's not how you were brought up on the East Side," Durkin said.

Katalinic, a broad-shouldered product of former Ald. Edward Vrdolyak's 10th Ward Democrats, looked down and shook his head. But prosecutors objected to Durkin's question before Katalinic could reply.

Prosecutors did not play the recording Katalinic made of his conversation with Sorich. The defense has said the conversation helps exonerate Sorich, in part because he advises Katalinic to tell the truth to federal agents.

Durkin asked Katalinic whether he had complained that former Sen. Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) selected an aggressive prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, as U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Prosecutors objected before Katalinic could answer about either of the Fitzgeralds, who are unrelated. But Durkin entered into evidence a transcript of a conversation that authorities secretly recorded between Katalinic and a Streets and Sanitation worker.

"Nobody could be worse than [Peter] Fitzgerald was," Katalinic said on the tape. "That's why you've got these U.S. attorneys running all over the place, starting all kinds of [stuff]."

Katalinic acknowledged he used to be a heavy gambler. After retiring from Streets and Sanitation in 2003 as a deputy commissioner, he lobbied the city for Allied Waste, the Daley administration's blue bag recycling contractor.

Katalinic also pointed the finger at his former boss, retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez. Sanchez, a leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization, has not been charged.

To underscore his assertions that Katalinic turned on friends to spare himself, Durkin showed jurors Katalinic's resignation letter to Sanchez.

"It has been a learning experience made only easier by following the lead of a commissioner who is fair and honest in every part of our daily working relationship," Katalinic wrote.

Defense attorneys questioned whether it was Sorich or Sanchez who arranged for jobs as city truck drivers for Katalinic's political workers in 2004. Katalinic testified that the city hired nine of 10 truck driver hopefuls that he sponsored.

Katalinic said he could not remember whether Sorich or Sanchez helped in that case. It did not matter, he said, because Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs had the final say.

"Al would always tell me, 'I've got to get the OK from IGA,'" Katalinic said.

WLS-TV, June 2, 2006

Politics, not experience, got people job with the City of Chicago. That's the prosecution's claim in the trial of Mayor Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich. Thursday, a different take from witnesses.

Retired deputy commissioner of the Streets and Sanitation Department, Daniel Katalinic was on the witness stand for a second day. Defense attorneys had their turn with the man who cut a deal with the government to avoid a lengthy prison sentence. Katalinic was originally charged with Sorich and three others but pleaded guilty.

Daniel Katalinic knew he could no longer fight a federal investigation once the feds told the former streets and sanitation official that they had him on tape. Defense attorney Tom Durkin asked him, "You knew you were toast?" Katalinic said, "Yes." Katalinic testified that he hired the best plea bargain lawyer in town and cut a deal with the government. The attorney asked if he was at the US attorney's mercy. Katalinic said, "Yes."

The deal Katalinic cut with the government included Thursday's testimony against Robert Sorich and three other former City Hall employees. Katalinic told the jury, with Sorich's recommendation, he organized a political organization that worked on Mayor Daley's campaigns as well as the campaigns of pro-Daley candidates. In exchange for their hard work, Katalinic promised his political workers that he would help them get city jobs and promotions.

Katalinic sent lists of candidates to Robert Sorich and Sorich's aide Timothy McCarthy, who is also on trial. Katalinic prioritized the names based on how much political work they did. But under cross-examination Katalinic admitted that the first name on the list wasn't only his best political worker, but one of his best friends. Katalinic's nephew was also the list.

Katalinic also told the jury that he knew there would be no guarantees that any of the people on his list would get jobs or promotions. In the end, the majority did. Even though Katalinic testified that Sorich had the final say, Durkin said, "You're not saying that Sorich ran City Hall hiring?" Katalinic responded "No."

Also under cross-examination, Daniel Katalinic admitted he used to be a heavy gambler. Durkin shot back by saying that's when you used to have a lot of money, now your lawyer has all your money.

Meantime, prosecutors never played a tape of a conversation Katalinic had with Robert Sorich when the FBI had Katalanic wear a wire. The defense says the tape actually helps exonerate Sorich.

News Clash Of The Clout Armies (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE WARMBIR AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 2, 2006

Political groups competed over the number of city jobs they could give their troops as post-election rewards, and they even complained that the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization got a larger share, a key witness testified Thursday.

But defense lawyers in the City Hall hiring trial quickly attacked Daniel Katalinic's testimony, getting him to grow misty-eyed about his decision to flip for government prosecutors -- and to admit that while political groups did slip lists of names to the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, there were "no guarantees" they'd be hired.

Katalinic said the requested hires were qualified people and most already worked for the city but sought promotions or different jobs.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

The testimony comes in a trial that accuses Robert Sorich, a top IGA official, and three others of manipulating the city hiring system to hand out jobs as political rewards. Katalinic, deputy commissioner of street operations who cultivated a political army out of city workers, said he'd hand a list of names with corresponding job requests to Sorich and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy.

At one point, Katalinic said, Patrick Slattery, another co-defendant, complained to him that his 11th Ward group wasn't getting rewarded.

"He said he and his workers were getting sent all over doing political work and getting nothing in return," Katalinic told Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Guentert. "He blamed Al Sanchez and HDO. He said they were getting all the positions."

He later told Slattery lawyer Patrick Blegen, though, that Slattery wasn't behind any City Hall hiring.

'You were toast'

Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin ripped into Katalinic's motivation for testifying. Durkin said that last year, federal investigators played Katalinic a secretly recorded conversation he had with John "Quarters" Boyle. The conversation was caught in the Hired Truck investigation.

"You knew from that moment on you were toast, correct?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Katalinic quickly went from "tough guy to rollover guy," Durkin said, and Katalinic blinked back tears when asked if it was the hardest thing he ever had to do in his life.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Katalinic agreed with Durkin that it was "preposterous" to say that Sorich controlled City Hall hiring, since he reported to higher-ups at the IGA.

"They are the heads of the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Durkin suggested that power went even higher, asking if the mayor didn't run his own office.

"I would think so," Katalinic said. "It's called the mayor's office."

Earlier Thursday, lawyers revealed that federal investigators secretly tapped Katalinic's office and cell phones, recording hundreds of conversations. None of the conversations was played at trial. In one, Katalinic reportedly complains to a city worker that former U.S. Sen. Peter Fitzgerald brought in the aggressive U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald.

"Nobody could be worse than Fitzgerald was," Katalinic said. "That's why you've got these U.S. attorneys running all over the place, starting all kinds of s---."

Leaving the federal courthouse Thursday, Katalinic lamented: "I need some aspirin."

'Scope of testimony' unknown

Meanwhile, City Hall disclosed that Mayor Daley's corporation counsel, Mara Georges, has been subpoenaed by the defense and will testify if she is called.

Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said it's impossible to know if Georges would refuse to answer on grounds that it might be a violation of attorney-client privilege.

"We'd have to know more about what information is being sought. It's not like every conversation is privileged," Hoyle said. "We don't have any information about what their expectations would be about the scope of testimony."

Hoyle denied that Georges' testimony would set a dangerous legal precedent or "constitute a waiver" for all Law Department attorneys on similar issues, including the long-running Shakman case.

Last year, the Daley administration suffered a black eye when the list of cooperating witnesses ended up in the hands of Georges and several influential aldermen. The corporation counsel subsequently acknowledged that she got the list from an attorney representing Sorich.

Ryan Lawyers Set The Stage For Appeal With Fresh Attack On The Jury (AP)

By Mike Robinson

CHICAGO - George Ryan's lawyers set the stage Thursday for the former governor's appeal of his racketeering and fraud conviction by filing 70 pages of court papers asking for a new trial on the grounds that juror misconduct "taints the verdict in this case."

"Justice requires the District Court to set aside a tainted verdict such as this without regard to the length of the trial, the high profile nature of the prosecution, the resources expended or any other issues unrelated to the legal errors that deprived the defendant of a fair trial before an impartial jury," the defense attorneys said.

Much of the document was a painstaking rehashing of the agony that followed the April 18 guilty verdict at the close of a seven-month trial when goings-on in the jury room began to come to light and both sides spent two weeks haggling over whether they showed unfairness to Ryan.

Two jurors ended up hiring lawyers of their own with one attorney coming to court to plead with U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer to put an end to the investigation of the jury.

Pallmeyer eventually ruled that the verdict would stand. Sentencing is set for Aug. 4.

Ryan, 73, and businessman Larry Warner, 67, were convicted of racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses as part of a scheme hatched when he was secretary of state and later governor.

Prosecutors say the evidence shows that Ryan steered state leases and contracts to Warner and other lobbyists and in return received gifts ranging from free vacations to a golf bag.

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined to comment.

"This is an extraordinary case," the defense attorneys said. "False statements, misrepresentations, improper ex parte communications, disclosure of confidential information and a decision-making process influenced by external considerations - a litany not simply of the charges against George Ryan but of the juror misconduct that taints the verdict in this case."

Juror misconduct was not the sole focus of the document. It also said that prosecutors had failed to provide adequate proof of the charges and that the judge should have allowed the defense to tell jurors more about what Ryan did when he was in power in Springfield.

In specific, defense attorneys pointed to Ryan's opposition to the death penalty, his promotion of a state organ-donor program and his campaign for tougher drunken driving laws.

Asking to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted is standard procedure following a guilty verdict. But such post-trial motions are very rarely granted by the courts.

They do, however, preview the case that the defense takes to the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals as it seeks to have the verdict overturned. Defense attorneys also can use other errors that they believe the judge made before and during the trial as the basis for their appeal.

Arrests In Fumo Probe Spur Debate Over Prosecution Strategy (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 2, 2006

The FBI spent three years investigating powerful state Sen. Vincent Fumo and his ties to a charity run by aides before charging two underlings Wednesday with obstructing justice.

A day later, the obvious question remained: What about Fumo?

Are federal authorities proceeding cautiously? Or do they lack the evidence to make a case against him?

"It tells me that they're trying to either scare the devil out of these two guys who got arrested to obtain their cooperation, or to put the fear of God into other people," said defense lawyer William A. DeStefano, a former federal prosecutor.

"And that sort of tells me that they're not comfortable with their case against the senator."

Others suggested that federal prosecutors _ humbled perhaps by the acquittal of some bankers in the Philadelphia pay-to-play scandal _ want to build an ironclad case.

"It may be that this is a reaction to some of the failures to get convictions without insiders in the last couple of years," said Temple University law professor David Hoffman. "Maybe they're trying to shake the trees.

"But you never know. It could be that they have a case ready to go," he said.

Fumo, the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, cuts a wide swath in Harrisburg and Philadelphia. As of March, he directly or indirectly supervised 73 people, including 32 in Philadelphia, Statehouse records showed.

The staff members arrested Wednesday morning _ for allegedly deleting years worth of Fumo e-mail sought by the FBI _ were roused from their beds at dawn by federal agents. They appeared stunned to be the center of a media throng at the federal courthouse in Philadelphia.

Hours later, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan released a juicy FBI affidavit that focuses as much on Fumo as it does on the defendants, computer technicians Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister.

The 65-page affidavit _ atypically _ tips Meehan's hand as to the focus and breadth of the probe.

Federal authorities want to know if Fumo extorted corporate donations for a South Philadelphia nonprofit, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods _ including a $17 million gift from Peco Energy Co. They also wonder if he used the nonprofit for his political purposes.

"Normally with political corruption, they'll do all their homework, they'll have a grand jury investigation and then out will come the indictment," DeStefano said.

Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, and Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, both resigned from their longtime jobs, which paid more than $60,000 each, the Senate Clerk's Office said Thursday. But neither plans to cooperate with the Fumo probe, their lawyers said.

Their lawyers said the men had done nothing wrong, and were being used as pawns in an all-out effort to get the senator.

"I'm convinced now more than ever that the reason the government proceeded the way they did, which was highly unusual ... is so they could get their big splash with their affidavit ... and make the point they obviously want to make," lawyer James Schwartzman, who represents Luchko, said Thursday.

The affidavit also discloses some of the evidence that investigators have gathered, such as e-mail that shows Fumo growing frenzied about leaving an electronic trail.

"The FBI probe into the Sen. has really set him off he wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow. ... He wants all of the Blackberries wiped (clean of e-mail)" Luchko wrote to Fumo staffers in January 2004.

The FBI also says it has e-mail that shows Fumo directing aides to spend funds from the charity for political polling and other political ends, which could violate its nonprofit tax status.

"I would suggest that we're not finished yet," Meehan said Wednesday.

A CRUMBLING FOUNDATION? DID FUMO USE A NONPROFIT TO CEMENT HIS POLITICAL POWER? (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

WITH TWO of his aides facing federal jail time for allegedly obstructing justice and a highly detailed criminal complaint now in the public record, questions surrounding state Sen. Vince Fumo are beginning to pile up.

Don't expect answers soon, especially from the senator. Other than a slightly overwrought response from his attorney, Dick Sprague, that essentially denies wrongdoing, Fumo is staying mum.

Yet questions persist.

There's the obvious ones such as, is Fumo guilty of anything?

So far, the answer is no, though an investigation is continuing. According to the criminal complaint filed in connection with the arrests of the two Fumo aides, the FBI launched the investigation to determine if Fumo strong-armed Peco to make contributions to Citizens' Alliance, a nonprofit neighborhood organization that's done some good deeds in South Philadelphia, Fumo's political base.

Then there's the less obvious question: At what point does a politician mau-mauing a company into doing what could be argued is a public good become criminal activity?

Aren't politicians supposed to cajole private companies to do more for the communities they're in? Is that now a crime?

It could be if the feds can prove the other part of their inquiry: whether Fumo benefited politically or personally from expenditures made by Citizens' Alliance.

Here the feds may have a convincing case. Foundations, which don't pay taxes, are generally prohibited from making political contributions. Yet the FBI claims to have e-mails from Fumo that indicate he was directing Citizens' Alliance to make grants of a political nature.

Investigators say e-mails sent by Fumo in 2001 directed aides to use Alliance money to pay for programs and memorials that would help the political fortunes of allies and candidates in Pittsburgh and in Bucks County. Other e-mails indicate that Alliance money also was used to fund a lawsuit against a rival state senator and may have been used for political polling, the feds allege.

But other e-mails described by government investigators seem much less suspicious: Fumo ordering that Citizens Alliance pay for repairing a police surveillance van; another directing that money go to paying a bill for the Christopher Columbus Charter School. Isn't this what neighborhood foundations are supposed to do?

Fumo is not the first politician to face tough questions regarding foundations or nonprofits. Sen. Rick Santorum earlier this year was the target of media criticism over his Operation Good Neighbor foundation.

Which prompts this final question: Isn't it time for stricter restrictions on whether politicians should operate foundations at all?

Affidavit: Fumo Involved In Real Estate Deals (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

Information contained in a federal affidavit released Wednesday casts some doubt on state Sen. Vince Fumo's claim earlier this year that he had no role in a $310,000 real-estate deal involving electrical contractor Donald "Gus" Dougherty, whose office was raided by the FBI in January.

And Fumo may have directed a nonprofit organization's purchase of as many as two dozen properties in South Philadelphia, the affidavit suggests.

Six years ago Donald Dougherty, dubbed by some as "Electrician of the Stars" because of his work for high-powered politicians, sold a Tasker Street warehouse to Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit organization whose officers have ties to Fumo.

Spokesmen for Fumo and Citizens Alliance told the Daily News earlier this year that Fumo had nothing to do with the transaction and that Citizens Alliance made its own decisions about such matters.

But the affidavit associated with the arrest of two low-level state Senate employees Wednesday said federal prosecutors have acquired "a series of e-mail communications" in 2000 and 2001 in which Fumo directs Citizens Alliance "to purchase various properties in South Philadelphia."

The affidavit said Fumo instructed an unnamed aide "that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased" by Citizens Alliance.

"Take all of their calls as suggestions and I will give final approval," Fumo wrote in an e-mail, according to the affidavit.

Citizens Alliance paid Donald Dougherty $310,000 for the Tasker Street property in December 1999. The transaction was recorded in January 2000, property records show.

Labor leader John Dougherty - a friend of but no relation to Donald Dougherty - told the Daily News in April that Fumo had failed to pay Donald Dougherty for extensive work on Fumo's Fairmount mansion but that Fumo had been involved personally in Citizens Alliance's purchase of Dougherty's Tasker Street property.

John Dougherty said he had attended a meeting with Fumo and Donald Dougherty at which the sale was discussed.

Fumo said that he had not recalled meeting Donald Dougherty and that records showed Dougherty had done only a "small amount of work" on his house.

The exact nature of the federal investigation into Donald Dougherty isn't clear. The raid on his business was conducted by the FBI and agents from the IRS and the Labor Department.

Citizens Alliance's purchase of Donald Dougherty's warehouse was far from its only property transaction. A Daily News analysis in November showed Citizens Alliance and its seven subsidiaries bought at least 26 properties in South Philadelphia between 1998 and 2003.

Spokesman Ken Snyder said the Citizens Alliance purchases had been part of an effort to spark neighborhood revitalization.

The two state Senate aides charged with obstruction of justice, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, resigned their posts Tuesday, the day before their arrests, Senate officials said yesterday.

According to Senate rules, employees charged with crimes related to their jobs or the allocation of public funds are immediately suspended without pay.

They're fired if they are found guilty, and reinstated with back pay if the charges are dropped or they are acquitted.

Affidavit Offers Details On Fumo Investigation (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

On Wednesday, the long-running investigation into State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo finally went public.

With the arrests of two low-level computer techs and the release of a 65-page arrest affidavit filled with e-mails and other evidence, federal authorities demystified much of their probe.

In page after page of e-mails from his employees and a few from Fumo himself, they laid out a case that Fumo had ordered a campaign to wipe e-mails from office and home computers - an attempt, the government alleges, to thwart the FBI.

Fumo, 63, the powerful South Philadelphia Democrat, has not been charged with wrongdoing. Three years into the investigation, it's clear authorities aren't finished yet.

The affidavit contained many new details about what the FBI and prosecutors have been pursuing for so long. Here's a probe primer:

What happened on Wednesday?

The aides, Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, were charged with obstructing justice by, in the FBI's words, "systematically" wiping clean BlackBerrys, servers and computers used by Fumo and his staff.

Who are these guys?

Until Wednesday, they were obscure computer experts - two of 29 employees supervised by Fumo to run the information network for Senate Democrats. Their lawyers say they did nothing wrong.

Luchko lives with his elderly mother in Collingdale, Delaware County. When arrested, Eister, of suburban Harrisburg, refused to submit to a urine test, telling federal investigators he had smoked pot the night before. His own attorney called him "a computer nerd."

If the techies wiped computer evidence, how did authorities recover anything?

According to prosecutors, the two didn't follow their own policies: they failed to destroy e-mails from their own computers. Their e-mails, quoted at length in the affidavit, refer repeatedly to the FBI investigation and to Fumo's demands for deletions.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off... He wants all of the BlackBerries wiped," Luchko wrote in 2004.

Isn't Fumo the focus of the probe?

Yes, and he remains so. Experienced criminal defense lawyers say prosecutors are playing hardball in hopes of turning the two aides against their boss, Fumo. The 6 a.m. arrests at their homes, the handcuffs, the possible maximum five-year prison sentences, the affidavit larded with evidence - all are said to be part of the strategy to apply pressure to the pair, to try to build a stronger case.

Have other techies talked?

Yes. If prosecutors succeed in "flipping" the pair, they will join a third computer technician, Donald Wilson, who has already been given immunity.

Wilson told a grand jury that Fumo gave his blessing to the deletions, the affidavit claims. However, the document provides few details on Wilson's testimony.

Wilson worked with Luchko in Fumo's Philadelphia legislative office. Eister worked in Harrisburg.

What has Fumo said about the arrests?

He's not talking, but his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, the well-known Philadelphia lawyer, said the feds have a vendetta against Fumo. Sprague's statement also hinted at a possible defense: The deletions were part of a preexisting document-destruction policy.

When did the probe start?

The FBI, IRS and federal prosecutors began by looking into Fumo's ties to a series of nonprofits about three years ago. After concluding they were being stonewalled, they launched a parallel obstruction-of-justice investigation.

Why did they suspect a cover-up?

Authorities said they found it suspicious that very few e-mails were given them in response to their initial subpoenas, even though boxes of evidence were turned over.

What were they investigating in the first place?

In Wednesday's affidavit, the FBI disclosed it was investigating whether Fumo "engaged in extortion" in seeking money for a nonprofit from two corporations, Peco Energy and Verizon Communications.

Verizon balked, but Peco gave $17 million to Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods under secret deals in which Fumo dropped his opposition to the electric giant's business plans.

The company struck the deals with Fumo in 1998 and 2000, but they remained secret until The Inquirer made them public in 2003. The FBI then began investigating those donations.

DOJ_NMG_0031297

The newspaper also disclosed that Citizens' Alliance got another $10 million from a special fund created at Fumo's urging by the Delaware River Port Authority.

Are the donations the only issue?

No. The FBI also is looking at whether Fumo got any personal or political help from Citizens' Alliance, a nonprofit organization formed in 1991 by Fumo allies.

Nonprofits are barred by law from providing benefits to individual citizens and from engaging in partisan politics.

As has been previously reported, the nonprofit spent $215,000 on political polling - and later was reimbursed by a Fumo political action committee after the FBI began poking around.

Citizens' Alliance also spent $17,000 to secretly finance a lawsuit seeking to unseat a political foe of Fumo's from the state Senate.

In one e-mail quoted in the affidavit, Fumo balked at a proposal to hire a new manager for Citizens' Alliance.

That could be trouble, Fumo said, in an e-mail marked: "CONFIDENTIALLY (only because I trust you)... "

If a manager was hired, "and we tried to do some of the things that are political that we do, we would now have someone else 'in our tent' and we would be subject to his blackmail," he wrote.

What's Fumo's role in the nonprofit?

He holds no official position, but authorities cited numerous e-mails to contend he is the one calling the shots.

Among other decisions, he ordered Citizens' Alliance to pay for an unspecified program in Pittsburgh and a memorial in Bucks County, steps that boosted unidentified political allies, authorities have said.

In other e-mails, the government said, Fumo instructed the nonprofit to buy various properties, informing an aide that he alone will decide such purchases.

What has Fumo said about Citizens' Alliance?

He has pointed out it has done a lot of good things - among them, shoveling snow, cleaning streets, supporting a charter school, and gentrifying the Passyunk Avenue business district in South Philadelphia.

Have any other nonprofits been scrutinized?

Yes. Investigators have subpoenaed records from a series of nonprofits backed by Fumo. Notably, agents have explored Fumo's cruises on luxury yachts owned by the Independence Seaport Museum.

Fumo is a board member and has arranged for state funding for the museum at Penn's Landing. He belatedly reimbursed the museum for one yacht trip.

What's next?

Ruth Arnao, the director of Citizens' Alliance and a former Fumo aide, received a "target" letter from the government several months ago. Such letters are normally a precursor to criminal charges. In court, prosecutors have already said they believe Arnao, too, helped destroy computer documents.

What's the connection between Arnao and Fumo?

How's Fumo bearing up?

He's publicly confident. In March, he told a luncheon crowd in Harrisburg that he had "no fears" and that the probe would "go nowhere."

Privately, he's been anxious. In 2004, Fumo sent an e-mail to a political consultant railing at his inability to get inside dope on the FBI's activities. "You know how serious and almost life threatening this is," the senator wrote.

Fumo Will Keep Power, Experts Say (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 2, 2006

ANALYSIS

HARRISBURG -- Officially, Vince Fumo is the third-ranking leader of the state Senate's virtually powerless minority party.

Unofficially, the Philadelphia Democrat is one of Harrisburg's most influential politicians.

Dubbed by some "Prince Vince," Mr. Fumo is unlikely to be shaken off his throne anytime soon, insiders say, despite an FBI investigation into whether he extorted contributions to a Philadelphia charity that were later used to benefit him personally and politically.

Two computer technicians in the senator's office were charged Wednesday with obstructing justice by purging government computers of all traces of e-mail messages thought to be pertinent to the investigation.

The U.S. Department of Justice says more charges and more arrests are possible, but insiders and pundits predict Mr. Fumo will emerge unscathed.

"I'd be the last person to write him off," said Christopher Borick, associate professor of political science at Muhlenberg College in Allentown. "He's a true political survivor."

He will do more than survive, Dr. Borick predicted. He will continue to shape public policy through upfront demands, back-door deals and top-down pressure.

"There's formal power and then there's informal power. Formal power comes with your title, but informal power is based on the power to persuade. Some people just have that innately," Dr. Borick said.

Count Mr. Fumo among them.

He's a member of the minority party, yet he's a power broker.

He has been able to make a career out of leveraging that informal power, Dr. Borick said.

That is obvious to Marc Stier, too. Dr. Stier, a political scientist and director of the Intellectual Heritage Program at Temple University, also is an activist who frequently calls upon lawmakers.

"I call some senators and say, 'Would you sponsor this bill?' and they say, 'Have you talked to Vince yet? I'm not going to support it unless Fumo supports it. Run it by Vince and if it's OK with him then that would be fine,'" Dr. Stier said.

Fellow senators might dispute the notion that they take orders from him, but they are certainly swayed by his arguments, said Thomas Baldino, professor of social science and communications at Wilkes College in Wilkes-Barre.

The rank-and-file defer to Mr. Fumo because, they say, he is smart, bold, outspoken and thoughtful.

It doesn't hurt that he controls a big pot of money, either. As minority appropriations chairman he has a big say in where state dollars go.

"They divvy up the money and they have to keep people satisfied, but they don't have to keep everyone satisfied. They can cut people out, and senators know that," Dr. Stier said.

Mr. Fumo's intelligence, personality, persistence and tenacity allow him to get things done, supporters say.

Mr. Fumo was the driving force behind legislation that legalized slots casinos in Pennsylvania. Passage required a decade of talks aimed at securing support from the Republican majority, which had religious and philosophical qualms about gambling.

Even political adversaries acknowledge his ability to attract loyal followers and to lead them wherever he wants.

"What Fumo wants, Fumo gets. He has a total network of folks who are loyal to him because he is loyal to them," said Philadelphian Anne Dicker, who last month ran for state House against Fumo ally Terry Graboyes. Both lost to Michael O'Brien.

In some circles, Mr. Fumo is better known for quashing candidacies and projects he doesn't like than for rounding up support for new initiatives. In the late 1990s, for example, he helped thwart the Phillies' plans to build a new ballpark eight blocks from his house.

An anti-gun-control Democrat, Mr. Fumo also supported legislation that prevented Philadelphia from enacting local gun-control laws.

"He's actually more of an obstructionist than a constructionist and he's done very well at it," said Larry Ceisler, a Philadelphia public relations executive who has worked on campaigns with Mr. Fumo, but now is aligned with a rival Democratic faction in Philadelphia.

"The time I've worked with him has been the most fun I've ever had in politics. He knows how to get things done and he's a really smart guy who can see around the curves," Mr. Ceisler said.

The FBI investigation is focused on the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods and whether the charity spent donated funds to benefit Mr. Fumo personally and politically.

Despite the computer purges, the FBI was able to retrieve several key messages that, an affidavit says, show charity money was spent on political polls and on programs that would help garner support for politicians Mr. Fumo backed. In one case, according to court documents, the senator directed an aide to use the charity's funds to buy Philadelphia a new police surveillance van and then make it look as if the vehicle had been donated by a public official who needed good publicity.

The trick now for Mr. Fumo will be avoiding the legal traps being laid out by federal investigators who arrested the two Fumo staffers Wednesday. Attorneys for the men say the arrests were an FBI tactic to get the staffers to cooperate in the investigation. Instead, the men plan to fight the charges and remain loyal to Mr. Fumo, their lawyers told reporters.

With that kind of loyalty, "Vince the Prince" could well keep his place in the castle that is the state Capitol.

FBI Raids Official's Home, Office (WP)

By V. Dion Haynes And Valerie Strauss

Investigation Targets Use of Funds for Charter Programs

The FBI raided the office and home of the D.C. school board's executive director of charter schools yesterday as part of an investigation into the possible misuse of hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal and city funds, school board officials and law enforcement sources said.

Investigators are focusing on the charter school office, which is responsible for overseeing 17 of the city's 51 charter schools. Brenda L. Belton, a school board employee, is the office's executive director.

The other charter schools are overseen by the D.C. Public Charter School Board, which was not involved in the investigation.

School sources, who asked not to be identified because the investigation is continuing, said authorities also are looking into whether some firms hired by the charter school office were connected to Belton. The sources said that the FBI search of the office began about 7 a.m. and continued for six hours and that numerous boxes of documents were confiscated.

Last night, Belton's attorney, Danny Onorato, said that Belton had done nothing wrong.

"She adamantly denies any wrongdoing," he said, adding that Belton would have no further comment.

Belton, reached earlier yesterday on her cellphone, said she was unaware that search warrants had been executed at her office and home.

"I wasn't there. I was in a training all day," she said.

The investigation of the city's charter school office dates to January, said Peggy Cooper Cafritz, president of the D.C. Board of Education. She said that members of the board agreed then to have an audit conducted of hundreds of thousands of dollars that had been designated for the charter schools.

The audit was not prompted by any particular concerns, said Carolyn N. Graham, vice president of the school board.

"This office has never been audited," Graham said last night. "We decided all our operations have to be audited annually."

Cafritz said the board stopped its audit when the D.C. inspector general's office began to investigate the charter schools office in March.

Investigators from the inspector general's office seized Belton's computer that month, sources said yesterday. Deputy Inspector General Austin A. Andersen confirmed the investigation Tuesday.

Belton said yesterday that she was unaware of the inspector general's investigation, but Cafritz said Belton "definitely knew" of it.

"Everyone involved -- employees and board members -- knew about the investigation being conducted by the IG's office," Cafritz said.

D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3), who chairs the education committee, has raised concerns in recent months about how funds for the board's charter schools are managed.

In an April report, Patterson questioned a budget proposal submitted by the charter school office. She said the proposal lacked detail and a plan on how services would be provided. "The committee remains seriously concerned about the current management and operations of that office," she wrote.

In early May, Patterson wrote Cafritz a letter detailing her concerns with several contractors hired by the office. In particular, she questioned whether the school board had awarded contracts totaling about $32,000 to a company called Equal Access in Education without competitive bidding. The company was hired to monitor charter schools.

Patterson also questioned why Belton was reimbursed $1,100 for refreshments at meetings and why charter school leaders in August were paid $513 for an "executive program for strategic management."

Judge Allows Evidence In Pellicano Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, June 1, 2006, 10:53 Pm Edt

Long Island Newsday, June 2, 2006

FBI agents raided Anthony Pellicano's offices in 2002 and found illegal explosives. Authorities were investigating whether Pellicano hired a man to threaten a Los Angeles Times reporter working on a story about actor Steven Seagal and his possible links to the Mafia.

Pellicano's attorney Steven Gruel challenged the legality of the search, saying the raids amounted to a fishing expedition. FBI agents seized computers and numerous digital audio tapes that led to a 112-count indictment unsealed in February against Pellicano.

Fourteen people have been charged in the government's wiretapping case. Six have pleaded guilty. Federal prosecutors say Pellicano used wiretaps, threats and blackmail to help lawyers and their clients win high-stakes legal disputes.

Judge Dale S. Fischer on May 22 concurred with an earlier ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found the search was valid. The judge's decision was made public Thursday.

"There is no authority to suggest that officers seeking a search warrant must describe all of the crimes they believe the subject of the warrant may have committed or all of the things they hope to find," Fischer wrote. "So long as the warrant is valid and properly executed, the search is lawful."

However, the judge said her decision doesn't preclude Pellicano from requesting a hearing at which Gruel could call FBI agents to determine if there were any misrepresentations made with the search warrants.

"I'm encouraged and enthused by her decision," Gruel said. "She has clearly indicated in written form that if we can show there are falsehoods. She is going to look at this seriously."

Fischer found no grounds to support Gruel's assertion that agents had violated Pellicano's attorney-client privilege by enlisting his ex-girlfriend to extract information.

Pellicano claimed the government used Sandra Carradine, former wife of actor Keith Carradine, to gather a "fountain of information" about his legal strategy during jail visits last year.

Sandra Wil Carradine pleaded guilty to two counts of perjury and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 25. She admitted in January that she lied to a grand jury about her knowledge that Pellicano had wiretapped the home of Keith Carradine during a child support dispute.

Pellicano, 62, has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial on charges of wiretapping such stars as Sylvester Stallone and paying two police officers to run names, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through a government database.

Pellicano served a 2 1/2-year sentence on charges related to the explosives.

United Response To Gangs Sought (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

COLUMBIA, Md. -- Federal, state and local officials who participated in the Maryland Gang Summit yesterday agreed that cooperation is key for fighting the increasing number of criminal gangs in the state.

Gaithersburg Police Detective Patrick Word said yesterday that there are currently about 10,000 gang members in Maryland. The gangs that exist in Maryland include the Bloods/United Blood Nation, Black Guerilla Family, Mara Salvatrucha or MS-13, Tiny Rascal Gangsters, Street Thug Criminals, Hells Angels, Vatos Loco, Pagans and South Side Locos, he said.

"We knew the gang problem was in every single county of Maryland," U.S. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski told participants.

"They're violent. They're predatory. ... A rise in massive, almost ghoulish behavior of gangs," said Miss Mikulski, Maryland Democrat who secured $2 million in federal funds for the creation of a statewide anti-gang initiative. "That's what today is all about. This is the beginning conversation. We have to protect our people."

More than 300 people attended the day-long summit at the Sheraton Hotel. Participants included Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, sheriffs, federal and state prosecutors, police, mayors, community officials and non-profit organizations.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, announced the creation of a gang coordination committee that will establish a statewide database of gang activity.

While gang violence is a growing problem, there is a window of opportunity to act before it becomes a major problem, Mr. Ehrlich said, outlining four major goals for dealing with the problem.

He said he wanted to avoid turf battles between law-enforcement agencies, identify active gangs in the state, ensure enforcement tools are available and provide early intervention to disrupt recruiting of young members.

"The first goal is no turf battles [among law-enforcement units and communities]," Mr. Ehrlich said. "In some cases, the lack of team effort results in failed goals."

Mr. Ehrlich said that Maryland State Police has a lead role in fighting gang membership increases. There are 400 officers trained to deal with gangs and 400 more are being trained. About $4.6 million are allotted to juvenile services to deter youths from joining gangs, $500,000 in other grants, and $500,000 to the Safe Neighborhood Program.

Officials also called for the ability of police and prosecutors to enter areas where gangs are known to exist and work with residents and encourage them to call authorities with tips.

"Enforcement is a key," said Rod J. Rosenstein, U.S. Attorney for the District of Maryland, explaining that investigations should focus on where gangs are organized, mostly in schools.

"Education and parents are the best guides for [keeping] children away from gang temptations," he said.

Detective Word said that residents should notify and cooperate with authorities investigating crimes by youths, even if the crimes don't appear to be gang-related. The information often will be linked to a gang member, he said.

Frank Clark, with the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services, said parents must be educated about gangs. "Kids are at risk because gangs are glamorized," he said. "We have to educate parents."

Prosecution of gangs has increased, said Assistant U.S. Attorney James M. Trusty. "In a perverse way, it almost has the effect of glamorizing gangs," he said.

Kate Garvey, chief of Montgomery County's Department of Children, Youth, and Family Services, and Officer Rob Musser said the county has 28 street gangs, 922 members, 50 percent are of mixed races, 28 percent are black and 22 percent are Hispanic.

Montgomery and Prince George's counties offer tattoo removal to encourage youths to get out of gangs.

"We're behind the eight-ball," Prince George's County Police Sgt. George Norris said. "We probably should have been looking at gangs 10 years ago. ... A lot of kids join gangs because they have no family. Somehow or other, we've got to get parents more involved with their kids."

Broad Gang Presence Requires Parents' Vigilance, Officials Say (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Criminal gangs are operating across Maryland at a level many in the state do not recognize or are unwilling to admit, participants in what was billed as the first Maryland gang summit warned yesterday.

At the Columbia summit, speakers -- who included police detectives, state and federal prosecutors, politicians and representatives of community groups -- described an insidious problem and said law enforcement is often not the solution. The battle to keep young people out of gangs is being fought inside schools and homes, they said, with teachers, parents and social workers on the front line.

"We've lost the battle if we wait until the kids have already joined the gangs," said Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), who called for more after-school and mentoring programs for youths.

Maryland, with its broad socioeconomic and ethnic mix, has become a "microcosm of gang activity," according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Trusty. "We really have every type of gang activity," added Trusty, gang coordinator for the U.S. attorney's office for Maryland. "Our schools and businesses are increasingly in the line of fire."

The problem drew broad attention in Montgomery County last summer when, on a single day in August, gang fights led to the stabbing of two summer school students at a Silver Spring high school and to a melee at a Wheaton shopping center that left four teenagers wounded. Later that month, 19 Mara Salvatrucha members were indicted on federal racketeering charges.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), calling for an end to "turf battles" among law enforcement agencies, announced the formation of a coordinating committee that will create a statewide database on gangs.

Those who specialize in gangs acknowledged that they are struggling to keep up with the proliferation of gang crime, and they said many parents are not willing to recognize that their children are involved.

At one panel discussion, Sgt. George Norris, supervisor of the gang unit for Prince George's County police, warned colleagues not to wait to address the problem. "We probably should have started looking at gangs 10 years ago, because right now we are severely behind the eight ball," he said.

Trusty said, "Our best efforts are not going to eradicate gangs in Maryland."

Gaithersburg Detective Patrick Word, president of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network, put the number of gang members in Maryland at 10,000, but he and other speakers said there inevitably are many others of whom police are unaware.

More gangs in the area are identifying themselves as Bloods or Crips, which are violent Los Angeles-based gangs, law enforcement officials said.

Word described the Bloods as "the biggest threat" in the state. Other major gangs in Maryland include the Black Guerrilla Family; MS-13, or Mara Salvatrucha, a Latino gang; and Tiny Rascal Gangsters, a Southeast Asian gang. Among motorcycle gangs, Hells Angels has established itself in Southern Maryland, which was previously considered the territory of the Pagan motorcycle gang. Police also said that the Vatos Locos, South Side Locos and Street Thug Criminals are serious gang threats.

"It's no longer like West Side Story, where people run around singing . . . 'Maria,' " said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), one of the organizers of the summit.

Mikulski recently obtained $2 million in federal funds for a statewide anti-gang initiative, and Ehrlich said the state had $300,000 in grants to combat gangs.

Capt. Lennard Johnson of the Maryland Division of Corrections said 1,900 confirmed gang members are in the prison system. "For every one we've validated, there are probably two or three we don't know about," he said.

Summit Elevates Anti-gang Initiatives (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan

The Baltimore Sun, June 2, 2006

MS-13, the target of a major federal indictment in Maryland last summer, isn't the state's biggest gang problem. The Bloods are.

That is the conclusion reached by the state's leading gang investigators, who presented their latest findings Thursday at a summit in Columbia of 300 law enforcement officers, political leaders and educators.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador and received national attention in recent years for its rapid spread and violence.

Federal prosecutors charged 19 alleged MS-13 members from Southern Maryland in August.

DOJ_NMG_0031303

Experts said Thursday that it is still the Bloods, who crop up on street corners in Baltimore, in schools in Harford County and in prisons throughout the state, who have the greatest reach.

"They're the outside influence here," said Maj. David Engel, the chief of the Baltimore Police Department's criminal intelligence unit.

The daylong conference, funded by a $2 million federal grant to the Maryland U.S. attorney's office, sought to promote local and federal efforts to prevent young people from joining gangs, to encourage current members to quit, and to lock up their leaders.

Gang violence in the region has grown, but officials acknowledge that some police chiefs and political figures were, until recently, loath to say there was a crisis ahead.

"We know that we have a gang problem in every county of Maryland," Democratic U.S. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski said.

Her comments were echoed by U.S. Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, a Baltimore Democrat, U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein and Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who called for greater cooperation.

"The first goal is no turf battles," the governor told participants, adding that the effort to combat gangs should transcend partisan differences and bureaucratic wrangling.

Ehrlich announced $300,000 in state funding for new anti-gang efforts in Maryland. The federal government, through Project Safe Neighborhoods, will kick in $500,000 for Baltimore City and Montgomery, Prince George's, Wicomico and Baltimore counties, Rosenstein said.

Detective Patrick Word, a Gaithersburg police officer and vice chairman of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network, said authorities have identified at least 100 gangs in the state.

The sizes range, Word said, from gangs of just three people to those that claim more than 100 members.

In Baltimore, gangs were once known somewhat benignly as "street crews" who limited their activity to drug dealing on a particular cross street. In state prisons, they are still known clinically as "security threat groups."

Word said they should all be known as gangs. And every law broken by their members -- from running a red light to beating their wives to committing murder -- should be duly recorded by law enforcement as gang activity.

Experts stressed that intelligence show an ever-changing picture of gang activity in Maryland. National gangs have arrived in large numbers in Baltimore only in the past 10 months, Engel said.

Between 1999 and 2005, the city had a single Bloods and Crips set. Today, Engel said, there are 14 Bloods and five Crips sets.

Detective Scott Yosua of the Harford County Sheriff's Office explained that he had to eat his words after he told a local newspaper that the gang problem in his county was so limited that most residents would never notice.

"I was proved to be wrong," he said.

His mind changed, he said, after the 2004 shooting death of a 37-year-old father of nine. Wayne Lavon Bond Jr., who prosecutors said was a Bloods recruit, was found guilty of first-degree murder and received 45 years in prison.

Yosua said authorities have now documented 140 Bloods members in the county, though some may no longer be active.

Not to say that gang experts will ignore MS-13 members in Maryland, officials said.

Mara refers to a gang, while Salva is an abbreviation for Salvadoran. Trucha is slang for "fear us," according to federal authorities. An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the United States, many in the Washington suburbs, which has a large population of Central American immigrants.

Authorities are also tracking other trends, like a new outpost of the Hell's Angels motorcycle gang in Baltimore. Until recently, Word said, it was their rivals the Pagans who were thought to hold the greatest sway in Maryland.

Many Thursday called for the increased coordination among anti-gang law enforcement agents in the state and better links to the work on the national level.

Word added that Maryland should pass a state racketeering law to mirror the one in the federal system known as RICO.

The RICO statutes have enabled prosecutors to hold gang members responsible for their crimes and seek hefty prison sentences, as well as seize their assets, according to Word.

Judging Whether A Killer Is Sane Enough To Die (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal And Adam Liptak

HOUSTON, June 1 — Scott Panetti, a death row inmate in Texas, understands that the state says it intends to execute him for the murder of his wife's parents.

But Mr. Panetti, 48, who represented himself in court despite a long and colorful history of mental illness, says he believes that the state's real reason is a different one. He says the state, in league with Satan, wants to kill him to keep him from preaching the Gospel.

That delusion has been documented by doctors and acknowledged by judges and prosecutors. It poses what experts call the next big question in death penalty law now that the Supreme Court has barred the execution of juvenile offenders and the mentally retarded: what makes someone too mentally ill to be executed?

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, recently said Mr. Panetti was sane enough to die. The full court will soon decide whether to hear the case.

Mr. Panetti, in prison now almost 14 years for the killings in 1992 in the quaint Hill Country city of Fredericksburg, has long seemed to exemplify madness, addressing himself to the jury in his trial in 1995 as "the born-again April Fool," a schizophrenic healed by God.

In and out of mental institutions 14 times and addicted to drugs and alcohol since he almost drowned as a child and was nearly electrocuted by a power line, Mr. Panetti wore cowboy costumes to court, delivered rambling monologues, put himself on the witness stand and sought to subpoena the pope, Jesus and John F. Kennedy.

Jurors were clearly alienated and took little more than an hour to reject his insanity defense.

They found that Mr. Panetti knew right from wrong and so deserved the death penalty. That is a separate question from whether his mental illness should bar his execution.

Two decades ago, the United States Supreme Court in Ford v. Wainwright ruled that the Eighth Amendment prohibited the execution of the insane. Since then, lower courts have struggled to find a way to apply that principle in practice.

The state and federal courts that have heard Mr. Panetti's case have said that a bare awareness of the fact of impending execution and the stated reason for it is enough.

"In Texas," said Greg Wiercioch, a lawyer with the Texas Defender Service who has consulted with Mr. Panetti's defense, "if you cast a shadow on a sunny day, you're competent to be executed."

Other courts require more. Relying on a concurring opinion in the Supreme Court decision, they say the inmate actually has to perceive the connection between the crime and the punishment.

The three-judge panel in Mr. Panetti's case acknowledged that he was mentally ill with what has been diagnosed as schizoaffective disorder and that he thus might lack a rational understanding of his fate. But the panel nonetheless ruled that he was competent to be executed because he was able to understand the stated basis for his execution.

His new lawyers dispute that.

"He completely scoffs at the notion that it's the State of Texas trying to execute him," said Keith Hampton, a lawyer from Austin who filed the latest appeal with a co-counsel, Michael C. Gross of San Antonio. "He thinks it's the demons and evil ones."

Legal and medical experts estimate that hundreds of people with schizophrenia and other severe mental illnesses are on death rows around the nation.

Courts have spared the lives of seven inmates based on the 1986 decision, the Texas Defender Service said.

David R. Dow, a law professor at the University of Houston who has met more than 75 death row inmates, visited Mr. Panetti at his lawyers' request. "Of all the people I have met on death row, he's the gold-medal-crazy winner," Professor Dow said.

On Sept. 8, 1992, Mr. Panetti broke into the home of his in-laws, Joe and Amanda Alvarado, and shot them to death in front of his estranged second wife, Sonja, and his 3-year-old daughter, Amanda, known as Birdie.

Taking on his defense, and calling himself as a witness, he argued that he had been taken over by an alter ego he called Sarge Ironhorse.

"Sarge boom boom," Mr. Panetti testified. "Sarge is gone. No more Sarge. Sonja and Birdie. Joe, Amanda lying kitchen, here, there blood. No, leave. Scott, remember exactly what Sarge did. Shot the lock. Walked in the kitchen. Sonja, where's Birdie? Sonja here."

Prosecutors, their medical experts and the courts agreed that Mr. Panetti suffers from mental illness. Judge Sam Sparks of Federal District Court in Austin found in 2004 that Mr. Panetti's illness was characterized by "grandiosity and a delusional belief system in which he believes himself to be persecuted for his religious activities and beliefs."

Judge Sparks said that was not enough to spare Mr. Panetti.

Others agree.

Robert Blecker, a law professor at the New York Law School and a cautious supporter of the death penalty, said Mr. Panetti's execution could serve the goal of retribution.

"He knows what he did," Professor Blecker said. "He knows what the state is about to do to him, and why. For the retributivist, the past counts. It counts for us, and for us to be retributively satisfied, it must also count for him."

Prosecutors made the same point in a brief to the Fifth Circuit last year.

"All that is required to avoid the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is that the petitioner factually understand the reason for this punishment," the prosecutors wrote.

Executions of inmates who exhibited signs of madness are not unusual. In 1992, Arkansas executed Ricky Ray Rector not long after he put aside the dessert of his last meal to eat later.

In March, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, Va., split, 7 to 6, over whether Percy L. Walton could be executed, notwithstanding his delusional belief that after his death he would "come back as a better person" and "get a Burger King." A majority said this was proof that Mr. Walton understood he would be executed.

"That a person believes that he will have an 'afterlife,' however strange his views of that 'afterlife' may be," Judge Dennis W. Shedd wrote, "necessarily suggests he believes his existing life will end."

The laws of most states, based on English common law, have long banned the execution of the insane.

"The reasons for the rule are less sure and less uniform than the rule itself," Justice Thurgood Marshall wrote in the 1986 case.

Some judges say the "miserable spectacle" of such executions simply offends humanity. Others say retribution is not served by executing someone who cannot understand why he is being put to death. Still others point to the inability of the in sane to assist their lawyers in last-minute litigation. In the Middle Ages, it was thought that madness was its own punishment.

Mr. Hampton, who filed the latest appeals brief, said that from the trial on he was revolted by the Panetti case.

"I thought there was no way, no way, no matter how bad things in the state of Texas got, that it would allow someone in the full flower of schizophrenia to represent himself," he said.

But in repeatedly calling himself insane — "I went nuts," Mr. Panetti told the police officers after the killings, "well, I am nuts" — Mr. Panetti seemed to have run into his own Catch-22, leaving jurors skeptical of anyone so eager to establish his insanity.

Now the courts, taking one last look at Mr. Panetti, must decide whether he is sane enough to die.

Two Sex Offenders Charged With Possessing Child Porn (NSDY/AP)

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) _ Two registered sex offenders have been arrested for allegedly possessing child pornography, federal authorities said Thursday.

Jeffrey Frazier, 40 of North Tonawanda, who was sentenced to 60 days in prison after being convicted in 2003 of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child, was charged following a visit to his home by probation officers.

Frazier admitted that he sent, received and possessed child pornography using five e-mail addresses on his home computer, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia.

He would face between 10 and 40 years in prison if convicted.

Timothy Brenon, 56, of North Tonawanda, was charged with possessing child pornography four years after his conviction on a charge of possessing a sexual performance by a child, for which he received five years probation.

DOJ_NMG_0031306

He admitted to North Tonawanda police that he possessed porn, including images of young children, Gioia said. He could be sentenced to at least 10 years if convicted.

FBI Discovers 117 Images Of Minors On Two Computers (MIDPRESS)

By Matthew Engelhardt, Press Staff

Middletown (CT) Press, June 2, 2006

DURHAM - Following a federal investigation, a local man plead guilty on Wednesday to possession of child pornography.

Richard Wertheim, 60, of 41 Lexington Place South in Durham waived indictment in U.S. District in Hartford. According to Thomas Carson, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor, Wertheim could face 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000.

According to documents filed with the court and statements made at the hearing, Wertheim participated in "peer-to-peer" file sharing with other Internet users. The applications allowed the users to share access to electronic data files, which contained visual images, music, text and videos.

Wertheim has an Old Saybrook residence in addition to his home in Durham. On May 6, federal agents searched both of his homes and seized two different personal computers.

According to Carson, Wertheim had been under investigation by the Department of Homeland Security, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Forensic evidence revealed a large amount of child pornography on both of Wertheim's personal computers.

According to Carson, the analysis revealed 117 images and videos. The images included several that involved prepubescent minors.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney John Marrella. He was unavailable to comment on the proceedings.

Estimates Of Copyright Piracy Losses Vary Widely (WSJ)

By Geoffrey A. Fowler

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The plastic in a blank CD or DVD costs less than a quarter. Putting a price on a disc loaded with content is more difficult.

When the music industry finds a CD that has been ripped off by copyright pirates, it says it is worth between $1 and $5. Hollywood says a pirate disc can be worth between nothing and the full retail price of around $25. The software industry sometimes weighs in at more than $200 per counterfeit disc.

Why is there such a wide range in the estimates? Counting the losses from piracy isn't a science -- it's an art. Police in developing countries like China may count pirated goods at their street value, but companies and industry associations have different, often political, goals behind their counting systems. Now the growing problem of Internet piracy is making gauging losses even harder, and more controversial.

"We can confidently say we will never know 100% the exact loss. There are several sciences, and none of them work entirely satisfactorily," says Keith Jopling, the director of strategic analysis and research for the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, the main music industry trade group.

Police data and surveys can provide estimates of the number of DVDs sold in street pirate markets, and the numbers of songs and programs downloaded off the Internet. But the music, movie and software industries -- which have been hammered by piracy in many developing countries -- face a more vexing problem of reckoning their losses.

Somebody who buys a pirated disc at a steep discount isn't necessarily a lost customer for a full-priced product. In many poor countries, a customer who buys a CD for $1 could never afford to pay $16.95 for a legitimate copy. In countries such as China and Vietnam, many legitimate film titles aren't even allowed on store shelves because of government quotas and censorship standards. Moreover, music industry surveys have found that in some developed markets, 10% to 15% of consumers actually spend more money on legitimate music when they're also downloading songs illegally.

So is a pirated disc really a loss?

Over the past two years, the Motion Picture Association of America has spent $3 million to figure that out. The answer it arrived at -- that Hollywood studios alone lose $6.1 billion world-wide -- was so high that some Tinseltown executives didn't want the figures made public.

Behind the movie studios' backstage catfight about the figures was a dramatically new system for counting the value of a pirated disc. The new method involved asking consumers about their piracy habits directly.

In telephone, Internet and focus group polls developed by consultant L.E.K. Group, the MPAA asked consumers how often they buy pirated discs and download pirated movies, as well as whether they would have bought the film legitimately had the pirated version not been available. By that approach, not every pirated disc equates to lost revenue.

But the new method has a big problem. People lie in surveys, especially folks who like to pirate movies. The MPAA spent months revising their figures down.

To be sure, legitimate companies want and need to know how much they're losing, as the piracy problem grows. But accurate assessments may be influenced by competing demands. Hefty piracy loss figures can serve the interests of movie, music and software industry organizations, all of which lobby governments for tougher intellectual property laws and enforcement. On the other hand, member companies of these organizations often don't want investors to be spooked by figures that suggest their piracy problems are scaling out of control.

The computer software industry, represented by the Business Software Alliance, has taken a simpler approach than the movie industry, and come up with a much bigger number. According to a study it released in May, there were $34 billion in global PC software piracy losses in 2005. The alliance hired analysts at the International Data Group's IDC to calculate losses based on the total value of software installed on computers around the world minus the total legitimate sales of software. That way, the industry doesn't have to track pirated discs or files swapped online. The big loss figure it comes up with helps push governments to sign treaties to ensure that businesses aren't using pirated software on computers.

The software industry's figures assume that pirated software is worth the same as full-price commercial software. Many software users in the developing world say they can't afford to substitute in a full-priced copy of Microsoft Office, even if Microsoft already discounts the product for developing markets.

However, the BSA's Asia regional director, Jeff Hardee, says the group's studies show nearly a one-to-one ratio between decreases in piracy and increases in legitimate sales, suggesting that, on average, people are willing to "replace" pirate software with the real thing.

The music industry has long taken a more limited approach to its piracy assessments. Instead, the IFPI estimates that the world-wide commercial disc market is worth $4.6 billion to the pirates themselves, at pirate prices, which range from $1 to $5 per CD. The IFPI uses police data, surveys and legitimate disc sales to estimate the number of pirate discs in the market.

That approach avoids counting customers of cheap pirate products the same as legitimate customers, but assigns a very low value to the music on CDs. It also leaves a hole in accounting for losses from songs swapped for free over the Internet. The IFPI says it knows there are 885 million "infringing" songs available for download at any one time, but doesn't know how much they're worth.

In recent months the IFPI has been sorting through surveys in a handful of markets that try to count Internet losses, many involving direct consumer interviews about substitution habits like the MPAA survey. Record companies are currently reviewing the findings from those surveys, and the results could be released with the group's annual piracy report later this month.

Detroit News, June 2, 2006

Second inquiry cited against ex-prosecutor, awaiting trial over his terror case prosecution.

Former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of at least one other case in addition to the terrorism case for which he was indicted, one of Convertino's lawyers has alleged in a court filing.

Lawyer Jeffrey Del Fuoco said in a motion recently filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that Convertino is under investigation for possible criminal conduct in his handling of a 1998 drug case involving Joseph Stines.

Stines, who was convicted of running a cocaine ring around Ypsilanti, has alleged misconduct by Convertino. Stines' lawyer, Carole Stanyar, has filed a motion seeking his release from prison.

"It has been learned that Mr. Stines' baseless allegations are now the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation into Mr. Convertino's conduct," Del Fuoco says in a motion filed May 26.

In the motion, Del Fuoco argues that Convertino should be allowed to intervene in the Stines case to protect his interests. If his request is granted, Convertino will be able to introduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses.

Both parties involved, Stines and the U.S. government, allege misconduct by Convertino, Del Fuoco says in the motion. They are "strange bedfellows" and "teammates," he argues.

Drew Wade, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington, D.C., would neither confirm nor deny whether Convertino is under investigation for any cases other than the terrorism case.

The government indicted Convertino on March 29, accusing him of lying to a jury and a federal judge in prosecuting four men accused in a 2001 terrorism-related case in which convictions were ultimately thrown out. Convertino has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial.

Del Fuoco would not say Wednesday what makes him believe Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of the Stines case.

Allegations in the Stines case involve early releases given to felons who testified against Stines, who was sentenced to 33 years and four months in prison following a 1999 trial.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge OKs Questioning Of Justice Department Official (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - A judge ruled Thursday that Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum must undergo questioning in a lawsuit, a decision that is helpful to a private group seeking records about the Justice Department's conduct in a landmark case against the tobacco industry.

The action by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is the latest problem related to McCallum's nomination as the Bush administration's choice to become ambassador to Australia.

Democratic Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois is blocking McCallum's nomination over allegations the No. 3 official at the Justice Department improperly influenced the government's lawsuit against cigarette manufacturers.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington sued last year after the department ignored the testimony of one of its own witnesses in the tobacco trial and reduced the amount the Bush administration is seeking from the tobacco industry from $130 billion to $10 billion.

CREW says the department has failed to produce a single responsive document to demands for information under the Freedom of Information Act.

Sullivan said the private organization is entitled to delve into the department's handling of the document requests by questioning McCallum, who is at the center of the controversy over whether the administration caved into the tobacco industry in reducing the amount of money it is seeking.

The judge said statistical data the department sends to Congress every year belies the government's argument that there is nothing unusual or out of the ordinary in the amount of time it has taken to respond to CREW's lawsuit.

In its lawsuit filed last October, CREW asked for records of all contacts between Justice Department officials and the White House concerning the tobacco litigation and records of all contacts between McCallum and his old law firm in Atlanta which has done work in the past for the tobacco industry.

Legal Blow Over Tobacco Case Information (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessnerin Washington

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

The US Justice Department was dealt a legal blow on Thursday when a judge ruled that a watchdog group could interview a top official in connection with the government's controversial handling of its landmark case against tobacco companies.

Judge Emmet Sullivan said Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (Crew) could depose Robert McCallum and other Justice Department officials about how the department handled Crew's requests for information about the case.

The judgment does not give Crew the latitude to interview Mr McCallum, the associate attorney-general nominated by President George W. Bush to be ambassador to Australia, on the underlying facts of the case.

But Crew says the deposition will shed light on whether the department sought to cover up its decision-making process by wilfully ignoring requests under the Freedom of Information Act.

The judge's ruling is the latest chapter in a long-running saga about whether a decision by the government last year to reduce the amount of penalties it was seeking from tobacco companies – from $130bn initially to $5.2bn – was politically motivated.

Reports in the Washington Post and other newspapers last June suggested that the government's decision to change its position on the five-year civil racketeering case against the tobacco industry was made over the objection of career lawyers at the Justice Department.

A government witness, Harvard professor Max Bazerman, who said he believed the industry should be subject to a court appointed monitor, was told by a trial attorney at the department to change his testimony to be more favourable to the industry, according to a 2005 article in the Washington Post. Mr Bazerman was ultimately allowed to testify.

The controversy put a spotlight on Mr McCallum, who had oversight of the case and was a former attorney for Alston & Bird, a law firm that represents tobacco companies.

The Justice Department has previously denied that its legal deliberations were politically motivated. Its decision, nevertheless, prompted a group of Democrat senators to demand an investigation and for Crew to take up the cause.

Anne Weismann, Crew's chief council, said the government had, in effect, argued that the documents Crew was requesting were not for public consumption because they involved legal work product, which is protected, and that it would cost Crew, a non-profit organisation, $90,000 to process the request.

"Hopefully, the American people will begin to learn the truth about why the DoJ so drastically reduced the penalty in the tobacco case." said Melanie Sloan, Crew's executive director.

Justice Dept. Requests Documents From Career Education (CRAINS)

By Kate Ryan

Crain's Chicago Business, June 2, 2006

Company asked to provide various details, officials said

(Crain's) — The U.S. Department of Justice has outlined the nature of its inquiry into Career Education Corp., almost two years after an investigation was first reported.

On Tuesday the department asked the Hoffman Estates-based operator of for-profit schools to supply documentation of the way job placement rates and tuition costs were presented to current and prospective students at particular schools. The company was also asked to provide details about the way it compensates admissions officers, the way federal Pell Grants are used at one school, and the calculation of student refunds at another school, according to a Thursday filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"We received a letter from the Civil Division of the U.S. Department of Justice advising us that it is reviewing allegations that certain of our schools may have submitted false claims to the U.S. Department of Education," the Career Ed said in its SEC filing. A Justice Department probe was first reported in August 2004. Tuesday's SEC filing referred to the review as "informational."

A Career Ed spokeswoman said the company is cooperating with the investigation.

"It's not good news, but the things that they've requested aren't very different from what everybody else has been investigating for the last two years," says Alexander Paris Jr., an analyst at Barrington Research in Chicago. "It's not uncommon in this industry for the Department of Justice to review allegations by former students."

Career Education operates for-profit colleges and trade schools around the United States, enrolling about 104,000 students. The company has been plagued by legal and regulatory problems for more than two years, and several of its schools are on probation or under review with their accreditation agencies. In December, the company's American InterContinental University (AIU), which accounts for half of the company's revenue, was placed on probation by its accrediting agency, which cited concerns about the integrity of student academic records and accuracy in recruiting and admission practices.

A spokesman for the Justice Department declined to comment on investigations or inquiries. The Department of Justice will confirm an investigation only when unsealed charges are filed against a company, a spokesman said.

Career Education Gets Detention, Again! (MOTLEYF)

By Rich Duprey

Motley Fool, June 2, 2006

Well, that didn't take long. Only last week, Career Education (Nasdaq: CECO), the country's second-largest for-profit chain of colleges, announced that the Education Department had satisfactorily concluded its financial review of the company and might allow it to graduate to making acquisitions once again.

But just this morning, the company announced that the Justice Department was giving it detention again, investigating allegations that some of Career Education's schools had submitted false claims or statements to the Education Department. The DOJ also wants information related to compensation for admissions personnel, the use of Pell Grant funds at one school, and student refund calculations at another.

Career Education has more than 80 campuses, more than 100,000 students enrolled, and a $3.2 billion market cap, putting it in second place among for-profit higher education. The much larger Apollo Group (Nasdaq: APOL) leads the industry with 95 campuses and 159 "learning centers," enrolling more than 300,000 students. Apollo also sports a market cap nearly three times larger than Career Education's, at $9 billion.

The company, and indeed much of the industry, has been dogged by allegations of misrepresenting graduation and job-placement rates, lowering admission standards, and paying recruiters to get warm bodies in their classrooms. Last year, Apollo was fined $9.8 million for admitting unqualified students to boost enrollment at its University of Phoenix online campus.

Yet while these types of charges have been raised many times over the years, most of the complaints have turned out to be unproven. ITT Educational Services (NYSE: ESI) was investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice and subsequently exonerated of wrongdoing. And Corinthian College (Nasdaq: COCO) was also given a passing grade by the SEC last year.

Still, the industry's continuing legal woes have taken their toll on share prices of some of the industry's main players. But like the academic trajectory of advanced-placement students, some key players continue to excel despite the ennui gripping the rest. ITT, Strayer (Nasdaq: STRA), and DeVry (NYSE: DV) have continued to graduate to higher market caps.

Career Education has been able to grow over the years by making a sizeable number of acquisitions, which the Education Department investigation had held back. The company hoped that being cleared of any wrongdoing would let it resume adding schools and students and gaining market share from its competitors. But the Justice Department inquiry, which the company assures us is only "informational in nature," may just put another mark on its permanent file. Further delays can only be bad news for Career Education, and even worse tidings for investors seeking satisfactory returns.

Justice Department Appeals In Teen Firefighter Case (PHI)

The U.S. Justice Department has appealed a judge's decision that a 14-year-old Delaware County junior firefighter killed while answering an alarm was entitled to death benefits and a place on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial.

Christopher Kangas' mother hoped to see his name added to that memorial in October, but unless the Justice Department drops its appeal, "the dream is deferred again," lawyer Frank W. Daly said yesterday.

Kangas was struck and killed by a car four years ago while racing on his bicycle to Brookhaven Fire Co. No. 52. Local and state officials awarded death benefits to Kangas' mother, Julie Amber-Messick, but the Justice Department said Kangas did not qualify as a public safety officer.

A U.S. Court of Federal Claims judge ruled in Amber-Messick's favor on March 27. Daly said the government had 60 days to appeal and did so at the last minute Tuesday.

FEC Fines Frist's 2000 Senate Campaign (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP2, June 1, 2006

The Federal Election Commission has determined that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's 2000 Senate campaign violated federal campaign finance laws.

The federal agency fined Frist 2000, Inc., $11,000, according to a lawyer representing Frist's campaign and a watchdog group. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington had filed a complaint last year against Frist's 2000 campaign committee and received the FEC's findings Thursday.

The FEC found that Frist 2000, Inc., failed to disclose a $1.44 million loan taken out jointly by the campaign and Frist's 1994 campaign committee.

The Tennessee Republican, who was elected to the Senate in 1994, is not seeking another term and is weighing a possible bid for the presidency in 2008.

Federal law requires full disclosure of any loans taken out by campaign committees. Frist's 1994 campaign committee did disclose the loan to the FEC in January 2001, but the 2000 campaign did not, according to the FEC.

In an agreement reached with the Frist campaign committee, the agency said Frist 2000, Inc., violated the law by failing to report the loan in its January 2001 campaign finance report and did not properly report the repayment of the loan in a July 2001 report.

Jason Torchinsky, a lawyer representing Frist 2000, Inc., said the campaign settled the FEC complaint. "What the FEC suggested, we believe would have resulted in double reporting of the loan," Torchinsky said.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the watchdog group, praised the FEC action.

"We have campaign finance laws, and everyone's supposed to abide by them," she said. "It's such a clear area of the law."

The Asbestos-Fraud Express (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

If the Milberg Weiss indictments are anything to go by, federal prosecutors are finally getting serious about tort lawyer corruption. So let's hope they've also noticed a federal lawsuit in West Virginia that describes some of the most sordid asbestos fraud to date.

The suit comes courtesy of CSX, one of the nation's largest rail companies and long a target of frivolous asbestos claims. CSX last year turned the legal tables on its nemesis -- Pittsburgh-based plaintiffs firm Peirce, Raimond & Coulter -- filing a lawsuit against it and an employee alleging fraud, misrepresentation and negligence. The tale is a modern tort classic.

It begins in early 2000, when CSX employee Ricky May learned that the Peirce firm was going to conduct an asbestos "screening" in June. Peirce is a big player in railway asbestos suits and has brought thousands against CSX. Mr. May had already attended such a mass screening prior to 2000, and had tested negative for asbestosis.

Enter Robert Gilkison, a former CSX employee. According to the lawsuit, the Peirce firm occasionally hires retired rail employees as "runners," or people who round up former colleagues for lawsuits. The suit alleges that, faced with Mr. May's unfortunate good health, Mr. Gilkison suggested that Mr. May get someone who had previously tested positive for asbestosis to impersonate him at the June exam.

Mr. May then recruited Danny Jayne -- a CSX employee who'd been "diagnosed" with asbestosis in 1999 -- to sit for his June X-ray. Mr. Gilkison is alleged to have facilitated all this, allowing Mr. May to complete the necessary forms but then walking Mr. Jayne through the exam. Mr. Jayne later received a settlement of $7,000 from CSX, while Mr. May received $8,000.

Turncoat employees, mass screenings, medical impersonations -- this is already the stuff of bad thrillers, but it gets worse. The Peirce law firm was an avid user of the medical services of Dr. Ray Harron, a physician singled out in a federal court opinion last year for having "manufactured" silicosis diagnoses. The good doctor learned this skill in the asbestos field, producing tens of thousands of asbestosis "diagnoses" for eager law firms. That included a "positive" diagnosis for Mr. Jayne -- casting doubt on whether even he was really sick.

Suspecting foul play, CSX did some investigating and had a doctor verify that the May and Jayne X-rays were in fact of the same man. CSX last year filed suit against both claimants, and they later confessed to the scheme. Mr. May agreed to pay back his settlement; Mr. Jayne agreed to offer testimony. Mr. Gilkison has denied any wrongdoing.

Which brings us to the current lawsuit focusing on the extent to which the Peirce law firm knew about this fraud. CSX claims that, after the screening, Mr. May got cold feet and asked Mr. Gilkison about dismissing the case. The railway also claims Mr. Gilkison talked to the Peirce firm about the fraud, but that Peirce lawyers proceeded with the lawsuit anyway.

CSX is further claiming that Peirce keeps records of both its positive and negative screening applications and so would have known that Mr. May had already been screened and that the X-ray was not his own. At the very least, the railway has a good case that Peirce, as administrator of the screenings, failed in its obligations to quality control.

While Peirce has conceded in court documents that the scam took place, it insists it had no knowledge of the deception or what role Mr. Gilkison played, and says it did not start keeping records of "negative" screenings until 2000. It has further argued that since Mr. Gilkison was an "independent contractor" (rather than a salaried employee), the firm has no legal liability for his conduct. This is a convenient and not very persuasive distinction, to say the least. * * *

Tawdry details aside, the case offers some broader lessons for the judiciary. West Virginia long ago became a favorite dumping ground for asbestos suits because of its reputation for jackpot justice. The state's court system responded by consolidating suits into mass litigation, thus denying defendants the ability to contest individual cases. This in turn became an invitation for tort lawyers to generate as many claims as possible, and the May-Jayne fraud is one result. Anyone who thinks this is the only such fraud hasn't been paying attention to asbestos litigation.

Which is where the prosecutors can and should come in. As more cases of silicosis and asbestosis fraud come to light, courts have slowly changed course and allowed defense teams more leeway to investigate individual claims. This is a great first step toward getting the tens of thousands of bogus suits dismissed, while getting legitimate claims heard more quickly.

But this still leaves the question of who will be held responsible for filing fraudulent claims. Both a New York federal grand jury and Congress are looking at silicosis fraud. Yet as the CSX case shows, many of the corrupt practices rampant in silicosis suits got their start in asbestos. If the Justice Department really wants to clean up the trial bar, asbestos-lawsuit fraud is the mother lode.

Not All Speech Is Free (LAT)

SOME CIVIL LIBERTARIANS ARE denouncing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday against a former Los Angeles prosecutor who says he was disciplined for speaking out against police misconduct. They may want to consider how they would feel if the same decision went against, say, a Bush administration official who was fired for saying that proponents of the president's immigration policy suppressed evidence that illegal immigrants increase crime and disease.

The high court was divided along ideological lines on the case. It held that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office did not violate the free-speech rights of Deputy Dist. Atty. Richard Ceballos by denying him a promotion because of his memo alleging that police officers lied to obtain a search warrant.

The majority opinion was written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative who has been a defender of the 1st Amendment. Kennedy conceded that the 1st Amendment protects public employees when they speak as citizens, but he said no such protection attaches to speech "pursuant to their official duties." He noted: "When a citizen enters government service, the citizen by necessity must accept certain limitations on his or her freedom."

This was a close case for the court — it was a 5-4 decision. But the dissenters couldn't agree on a single rationale for protecting on-the-job communications like the Ceballos memo — a sign that the majority was right in not announcing a new 1st Amendment protection for such speech.

Justice David H. Souter, in an opinion joined by justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, suggested a case-by-case approach to deciding whether "addressing official wrongdoing and threats to health and safety can outweigh the government's stake in the efficient implementation of policy." Justice Stephen Breyer declined to sign the Souter opinion because he said it "fails to give sufficient weight to the serious managerial and administrative concerns that the majority describes." Stevens, though he signed the Souter opinion, wrote a separate dissent objecting to the notion "that there is a categorical difference between speaking as a citizen and speaking in the course of one's employment."

But is there? Any American has the right to spout off against the legalization of illegal immigrants. A member of an administration that takes a pro-legalization stance does not have the same right to second-guess that administration's views in the name of "whistle-blowing." Whatever one thinks of Ceballos' actions, the court was right not to blur the distinction between citizen speech and employee speech.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Citizens Seek Investigation (IRONTT)

By Michael Caldwell, The Ironton Tribune

Ironton (OH) Tribune, June 2, 2006

Nearly 70 citizens — and one U.S. Congressman — are asking for some federal help to investigate theRock Hill School District's handling of disabled and minority students, an issue that is already being addressed in three pending legal cases.

Though Rep. Ted Strickland has joined in on the request, the effort has been led by Richard Diamond, a vocal opponent to longtime Superintendent Lloyd Evans and parent of a child with disabilities in the school district.

Sixty-nine signatures were turned in on a petition asking the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Education to step in, citing a host of allegations, most of which have not been substantiated or are part of three pending legal cases.

"We know that over the years, parents have asked the Ohio Department of Education and the Justice Department for help but, until now, nothing has happened," Diamond said in a written release distributed by Columbus attorney Mike Moore, who also represents the three families in the pending legal cases.

Three years ago, Brent and Amanda Unroe filed a lawsuit against the board, claiming Brent Unroe was unlawfully fired from his job as a special education teacher and that their adopted African-American special needs children were discriminated against.

School officials have always denied the allegations and have said in the past that Brent Unroe was terminated for insubordination and inappropriately handling students.

The Unroe case is scheduled for trial next week in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati.

Through Moore, two other families have also filed lawsuits against the board. Brenda Mulkey and Shara Jenkins claim their diabetic children were discriminated against.

Trial dates have not yet been scheduled in those cases.

School officials have also denied any wrongdoing in all these cases. Evans said he is not aware of any basis for these claims and thinks the real motivation is far less altruistic.

"I think this is a political action group just out to get someone," he said.

In fact, Evans said he thinks the district had done the exact opposite of the discrimination allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0031314

"We have erected additional special education units to take care of handicapped kids," Evans said. When the district was building new schools a few years ago, the district funded more classrooms for special education than the state had allocated funds for.

The petition and Strickland's letter ask for an immediate and thorough investigation of the administration and the allegations.

"More than 50 of my constituents signed a letter that raises disturbing questions about the RHLSD administration's treatment of minority students with disabilities," Strickland said in his letter. "The letter cites instances of physical abuse, intimidation and failure to cooperate with basic administrative requests.

Evans said he welcomes any agency to take a closer look at the district.

"I have no problem with anyone investigating," he said. "I think we are doing things in a proper manner and certainly not discriminating against kids."

Bush To Back Gay Marriage Ban Amendment (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, June 1, 2006

President Bush will promote a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage on Monday, the eve of a scheduled Senate vote on the cause that is dear to his conservative backers.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, the proposal would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

It stands little chance of passing the 100-member Senate, where proponents are struggling to get even 50 votes. Several Republicans oppose the measure, and so far only one Democrat — Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska — says he will vote for it.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved the amendment on May 18 along party lines after a shouting match between a Democrat and the chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa. He bid Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record), D-Wis., "good riddance" after Feingold declared his opposition to the amendment and his intention to leave the meeting.

Bush aides said he would be making his remarks on the subject Monday.

A slim majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, according to a poll by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press from March. But the poll also showed attitudes are changing: 63 percent opposed gay marriage in February 2004.

Those poll results don't reflect how people might feel about amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court decided to legalize such marriages in 2003. A year later, San Francisco issued thousands of marriage licenses to gay couples.

This November, initiatives banning same-sex marriages are expected to be on the ballot in Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. In 2004, 13 states approved initiatives prohibiting gay marriage or civil unions, with 11 states casting votes on Election Day.

Bush benefited as religious conservatives turned out to vote and helped him defeat Democratic Sen. John Kerry in 2004. In Ohio, an initiative rejecting the legality of civil unions won handily. The same state tipped the election to Bush.

"The president firmly believes that marriage is an enduring and sacred institution between men and women and has supported measures to protect the sanctity of marriage," White House spokesman Ken Lisaius said.

Bush has lost support among conservatives who blame the White House and Congress for runaway government spending, illegal immigration and lack of action on social issues such as the gay marriage amendment.

Opponents of the amendment objected to Bush promoting a measure they said amounts to discrimination.

"This is fundamentally both a civil rights and religious freedom issue and the president's position of supporting amending the constitution is just dead wrong," said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "This is simply to give ammunition to the so-called religious right just to show that the president is still with them."

U.S. Threatens To Sue Over Care At Prison (MJS)

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, May 31, 2006

Taycheedah treatment 'unacceptable'

Female prisoners with mental illness - some as young as 15 - are regularly placed in isolation cells at Taycheedah Correctional Institution, receive little treatment and are given psychotropic drugs for months without monitoring by a physician, a U.S. Justice Department report has concluded.

In a May 2 letter to Gov. Jim Doyle, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Civil Rights Division, Wan J. Kim, called Taycheedah's treatment of inmates with mental illness "unacceptable" and a violation of their constitutional rights. The letter states that Wisconsin can either voluntarily correct the problems or face possible legal action by the federal government this year.

The Justice Department report was based on a yearlong federal investigation. It does not indicate what prompted the review, and federal officials declined to comment further.

"It is an embarrassment for our state," said state Rep. Sheldon Wasserman (D-Milwaukee), who is also a physician. "This is an absolute horror. What we are doing is something from the dark ages. Why does it take the threat of a federal lawsuit to get Wisconsin to do something about it? This is going to cost millions of dollars to fix."

Doyle's office referred a call for comment to state Department of Corrections officials.

John Dipko, Department of Corrections spokesman, said Tuesday the concerns raised in the report are being taken "very seriously" and that the state will work with U.S. officials to address them.

"It is important to note that the Department of Corrections is taking a comprehensive, systemwide approach to health care - including mental health," Dipko said, adding that the system is working toward becoming accredited by the National Commission on Correctional Health Care in the next six years. Taycheedah, he said, will be the first prison in the process.

The prison, in Fond du Lac County, houses about 700 maximum- and medium-security female inmates.

Federal investigators found that 44 out of 59 women in segregation last July had "serious mental illnesses and were observed to be in significant distress." One of the women was clearly psychotic and had a history of eating her feces and drinking her urine. Investigators said she had been placed in segregation because of "lots of tickets" for disciplinary problems and for "disrespect."

Other cases and issues cited in the report include these:

• An inmate with severe mental illness who fatally asphyxiated herself while in segregation. In episodes before her death, she had swallowed pen inserts and had gone on periodic hunger strikes.

• The prison operates a unit to provide specialized treatment for inmates with mental illness, though federal investigators found almost no programming and that most of the inmates had nothing to do during the day.

• Untrained correctional guards distribute and monitor medication to inmates with mental illness because there are too few nurses. In addition, it sometimes takes weeks to fill prescriptions for medications used to treat mental illness.

• Some inmates with mental illness who attempted to harm themselves with writing instruments or parts of mattresses have been charged with "misuse of state property" and placed in segregation units. In other cases, inmates have been charged with self-abuse and then punished by being placed in segregation.

"Punishing inmates for mental health symptoms that are beyond their control is unacceptable and ineffectual . . . " the federal investigators wrote.

The report notes that the prison's annual report for fiscal year 2005 described "an elaborate array of programming" but that investigators found "that very little actually exists."

Dipko, the prison spokesman, said the system has "made significant strides" in the area of mental health throughout the system, including Taycheedah. Those include an increase in psychiatry hours and additional nurse hours, he said.

The federal findings come as the state is facing a $1.5 billion deficit in 2007. Health care expenditures for the adult prison system have increased by more than 86% from 2001 to 2005, when the average daily population grew by 38.5%, state records show.

Among the report's list of needed changes were increased psychiatric and nursing staff, better medication monitoring and improved programming and treatment to ensure that inmates with mental illness are not kept in segregation cells.

Psychiatrist staffing at the prison was called "grossly inadequate." The prison employs two part-time psychiatrists who carry a caseload of more than 400 patients at time, the report states. Inmates with serious mental health needs sometimes wait for months untreated, investigators wrote.

By Michael Hill, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 2, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-Lawyers for same-sex couples seeking the right to marry in New York told the state's highest court Wednesday they are being treated as "unequal citizens" and denied a constitutional right.

The 44 couples want the Court of Appeals to follow the lead of high court judges in neighboring Massachusetts and rule that New York's constitution gives same-sex couples the same right to wed that straight couples have always had.

"We are evolving as a society," said Terence Kindlon, one of the lawyers representing the couples in four lawsuits before the court, "and just because we did something 200 years ago, or 100 years ago or 50 years ago, it's not necessarily a good justification to do it now."

The couples have lost in lower appeals courts and are at odds with Gov. George Pataki's health department and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office, which claim New York law prohibits issuing licenses to same-sex couples.

The cases argued Wednesday were filed two years ago, when gay marriage controversies flared up from Boston to San Francisco.

A decision from the court could come in a month or two.

At The Corner Of Progress And Peril (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

What does it mean to be a black man? Imagine three African American boys, kindergartners who are largely alike in intelligence, talent and character, whose potential seems limitless. According to a wealth of statistics and academic studies, in just over a decade one of the boys is likely to be locked up or headed to prison. The second boy -- if he hasn't already dropped out -- will seriously weigh leaving high school and be pointed toward an uncertain future. The third boy will be speeding toward success by most measures.

Being a black man in America can mean inhabiting a border area between possibility and peril, to feel connected to, defined by, even responsible for each of those boys -- and for other black men. In dozens of interviews, black men described their shared existence, of sometimes wondering whether their accomplishments will be treated as anomalies, their individuality obscured by the narrow images that linger in the minds of others.

This unique bond, which National Urban League President Marc Morial calls "the kinship of the species," is driving many black men to focus renewed attention on the portrait of achievement and failure that hangs over the next generation. A recent spate of scholarly studies have brought urgency to the introspection, as the studies show the condition of poor, young black men has worsened in the past decade despite the generally strong economic conditions of the 1990s.

Black men now number 18 million, and many are pondering their roles in a country that is undergoing significant social and demographic changes.

In the coming weeks and months, The Washington Post will explore the lives of black men through their experiences -- how they raise their sons, cope with wrongful imprisonment, navigate the perceived terrain between smart and cool, defy convention against the backdrop of racial expectations. On Sunday, The Post will publish the findings of a major poll conducted jointly with the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and Harvard University. The nationwide survey measured the attitudes of black men on a variety of issues and asked others for their views of black men.

More than 50 years after the publication of Ralph Ellison's "Invisible Man," black men appear more visible than ever -- a freshman senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, is the American Idol of national politics, and Will Smith is perhaps the most bankable star in Hollywood. Yet black men who put their kids through college by mopping floors, who sit at home reading Tennyson at night, who wear dreadlocks but design spacecraft, say it sometimes seems as if the world doesn't believe they exist.

The dueling realities of their history -- steady progress and devastating setbacks -- continue to burden many black men in ways that are sometimes difficult to explain.

"As a black man, you often think that things can go either way," says Todd Boyd, an African American who has carved out a niche exploring race and popular culture as a professor at the University of Southern California. "You could be that guy in the penitentiary, or you could be that guy on everybody's television screen."

You could be Gilbert Arenas, an NBA all-star who makes millions of dollars a year but still feels he relates to the "young brother" who catches the bus every day to fry burgers for a living. "We have an unspoken bond about life," he says.

The statistics that spell out the status of black men are often conflicting, sometimes perplexing.

The percentage of black men graduating from college has nearly quadrupled since the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and yet more black men earn their high school equivalency diplomas in prison each year than graduate from college. Black families where men are in the home earn median incomes that approach those of white families. Yet more than half of the nation's 5.6 million black boys live in fatherless households, 40 percent of which are impoverished. The ranks of professional black men have exploded over four decades -- there were 78,000 black male engineers in 2004, a 33 percent increase in 10 years. And yet 840,000 black men are incarcerated, and the chances of a black boy serving time has nearly tripled in three decades, Justice Department projections show.

So where does that leave 17-year-old Jonathan McMaster as he ponders his future? The statistics show that fewer than half of black boys graduate from high school four years after entering the ninth grade. And yet here he is, a junior at Baltimore's exclusive Gilman School, running track, playing the viola in the school orchestra, approaching fluency in French. He has visited nearly 30 countries and is spending a month studying in London. It used to be "a hindrance" to be a black man, McMaster says he's been told by his elders. "But with everybody trying to diversify now, I think it has become almost an advantage."

Where the nation was once largely segregated along a black-white divide, the country has become more racially and ethnically mixed, creating opportunities -- and new sensibilities.

Erin Smith, 23, who recently graduated with a business degree from Howard University, once considered himself a militant. "You kind of get groomed, in a way, in that totally pro-black environment at Howard." But as he began to pursue his business dreams -- a fledgling multimedia company he created his freshman year and a real estate venture with his father -- Smith started to expand his thinking.

"I saw myself as potentially being kind of racist," he says "of closing myself off to people. I'm still pro-black, but we don't need to totally focus on race. We're all part of the human race. I kind of grew a little bit. I look at life as a puzzle -- day by day, you get a new piece. Some young men think success is 20-inch rims, flat-screen TV. They only think of success as what they see -- and that's what they see."

What does it mean to be a black man?

Marc Morial was leaving the downtown Madison Hotel when he got into an impromptu conversation with a doorman. The doorman, also black, wore a uniform and a whistle around his neck; Morial was dressed in an immaculate gray suit with a crisp white pocket scarf. When the chat concluded, the two locked arms and pulled each other close in a signature embrace that is common to black men across the country.

"Black men relate to each other in a special way," Morial says.

On the streets, strangers frequently give each other an uptick of the head when their eyes meet, a nod of black male acknowledgment. Black men have invented so many special handshakes that a recent McDonald's commercial turns on this fact. Their commonality is often defined by their style, their walk, their slang and even how they refer to each other ("Slim," "Shorty," "Dawg," "Mo," "Brother"). Wherever black men congregate, there is often a comfort level that crosses class and generational lines. There is even a universally acknowledged black men's club, the barbershop, where no subject is off limits.

"It's the cohesion that comes from knowing whatever your situation in life is you're carrying a special burden," says Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans. "But also that you're strong enough to do it. Whatever they put on you, you can handle it. You can knock me down, but I'm getting up. You can't knock me down with no love tap."

Over the past 100 years, perhaps no slice of the U.S. population has been more studied, analyzed and dissected than black males. Dozens of governmental boards and commissions have investigated their plight, scholars have researched and written papers on them, and black men have been the subject of at least 400 books.

In the early 20th century, researchers pioneered a still-evolving movement to pinpoint a biological link between black men and crime. After the social turmoil of the 1960s, experts spotlighted the rampant deprivation and lack of opportunity among black men that lent urgency to President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty.

Later, the focus became the diminishing opportunities in cities, where well-paying manufacturing work was vanishing, locking many unskilled black men out of the job market. That gave way to concerns about drugs and crime and the fraying of the family structure, as 70 percent of black babies were being born to unmarried mothers and incarceration rates soared.

The NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund hosted a 1985 panel discussion that called young black men "an endangered species," a label that stuck even as some black men were making strides toward the middle class and a new level of social acceptance.

In 1995, the Million Man March, spearheaded by Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, drew hundreds of thousands of black men to the Mall in an unrivaled show of unity and concern for one another. The gathering seemed to signal a watershed moment of self-reflection.

Since the march, black men have met in thousands of groups to address their problems, reinforce their progress and understand their lives with greater clarity. Perhaps the latest, most dramatic evidence of this involvement is "The Covenant," a book charting a plan for black self-improvement that was an outgrowth of commentator Tavis Smiley's State of the Black Union forums. The book has been a No. 1 seller on the New York Times nonfiction paperback list.

"What we have seen in the last 10 years is increasing concern among successful black men in terms of trying to help other African American men succeed," observed Courtland Lee, a University of Maryland professor and former editor of the Journal of African American Men. "Even successful black men are victims of this crisis. They know they walk around with a target on their backs."

For black men, being poor has grown more perilous with time -- especially for the young. The 1960s sociological classic "Tally's Corner" charted the lives of what it called "Negro streetcorner men" in the Shaw neighborhood of Northwest Washington, painting a portrait of a group hobbled by weak education, dead-end jobs and fracturing families. Over four decades, wages and opportunities for uneducated workers have diminished, while the ranks of men disconnected from much of society have grown.

The path to the corner is set early for some black men. While school achievement has been a growing concern for boys of most every ethnicity, the problem is most acute among black boys, who are far more likely to be left back, be assigned to special education, score poorly on standardized tests, be suspended from school or eventually drop out than any other demographic group, numerous studies show.

Once they leave school, nearly three-quarters of black men in their twenties are jobless or incarcerated, an unemployment rate much higher than that of similarly situated white and Hispanic youth, according to a report from the Urban Institute.

"There has been a big change in what is thought of as normal in poor black communities," says John H. McWhorter, a senior fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute, which is hosting a conference on black men this month. "Back in the old days, there were always black men who were not interested in working. They were called corner men. But years ago, if you were a black man and you didn't work, it was a shame. Now, the shame is gone."

A black man is more than six times as likely as a white man to be slain. The trend is most stark among black men 14 to 24 years old: They were implicated in a quarter of the nation's homicides and accounted for 15 percent of the homicide victims in 2002, although they were just 1.2 percent of the population, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Also, black men are nine times as likely as white men to die from AIDS, and life expectancy for black men is 69.2 years -- more than six years shorter than that of white men.

Trying to reverse these trends through a broad public policy strategy is at the heart of the Dellums Commission, named after former congressman Ronald Dellums (D-Calif.). The commission will issue its report later this year. "This is beyond a crisis," says Gail Christopher, a vice president at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, who is overseeing the commission's study of the problems affecting young men of color. "It is a catastrophe."

It doesn't always start as a catastrophe.

Growing up in New York City and San Jose, Rahsaan Ferguson, 27, remembers his father's mantra: "You are a black boy. That's two things you will always have against you."

Now, Ferguson understands that his father, an employee of the Santa Clara County transit system, was merely trying to prepare him for a harsh world. But in his young mind, his father's message was confusing -- and a little disabling. "It kind of brings you down," he says. "I know it is supposed to make you strive harder. But when you hear that over and over, it makes you believe you are not supposed to succeed."

After being left back in third grade, Ferguson says, he lost confidence. As he continued to struggle in school, he worried about failing, as he had been taught so many black men do. Ultimately, he stopped trying, dropped out of school, fathered a son, now 7, and fell into crime. First, it was a few stolen cars. After a while, he sold crack cocaine, eventually serving a four-month jail term after authorities confiscated more than three grams of the drug from an apartment he shared with his girlfriend. Now, Ferguson is struggling to find stability, earning $10 an hour working for a sign company in one of the nation's most expensive areas.

"I can't help but think about the white kids I know. They were raised to think they are going to succeed and be better than everyone," Ferguson says.

The Rev. Elwood Gray, chaplain at the Patuxent Institute in Jessup and president of the National Coalition of Prison Ministries, has been working with inmates and ex-offenders for nearly 30 years. Many of those black men feel left behind and stigmatized by their behavior, he says, and as a result are sometimes difficult to reach when they leave prison. It's almost like they are in "an intensive-care unit," Gray says. "The approach must be holistic because they need employment, food, shelter and mental health care."

The plight of poor, young black men has fueled some attitudes and practices that affect all black men. In a 2001 article defending racial profiling as a rational police tactic, journalist John Derbyshire wrote in the National Review Online: "A policeman who concentrates a disproportionate amount of his limited time and resources on young black men is going to uncover far more crimes -- and therefore be far more successful in his career than one who biases his attention to, say, middle-aged Asian women."

These images not only shape how others see black men but also can affect how black men see themselves. Warren Simmons, 55, executive director of Brown University's Annenberg Institute for School Reform, recalls waiting in his car at a stoplight in downtown Washington and locking his doors when he spotted a black man approaching. Incredulous, the man began yelling at Simmons.

"For a moment, I found myself caught in a cultural quandary," Simmons says. "I'm a black man, and I know what it is like to have people respond to me with fear. Yet I did this. He assumed my response was to him as an individual, but it was directed to him as part of a larger group."

If these images distort the rich complexity of the lives of black men, they also have been embraced by some of the nation's most prominent icons of popular culture. A long, lucrative stream of music videos and movies extol the "thug life" fantasy of fast money, fast women and fast living.

Rapper 50 Cent has built his chart-busting, multimedia career on his being shot nine times and left for dead during his days as a drug dealer in Queens. Similarly, rapper, actor and pitchman Snoop Dogg has ridden music referring to his gang-life past, and his playful public persona as a would-be pimp, to fame.

In some ways, black men have always stood on the leading of edge of popular culture, often through the very imagery that offstage or off-screen inspires fear and contempt. Minstrel shows, widely regarded as the nation's first form of mass entertainment, burst on the scene in the decades after the American Revolution. The shows most often featured white performers in blackface mocking aspects of black life.

While the wide-eyed parodies are widely condemned as racist, in their heyday they helped shape society's perception of African Americans. Similarly, some scholars say, popular music -- including hip-hop -- and sports play an outsized role in forming contemporary notions of black men.

"When you look at American popular culture, it is really driven by hip-hop, and young, African American men are the face of hip-hop," says S. Craig Watkins, a University of Texas researcher. "It speaks to the fear-fascination relationship the nation has with black men."

The nation's most accomplished black men usually have a story to tell about what they overcame, who influenced them, how they survived.

Edward T. Welburn, chief of global design at General Motors Corp., says his interest in cars was stoked by observing his father operate a West Philadelphia auto repair service.

Guidance counselors at John B. Slaughter's high school in Topeka, Kan., laughed aloud, Slaughter said, when he told them he wanted to be an engineer. They had never heard of a black engineer, and they told Slaughter he should pursue a trade. Slaughter ignored them and graduated from Kansas State University in 1956 with a degree in electrical engineering, launching a career that took him to the helms of the National Science Foundation, the University of Maryland and Occidental College in Los Angeles.

Colin L. Powell recalls that he had only a 78 average at Morris High School in the Bronx and was considered a late bloomer at City College of New York, but the Army's robust affirmative-action program accelerated his rise through the ranks.

"It doesn't bother me if people say I made it with affirmative action," says Powell, who joined the Army ROTC in 1954, just six years after President Harry S. Truman ended segregation in the armed forces, and eventually became chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "All that matters is what you do afterwards. When I heard complaints, I'd say: 'It doesn't matter if it was affirmative action or not. I got it, you didn't.' "

Powell, who is now active in an array of mentoring programs, offers his own history to young black men who worry about the limitations others may place on them. Your achievements, he tells them, need not be accompanied by apology.

"Of course you're offended," he says. But "you can choke with something in your craw. I've seen too many people grind themselves to death worrying about what other people say about them. Frankly, we don't have time for that."

And yet even among the highest achievers, doubts sometimes intrude.

Curtis Symonds, 50, was one of the youngest African Americans to run a cable TV business in the nation in the early 1980s. He eventually wound up at Black Entertainment Television, where he helped expand the reach of the cable network from 18 million to 70 million homes over 14 years.

He left BET a multimillionaire and became chief operating officer of the Women's National Basketball Association's Washington Mystics. He also dreamed of opening Hoop Magic, a $7 million, 65,000-square-foot gym in Chantilly.

Despite his wealth and business experience, the first five or six banks he talked to did not want to touch his idea -- a reluctance that, rightly or wrongly, Symonds laid to the fact that he is a black man. "A lot of those bankers could not see my dream," he says. "All they could see is this black guy who wanted to borrow X millions of dollars."

Symonds got his financing and opened his gym.

Several years ago, Franklin D. Gilliam Jr., a political scientist at UCLA, set out to understand more deeply the perceptions people have of black men. He chose a provocative topic for his experiment: crime. In his test, he showed groups of viewers a mock newscast, which included a short account of a robbery at an automated teller machine during which the victim was killed.

Gilliam manipulated the image of the "suspect" in the newscast, sometimes depicting him as black, sometimes as white and other times not at all. Afterward, the participants were asked to identify the suspect's race. Most of the viewers accurately recalled whether a black or white face was shown. But 60 percent of those shown no image remembered seeing one, and an overwhelming majority of those said they saw a black face. In fact, they had not seen a face at all. To Gilliam, that meant that when people saw crime, they often expected a black man to be linked to it -- not necessarily because of blind racism but because of the images they had consumed their entire lives.

He sees evidence of that in his own life. As a vice chancellor, he is the highest-ranking black man on UCLA's campus. "Within 200 yards of my office, people genuflect when they see me," he says with a laugh. But a few blocks away on the street in Westwood, his colleagues often walk right by him, particularly when he is dressed casually.

"All they see," he says, "is a black male."

The Akaka State? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The last time we wrote about the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, in July 2005, we called it secessionist, unconstitutional and un-American. And that was being kind.

Our view of the bill -- which, like Freddy Krueger, refuses to die -- hasn't changed. But now that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has promised to bring it to a cloture vote in the coming days, it's worth reminding readers what this ugly drama from the beautiful state is all about.

The Reorganization Act -- better known as the Akaka Bill, after its U.S. Senate sponsor, Democrat Daniel Akaka -- would create a sovereign government, similar to existing Indian tribes, for the roughly 400,000 people who identify themselves as "Native Hawaiians." At a minimum, such recognition would protect dozens of federally funded programs for native Hawaiians that in recent years have come under increasingly successful Constitutional challenges as violations of the 14th and 15th Amendments.

But it would probably do much worse. The Akaka Bill could also lead to discriminatory treatment of non-Native Hawaiians, who already are excluded from private schools run for the exclusive benefit of the Natives. Vast tracts of land (entire islands, perhaps) might also be set aside exclusively for Native use. The Office of Hawaiian Affairs, a state agency, acknowledges that the Akaka Bill allows for the "complete legal and territorial independence from the United States and the re-establishment of a Hawaiian nation-state." Years, if not decades, of litigation would follow its passage.

No wonder that, while the bill is popular among Hawaii's political class, including Republican Governor Linda Lingle, it has generated remarkable resistance among Hawaiians. More than 80% of Hawaiians are not "Natives," and, believe it or not, the great majority actually think they are entitled to equal protection under the law and do not want to create a privileged class among them.

As one Kaleihanamau Johnson told the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, "I am of Hawaiian, Caucasian and Chinese descent . . . and do not support the Akaka Bill." She added that if the bill "comes to pass, I will be forced to choose on which side of the fence to stand. I will choose the Anglo-American tradition of the right to life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness. This will prevent me from recognizing all that is Hawaiian in me. I consider the Akaka bill to be a proposal to violate my rights."

Ms. Johnson is not alone. In its January report, the Civil Rights Commission found that the Akaka Bill would "establish an impermissible racial preference in the establishment and operation of a governing entity." The report noted that, unlike the Native Americans to which Governor Lingle tries to liken Native Hawaiians, "membership would be defined solely on the basis of ancestry, not on the basis of geographic, cultural, and political cohesiveness and the presence of an established community as is done for other Indian tribes."

The Commission also found that "nothing in the [Akaka Bill] guarantees that the race-based entity to be created would be democratic in nature," and that the Akaka Bill "could prompt other native or indigenous entities or other ethnic groups to seek similar rights through self-governance programs."

The Commission went on to recommend against the bill. Extraordinarily, however, its findings were removed last month from the January report, apparently under pressure from Commissioners Michael Yaki and Arlan Melendez, both Democrats. Now it looks as if the bill will pass the Senate if brought to a floor vote. It has the backing of most, if not all, 45 Democrats, as well as Republicans such as Lisa Murkowski and Ted Stevens of Alaska, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

Maybe this all seems like a quaint and distant debate. But Hawaii is no less a state than New York or Texas, and the legal precedents established there matter to the mainland. The Akaka Bill should frighten everyone who cares for the American ideal of e pluribus unum, and fears the ethnic Balkanization of the country. Republicans this week have a chance to get one right by keeping an unconstitutional bill from reaching the floor of the Senate.

Michigan Minimum-service Real Estate Bills Moving Forward (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, June 2, 2006

State Senate committee passes DOJ-opposed bills 4-0

A proposal to require real estate agents and brokers to provide a specific set of services for their clients is moving forward in the Michigan Legislature, despite opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and a state regulatory agency.

House Bill 4849 and House Bill 4850, companion bills that passed a state Senate committee in a 4-0 vote Wednesday, provide that real estate licensees who enter into service agreements with clients must provide certain services for that client, including acceptance and delivery of offers and counteroffers; assistance in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers, counter-offers and related documents or notices; and furnishing or causing to be furnished a complete and detailed closing statement.

In October 2005, after the Michigan state House of Representatives voted 105-3 to pass the bills, the Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department sent a letter to a state Senate committee chairman and the director of the Michigan Department of Labor and Economic Growth to express opposition, citing concerns about the possible anti-competitive and anti-consumer effects of the legislation.

The language in the bills is similar to other state legislation, sometimes referred to as minimum-service legislation, that has passed in other states despite similar federal objections. The Michigan Association of Realtors is supporting the bills, which could reach the state Senate floor as soon as next week. In other states, too, Realtor trade groups have endorsed the legislation as pro-consumer.

Opponents of minimum-services legislation have said that such efforts could serve to limit consumer choice for real estate services, while supporters have said the legislation ensures that real estate consumers will receive adequate service in real estate transactions.

The federal agencies charged that House Bill 4849 "is likely to increase the price that some consumers who prefer full-service brokerage pay for real estate services," and "would deprive consumers of the opportunity to purchase their preferred choice (of services)." Also, the letter states, "We recognize that some laws limiting forms of competition may be beneficial when they address specific market failures shown to harm consumers. However, we have seen no evidence that consumers currently are harmed by fee-for-service real estate brokerage."

Likewise, Tom Martin, of the Michigan state Department of Labor and Economic Growth, said in a May 31 statement to the Senate Economic Development, Small Business and Regulatory Reform Committee that the legislation "unnecessarily limits consumer choice and diminishes the attractiveness of some new business models that show promise of reducing the price of houses for consumers who wish to use these new models."

He also stated, "If there is a regulatory need to mandate the provision of certain minimum services, the (state) Bureau of Commercial Services has not experienced an increase in complaints that would demonstrate it. (I)t is very important to empower consumer choice. These bills do the opposite. It is equally important in our economy to embrace new technologies and the innovative business models that use them. These bills move Michigan in the opposite direction."

Martin said today that the department has had "a long history of dialog on these bills" with the Michigan Association of Realtors and the federal agencies. "Basically our feeling is there's no need for regulation here. The bills reduce customer choice, and though the proponents say that the bills are neutral with respect to alternative business models we do believe that they make some alternative business models less attractive."

Bill Martin, CEO for the Michigan Association of Realtors, said the association has attempted to work with Justice Department officials to resolve differences over the legislation. "Frankly, it was very frustrating -- the exercise that we went through with them. We're doing this to protect the consumer."

He noted that Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission officials stated in their letter that many multiple listing services in Michigan bar property listings in which there is no formal exclusive agency relationship between a real estate professional and a client, though he said the proposed legislation "has absolutely zero to do with MLSs."

Also, he said, the proposed laws allow real estate professionals to avoid the service requirements when they work with clients outside of a formal service agreement. "If (consumers) don't want those that is fine -- go do a different relationship." The text in HB 4849 provides that "a licensee providing real estate services pursuant to an agreement allowed under law that is not a service provision agreement creating an exclusive agency relationship is not considered in violation" of the minimum-service requirements.

Peter Langley, chief of state for state Sen. Alan Sanborn, R-Richmond Township, who is chairman of the Senate committee that approved the legislation this week, said that representatives for the Michigan Association of Realtors spoke in favor of the legislation during the hearing, and there was also a statement in opposition to the bills from two real estate professionals.

Cheryl Lynch, co-owner of Lake Michigan Realty Center in New Buffalo, Mich., who has opposed the legislation along with her husband and brokerage co-owner Mike, said she did not attend the committee meeting and she was upset to learn that the legislation is moving to the full Senate.

In a written statement to the committee, the Lynches said, "We adamantly remain opposed to any restrictions on the freedom of choice that consumers now enjoy when buying or selling real estate. Consumers are growing angry about the continual destruction of their individual sovereignty by their elected officials."

She also said she expects the Senate will approve the legislation. "I guess the people are powerless at this point."

EBay Tries E-mail In Net Neutrality Fight (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 2, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif.--eBay this week unleashed a political machine that should make politicians envious: a national e-mail blast over Net neutrality.

Meg Whitman, chief executive of the Internet auctioneer, called on more than a million eBay members to get involved in the debate over telecommunications laws and "send a message to your representatives in Congress before it is too late."

"The telephone and cable companies in control of Internet access are trying to use their enormous political muscle to dramatically change the Internet," Whitman wrote. "It might be hard to believe, but lawmakers in Washington are seriously debating whether consumers should be free to use the Internet as they want in the future."

This is the first time that eBay has used e-mail to urge its members to weigh in on a national issue, and also the first time Whitman sent it out under her own name, the company said Thursday.

eBay--which has been active in a pro-Net neutrality coalition for years--confirmed that more than a million e-mails have been sent out so far, but declined to offer a more specific number. The campaign is ongoing.

The concept of Net neutrality, which generally means that all Internet sites must be treated equally, has drawn a list of high-profile backers, from pop music star Moby and actress Alyssa Milano to Vint Cerf, one of the technical pioneers of the Internet. It's also led to a political rift between big Internet companies such as Google and Yahoo that back it--and telecommunications companies that argue federal legislation will curb their ability to manage their own networks.

"Meg has been following the issue, and with legislation moving through the House and the Senate, felt that this was an appropriate time to reach out to the community to make sure Congress heard what the community thought about the telecommunications reform bill," said Tod Cohen, eBay's associate general counsel for global policy.

Other tech companies have tried e-mail outreach efforts before, though this week's campaign ranks among the largest. Microsoft, for instance, distributed a "Freedom to Innovate" newsletter during its antitrust trial that ended with the exhortation: "Now is the time to let your elected officials know how you feel about the case."

eBay's e-mail campaign comes as the political debate over Net neutrality is growing more pointed in Washington, D.C. On May 25, one House of Representatives panel voted for formal Net neutrality regulations bitterly opposed by AT&T, Verizon and other broadband providers--while another House panel rejected them on April 5.

For their part, network operators from the telephone and cable industries, now allied with some of the nation's largest hardware makers, have said repeatedly that they have no intention of blocking, degrading or impairing content. They say they're protecting their right to manage their networks as they see fit, which could mean charging extra to heavy bandwidth users, such as video providers, that expect to have their content shuttled at priority speeds.

Also on Thursday, the American Electronics Association, or AeA, cautiously embraced Net neutrality.

In a statement, the trade association said its board of directors' executive committee endorsed a set of principles asking Congress to protect consumers and Internet companies "from anticompetitive and unreasonably discriminatory conduct by broadband network providers."

That's a careful statement that falls short of endorsing some of the more aggressive Net neutrality proposals--such as the one approved by the House Judiciary Committee on May 25--that would go further and block what's being called a "high speed" lane for certain services such as video.

AeA's board includes representatives of dozens of companies including Microsoft, Sun Microsystems, Nanoventions, Intel, Adobe Systems, Qualcomm and eDiets.com.

A Cisco representative responded to AeA's announcement with a statement that said: "Some of the groups who are most public in this debate focus on one part of the network stack or another. We actually care about the entire network--from core to end-user. No new regulations are needed in order to support the FCC's connectivity principles."

Inco Won't Sell More Assets To Win Antitrust Approval (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman Doug Alexander

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- Inco Ltd. said it doesn't expect to have to sell more than a Norwegian metals refinery to win U.S. and European regulatory approval for its C$19.5 billion ($17.7 billion) takeover of Canadian mining company Falconbridge Ltd.

The deal, which would create the world's largest nickel producer, is being reviewed by regulators and Toronto-based Inco has offered to sell Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and ``related marketing organizations" as a remedy to get approvals.

``My view is that the remedy we propose should be adequate," Inco Chief Executive Officer Scott Hand said today in an interview. ``I'm confident we'll get the clearance that we need."

The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, held a closed-door hearing May 29 to discuss Inco's proposals and antitrust concerns. The EC on Feb. 24 opened a four-month probe of the deal. A ruling is due by July 12.

``What we're doing is proposing a remedy that we think makes sense, and one that conceptually I think the regulatory agencies will agree with, because it will replicate the competition that exists today," Hand said. ``I think at the end of the day we will work it out."

Inco shares rose 61 cents to C$73.11 at 4:17 p.m. on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Falconbridge rose 40 cents to C$55.15.

Divestment Proposal

Inco said in an Oct. 11 statement that Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery and ``related marketing organizations" may have to be sold to complete the deal ``expeditiously."

The refinery would be sold, listed in an initial public offering or disposed of by distributing securities in a separate company that would operate independently, Inco said in the statement.

``If required, Inco would provide the refinery with intermediate product to meet its forecast needs, consistent with what Falconbridge would have done," the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0031325

Inco and Falconbridge said in October their combined 2005 nickel production would be 735 million pounds, or about 333,000 metric tons. That's equal to 26 percent of global output, based on data compiled by Credit Suisse. Russia's OAO GMK Norilsk Nickel is currently the world's top producer of the metal.

Cobalt Suppliers

Nickel is used in batteries and to prevent corrosion in stainless steel. The commission said in February that Inco and Falconbridge are the two leading suppliers of nickel used as a coating. The companies are also the two biggest suppliers of high-purity cobalt found in so-called super alloys, the commission said. Inco and Falconbridge have about 90 percent of the market for nickel used in super alloys, a key component in turbine blades for jet engines.

The transaction, which has already been cleared by Canadian authorities, is also under review by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Inco spokesman Steve Mitchell said in an interview today that the company is ``having productive discussions" with U.S. and European antitrust agencies on the disposal of Nikkelverk.

Emails Send A Strong Message For Rambus (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Shares in Rambus, a US memory chip designer, rose nearly 20 per cent on Thursday after it released emails in support of its antitrust litigation against chip manufacturers Samsung and Hynix of Korea and Micron of the US.

But Micron responded that the emails collected during a Department of Justice price-fixing investigation were unrelated to the San Francisco lawsuit where Rambus accuses the three of trying to exclude it from the memory market. The emails made available by Rambus were the result of its successful court action to get evidence unsealed to help its case.

One email sent in June 2001 by Linda Turner, an international sales vice president for Micron at the time, comments on Hynix lowering its prices for DDR (Double Data Rate) memory.

“No problem!” she writes. “We want DDR to explode in the marketplace so have actually been requesting Infineon, Samsung and Hynix to lower their DDR pricing to help it become a standard and drive Rambus away completely.”

Other Micron emails suggest the company’s salesforce is concerned at pricing of DDR, with major PC manufacturers Dell and Compaq seeming to prefer RDRAM (Rambus Dynamic Random Access Memory) chips designed by Rambus.

Daniel Francisco, spokesman for Micron, said yesterday: “Rambus has attempted to bootstrap the DoJ price-fixing investigation into a supposed boycott of Rambus Dram.”

“Rambus Dram was a failure in the marketplace because it was too costly and any performance differentials were not sufficient to justify the inherent cost differences.”

Rambus shares closed 18.5 per cent higher at $28.75 on the news.

Meanwhile, the Semiconductor Industry Association reported on Thursday that worldwide sales of semiconductors grew 8.1 per cent year-on-year to total $19.6bn in April. Sales of D-Ram chips grew by 3.7 per cent from March’s total and were up 7.7 per cent on a year earlier.

Global Stock Trading (NYT)

It has been over two centuries since securities traders began meeting informally under a buttonwood tree on Wall Street. The New York Stock Exchange's columned neo-Classical building is as instantly recognizable as the ceremonial ringing of the opening and closing bells, its floor brokers the embodiment of the frenzied pace of the market. The exchange remains a potent symbol of this city's and this country's financial pre-eminence.

Despite the tradition, things have changed. Investment is no longer contained by national boundaries, and operations are regularly executed electronically. Into the crowded fray come new and more complicated financial instruments.

If the exchange's corporate parent, the NYSE Group, is going to keep up, it will have to embrace change. Last year the company announced its acquisition of the electronic trading network Archipelago. Now it has reached a deal for the cross-border European exchange company Euronext.

If approved by regulators and shareholders, it would be the first trans-Atlantic market, though the rival Nasdaq has already bought up a 25 percent stake in the London Stock Exchange. Rather than leading the way, the exchanges are catching up to the reality of internationalized investing.

The combination would create "the world's most liquid and truly global financial marketplace," according to John Thain, chief executive of the NYSE Group. It would certainly be a goliath, with a combined market capitalization at the time of the offer of roughly $21 billion and listed companies worth a total of $27 trillion. Most important to investors in the exchange companies themselves is the $375 million in potential savings that NYSE Group predicts for a combined entity.

If a combined company can pass the fruits of those savings on to the average investor — not to mention added ease in buying shares of foreign companies — we're all for it. An era of global trading could benefit from international exchanges. Regulators on both sides of the Atlantic should take a cue and speed up the process of bringing their respective rules into harmony. There's no time to lose. The financial markets never sleep.

ENVIRONMENT:

$92 Million More Is Sought For Exxon Valdez Cleanup (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

WASHINGTON, June 1 — When the Justice Department and the State of Alaska reached their $900 million court settlement with the Exxon Corporation over the environmental damages caused by the Exxon Valdez oil spill, they agreed that, if unforeseeable damages occurred later, the two governments had 15 years to ask for $100 million more.

On Thursday, with the deadline approaching, the governments exercised this clause. They announced in a statement that they would seek $92 million from Exxon Mobil to clean up stubborn patches of oil, whose most toxic components, they say, have not dissipated since the spill in 1989.

Federal and state lawyers said in statements that they believed the lingering oil was still interfering with the recovery of animals in the area. The worries, environmentalists say, are focused on species that frequent the intertidal areas of Prince William Sound, like clams, mussels and harlequin ducks.

With this action, "we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement," said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for the Environment and Natural Resources Division of the Justice Department, in a statement. "Our goal throughout this process has been to pursue all scientifically and legally appropriate means of restoration."

While the oil can be found along several miles of beach, tying its effects to the slow recovery of some species may not be easy, one environmentalist said.

"No one doubts there is ongoing damage," said Eleanor Huffines, of the Alaska office of the Wilderness Society. "The challenge is that the ocean is so dynamic that it will be a hard thing to do to make the connection. But since this has been the most well-studied area since the spill, they have been able to document the lack of recovery."

Mark Boudreaux, the media relations manager for Exxon Mobil, focused on this uncertainty in a statement responding to the action. A link between the remaining oil and effects on wildlife, Mr. Boudreaux said, "is no more than a hypothesis." He added, "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

Of the $900 million paid by Exxon, $145 million remains in a trust fund administered by a council representing the federal and state agencies and local groups. "If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair," Mr. Boudreaux said, "it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem."

Along with the request for the $92 million, which may be decreased or increased to the maximum $100 million after negotiations, the state and federal agencies gave Exxon a blueprint for how the restoration should proceed.

The request for additional money had the support of Alaska's two senators, Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski, Republicans who had encouraged Exxon to provide the extra $100 million without the formal "reopener" process set by the 1991 settlement.

In March 1989, the Exxon Valdez supertanker, with an inebriated captain, ran aground on Bligh Reef, ruptured and spilled 11 million gallons of crude oil into the sound, contaminating about 900 miles of shoreline.

The damage to the fishing industry and to native subsistence hunting lasted for years. The herring population, a crucial link between the tiny plankton at the bottom of the food chain and the larger predators at the top, crashed four years after the spill. Of the $145 million remaining from Exxon's original payment, a significant part has been set aside to compensate herring fishermen.

Exxon Mobil continues to appeal a separate punitive damage award of $4.5 billion resulting from the spill.

The move to push for the extra money comes at a significant moment in the political life of Alaska, a state whose economy has been oil-dependent for three decades, but which is also encountering a steady decline in its share of oil revenues because of declining production of North Slope oil.

A new natural gas pipeline promises to be a source of income. But how ConocoPhillips, Exxon Mobil and BP, the energy industry's three major players here, will be taxed on overall levels of energy production is the subject of intense debate in a special session of the Legislature.

The open question is whether the industry, if it sees those tax discussions in the Legislature going too far against its interests, will abandon the pipeline, leaving the state without these potential new revenues.

So even though the legal deadline set the timetable for the state and federal governments' actions Thursday, it is an awkward moment to push for more money from Exxon Mobil. The company, in the statement of Mr. Boudreaux, made no allusion to its other major political and legal struggle in Alaska.

U.S., Alaska Want $92 Million More From Exxon (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

The Justice Department and the state of Alaska have asked Exxon Mobil Corp. to pay an additional $92 million to help repair damage caused by lingering quantities of oil that continues to sully the waters in Alaska's Prince William Sound where the Exxon Valdez tanker crashed in 1989.

Exxon has already paid $900 million for damage caused by the spill, the worst in the nation's history, but the 1991 agreement settling claims allowed the state and federal governments to ask for as much as $100 million more for damage that could not be foreseen at that time. The deadline for reopening the agreement is today.

"After extensive review it is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill," said Alaska Attorney General David W. Márquez. In a background briefing yesterday, officials from the Agriculture, Interior and Commerce departments said the additional money was needed because substantial amounts of oil remained in the sound's tidal basin, affecting clams, mussels, sea otters, sea ducks -- especially harlequin ducks -- and other birds.

Exxon disputed the governments' move. "Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate," the company said in an e-mailed statement. "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

The company said the problem of lingering pockets of oil was anticipated in 1991. "Nothing surprising has occurred since 1991," the company said.

Exxon also noted that $145 million of the money it has already paid hasn't been spent yet.

Márquez said yesterday that the remaining money has been earmarked, and the Justice Department said that in 1991 officials did not anticipate that any oil would remain toxic so long.

"I'm disappointed," Márquez said upon hearing Exxon's reaction. "I'm hopeful that they'll take long and serious look at our proposal." The federal agencies and the state of Alaska can file a claim against Exxon Mobil on Sept. 1 if the company does not agree with the governments' assessment.

Environmentalists, who noted that the vast majority of species injured by the oil spill have yet to recover, welcomed yesterday's announcement.

"The decision to seek the reopener is very important for the economy and ecosystem of the region," said Katherine Fuselier, a Sierra Club conservation organizer based in Alaska. "Concerned citizens from across the spill zone and throughout Alaska have come together to hold Exxon accountable for one of the worst environmental disasters of our time."

Environmental groups, citing government reports, have said that there are still 100 to 200 tons of oil in Prince William Sound, covering six discontinuous miles of shoreline.

According to the Exxon Valdez Oil Spill Trustee Council, a joint federal-state group that has monitored the area, clam productivity on oil-covered beaches that have been cleaned up is still down by two-thirds. Several sea-bird populations in oil-covered areas have declined, including pigeon guillemots and marbled murrelets.

The environmental devastation has also hurt local fishing operations. The herring fishery remains closed because of too-low numbers.

An official from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said in yesterday's background briefing that there had been a precipitous drop in the herring population, but that a link to the Exxon Valdez spill couldn't be proven beyond a doubt.

Exxon Asked To Pay More To Clean Spill (CNN)

CNN.com, June 2, 2006

Government wants $92 million more for Valdez cleanup

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- ExxonMobil on Thursday was asked to pay another $92 million to further clean up shorelines in Prince William Sound and the Gulf of Alaska, which still contain oil from the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill.

The company said it will study the request by the Justice Department and the state of Alaska while calling the department's basis for making it "speculation and hypothesis."

The action was taken under a provision in a $900 million damage settlement in 1991 allowing the government to reopen the agreement in 2006 to consider issues unforeseen at the time.

The Justice Department said the need for an additional project was shown by a series of 2001 studies that document the presence of residual oil from the spill along beaches in the area. The government said in a written statement it had not anticipated the oil would remain toxic and continue to affect the area.

"By sending our plan ... we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement," Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge said.

The Valdez ran aground in 1989 and leaked 11 million gallons of crude oil, polluting more than 1,000 miles of Alaska's shore and killing tens of thousands of birds and marine animals.

In a written statement, ExxonMobil said: "The current request for funding appears to be focused primarily if not exclusively on the hypothesis that remaining weathered oil could be capable of causing biological impacts. That is no more than a hypothesis."

The company said it agrees that "small pockets of sequestered and degraded oil residues" remain in spots on less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the affected shoreline. But it said "there is no scientific evidence that this oil ... could cause damage to any population or species. Speculation and hypothesis do not amount to proof."

ExxonMobil also said the existence of small pockets of residue was expected at the time of the 1991 agreement and noted that about $145 million of the $900 million paid by Exxon to the oil spill trustees is still available.

"If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair, it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem, and we are confident that they would have done so," the statement said.

Government officials said the leftover money has been earmarked for other restoration projects.

The company added, "Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate. Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

ExxonMobil recorded a profit of $36.1 billion in 2005, the largest-ever annual amount for a U.S. firm, and former Exxon boss Lee Raymond walked away with a retirement package worth roughly $400 million.

DOJ_NMG_0031329

In a conference call, federal and state officials expressed disappointment at ExxonMobil's response, and said they hope to come to an agreement with the company over the next 90 days. If no agreement is reached in that time, a "formal claim" would be filed.

The officials said much of the $750 million that has been spent so far went toward acquiring land, and little was used on "restoration on the land and species."

"We have created an environment where Mother Nature can restore itself," one official said, adding that rather than being "weathered," some of the remaining oil is "as fresh as the day it was spilled."

That was not expected, based on experience with other oil spills, the official said.

"It wasn't until the late '90s we realized that oil was persisting, much more than we would have predicted, because the science just wasn't there," the official said.

Exxon Resists Claim For More Oil Spill Cash (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty In Houston

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

ExxonMobil on Thursday refuted the US government's claim that it should pay $92m more to clean up Alaska 17 years after the Exxon Valdez tanker accident resulted in the US's largest oil spill.

The US Justice department and the Alaska Department of Law said studies showed residual oil from the 1989 spill in the inter-tidal zone of beaches, which they had not anticipated "would remain toxic and continue to impact natural resources".

Exxon already paid $900m in a civil settlement, yet that settlement had a "re-opener clause'' stating Exxon could be required to pay up to an additional $100m for unforeseen natural resource damages.

The company said it would study the request before responding, but added, "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

Exxon argues that the request appears focused primarily, if not exclusively, on the hypothesis that remaining oil could be capable of causing biological harm.

"That is no more than a hypothesis," Exxon said.

While Exxon agrees small pockets of oil remain on less than two-tenths of 1 per cent of the shoreline, it says there is no scientific evidence the oil could damage any population or species.

Yet the federal and state governments said there was "substantial loss of habitat" from the oil.

They said predators that feed in the inter-tidal - primarily harlequin ducks and sea otters - showed reduced survival rates in oiled areas and seemed to avoid locations with extensive lingering oil.

In addition, they said, subsistence users avoid harvesting in oiled areas because of concerns over contamination.

"Removal of lingering subsurface oil, which remains bio-available and toxic 17 years after the spill, is a necessary step in the effort to restore this environment," said Mark Rey, undersecretary of the Department of Agriculture.

The federal and state governments assert that current science supports their position that the continuing bio-availability and toxicity of the lingering oil could not reasonably have been anticipated.

Exxon said remaining pockets of oil were anticipated in 1991, when the federal and state governments pointed to evidence from prior spills and acknowledged oil would remain for 20 years or more.

The issue could add fuel to recent debates in Congress about whether the big oil companies are profiting on the backs of consumers in this record oil-price environment, with Exxon's unwillingness to hand over the money possibly seen as further proof of greediness.

Government Wants $92 Million More From Exxon Mobil Over Oil Spill (AP)

By JEANNETTE J. LEE, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, June 2, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Federal and state authorities asked the Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday for an additional $92 million to clean up residual oil from 1989's devastating Exxon Valdez spill.

DOJ_NMG_0031330

They said studies in the last five years have shown oil from the tanker's grounding still lingers in the tidal zones of Prince William Sound. The oil is reducing survival rates of some marine species and is disrupting fishing in the region, according to a joint statement released Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department and the state's Department of Law.

"It is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill," Alaska Attorney General David Marquez said Thursday.

The nation's largest oil spill emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989, killing hundreds of thousands of birds and marine animals and fouling more than 1,200 miles of rocky beach.

Irving, Texas-based Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill required in a 1991 civil settlement.

A "reopener" provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million.

To claim the money, state and federal officials must prove that a population, habitat or species had suffered loss or decline in the area of the spill, and link that loss to the spill. They also must prove the loss was not known or anticipated when the settlement was signed.

Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Company spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Thursday the request is based on "hypothesis."

"Nothing we have seen so far indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified," Boudreaux said in a statement.

More than $100 million of the $900 million Exxon has paid has not yet been spent. Officials said they expect that to become an issue in negotiations.

"It was (their) duty to use this money to remedy the problem," Boudreaux said.

Most of that remaining money has already been set aside to help the flagging herring fishery, which has dwindled since 1993, said Craig Tillery, an Alaska deputy attorney general.

The state has until Sept. 1 to make financial demands of Exxon Mobil under the reopener provision. State and federal officials were required to provide the company with detailed plans and costs for any rehabilitation project at least 90 days before that date.

Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the sound. The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal.

The claim is separate from an unresolved punitive damage judgment of $4.5 billion against the company, which it is appealing.

Exxon Asked To Pay $92 Mln More In Valdez Oil Spill (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, June 2, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government and Alaska will seek an additional $92 million from Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's largest oil company, for the 1989 spill caused by the crash of the Exxon Valdez tanker. The company has already paid $900 million in the case.

The decision to pursue extra damages for environmental clean-up was announced by the Justice Department today in Washington. Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil said there are no grounds for reopening the settlement.

``Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate," the company said in an e-mailed statement. ``Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

The accident poured 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in Alaska, the worst oil spill in U.S. history. A 1991 settlement included a so-called re-opener provision permitting the state and federal governments to seek up to $100 million in additional damages for problems unforeseen at the time.

In making today's request, the federal and state governments contend that the presence of lingering oil in the sound's shoreline has caused a ``substantial loss" of habitat, particularly for harlequin ducks and sea otters.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, chief of the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division, said in a statement that the state and federal governments ``are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time'' of the settlement.

Exxon has 90 days to consider the request for the extra payments. The company said it probably will reject the claim, forcing the governments to pursue the matter in federal court.

``Prince William Sound is healthy, robust and it's thriving,'' Mark Boudreaux, an Exxon Mobil spokesman, said in an interview.

The company's stock fell 33 cents to $60.58 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 3:08 p.m.

Exxon Mobil reaped $36.1 billion in 2005, the biggest annual profit for any company in U.S. history. The company, which traces its roots to the 1880s and John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil Trust, amassed cash holdings of $36.5 billion as of March 31.

The company is appealing to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals a $4.5 billion punitive damage award to fisheries, native Alaskans, cannery workers and landowners over the Valdez spill.

Gold Prospector Sees Chance For Big Strike In Toxic-Waste Dump (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

BUCKSKIN, Nev. -- Dave Pruett has prospected for gold for 46 years in mines from Arizona to the Amazon. He thinks he has finally found his big fortune in a pile of toxic waste in this desert ghost town.

Mr. Pruett's hope lies in nearly 200,000 tons of rubble sitting in man-made containment ponds outside a defunct mine. The rubble is laced with cyanide that Nevada regulators say threatens water supplies. But Mr. Pruett believes the pile, which is the waste, or tailings, left over from a previous mine, contains as much as 30,000 ounces of gold. Woven in with crushed rock and other material in a sort of rubble stew, that gold was considered not worth extracting.

But with gold prices having soared, the precious metal in the pile is suddenly worth around $20 million, Mr. Pruett figures. He has begun hauling truckloads of the waste to a larger mine that has facilities to extract the gold. "Maybe, just maybe, this will be the big one," Mr. Pruett says.

The run-up in gold prices over the past few years -- the futures price stood at $627.60 a troy ounce yesterday -- has ignited a mining frenzy in Nevada, the biggest gold-producing state. It has led some mining companies to reopen mines with low-grade reserves that previously weren't profitable to extract. A 26-year high for the U.S. gold price was reached last month, well over $700.

In Nevada, most of the remaining gold lies deep underground, and the state's $3.7 billion-a-year gold-mining industry is dominated by big corporations with the technology and machinery to dig it out. But here and there are a few small-stake prospectors -- independent fortune seekers like Mr. Pruett who are a throwback to the gold rushes of yore. "He's a dying breed," says Royce Hackworth, owner of a drilling company in Elko, Nev.

The 68-year-old Mr. Pruett is racing against the chance gold prices may crash again. He rarely takes a day off as he shuttles between his pile, about 80 miles southeast of Reno, and a larger mine 350 miles away that extracts the gold. On a recent day, Wayne Monyihan and Wayne Monyihan Jr. -- a father-and-son team who call themselves the Sagebrush Express -- were each set to haul 20 tons of his ground-up waste rock on their 18-wheel tractor-trailers.

Digging in his toxic pit, Mr. Pruett uses a Caterpillar 966 bulldozer to push the black, clay-like waste into a heap. Mr. Pruett uses a Mitsubishi Excavator to scoop giant buckets of the material onto a dump truck, which then loads the waste onto the big-rig trucks. He then either hauls loads himself or pays the Monyihans to drive it to the bigger mine operator, where the waste rock goes into a mill. The gold is extracted after the rubble that contains it is burned for fuel to help run the mine.

The bigger mine pays Mr. Pruett a percentage of the value of the gold that is extracted from the waste. Minus costs and payments to a financial backer, Mountain West Resources Inc., of Vancouver, British Columbia, Mr. Pruett hopes to net about $5 million from his pile of waste. So far, he and Mountain West -- they split the proceeds equally -- have netted a check for $7,939.33 and are expecting another for about $35,000.

A descendant of Mormon settlers, Mr. Pruett grew up on a Nevada sheep and cattle ranch. "Mining is a big adventure compared to herding sheep," he says. "It's like being on a treasure hunt."

As a young man, he bought a small gold mine for $10,000 and sold it for $40,000, he says. He later bought stakes in mines across Nevada, Arizona and California, most containing gold but others containing lead, zinc, silver and copper.

By the mid-1990s, according to a Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing in 1995, he had about $15 million in assets, including ranchland and equipment like rock crushers and Peterbilt trucks. Hoping to make more, he wandered the world, including the Amazon jungles of Brazil and Peru, looking for gold and other metals. He says he came away empty-handed.

He took his biggest gamble in 1994, he says, when he bought the toxic-waste pile he now hopes to make a fortune on. The waste pile, from a mine in California, was trucked to this spot -- next to the remains of a mine and boom town that opened in 1906 -- by a Canadian company in the 1980s. Nevada regulators say the company found California laws inhospitable to its plans to extract the gold. The cyanide in the waste came from a gold-leaching process considered more controversial in populous California than in remote Nevada. Cyanide leaches gold out of rock after the substance is poured over a pile of rubble.

With gold prices stagnant in the 1990s, the company turned the mine over to Mr. Pruett, who agreed, as his part of the deal, to assume its cleanup liabilities. In 1995, Mr. Pruett says, he began shipping the ore to a mine near Elko. But gold prices soon crashed, making it uneconomical to move the waste. Nevada regulators threatened to fine Mr. Pruett unless he kept cleaning up the mine and paying for water monitoring. To pay bills, he sold most of his land, including his grandfather's 1906 ranch home. On Dec. 31, 1995, he filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. "I was stuck," says Mr. Pruett, who is unmarried and lives with a longtime girlfriend.

A glimmer of hope came when gold prices began ticking up four years ago. He found a mine near Elko that could process his rubble, and he began hauling it himself in late 2004, racing up and down Interstate 80 in a Peterbilt truck. "I spent 60 days on the truck straight," he recalls. But Nevada regulators soon stopped him, saying he was unloading the waste improperly on the ground without any padding underneath to prevent contamination of ground water. The mine went on to use more of its own fuel source, mainly natural gas, as Mr. Pruett was left to scramble to find a new contract.

He made ends meet selling salvaged equipment he collects, such as truck trailers, office shelving and rusted steel stairwells. When his Peterbilt got stuck in a snowdrift for two months just before Christmas in 2004, he was left without much income. "He's always got good intentions," says Doug Driesner, mining services director of the Nevada Commission on Mineral Resources, "but he hasn't always had good luck."

Mr. Pruett's luck may have turned this time. The surge in gold prices made his toxic pile here more valuable than ever. Last month, he started trucking it out again, to a mine owned by Canada's Queenstake Resources Ltd.

Between hauling trips Mr. Pruett drives a battered 1996 Ford F-150 pickup he bought for $300 at a mine auction. He bought two more pickups like it for $300 apiece and leaves them scattered around Nevada -- keys in the ignition -- in case he needs one to haul a piece of junk equipment he stumbles across.

As two big-rig loads of rubble were about to head out on a recent run, Mr. Pruett went on ahead in his pickup to spend the night at the Val U Motel in Winnemucca, Nev. The next morning, he headed up to Queenstake's Jarrett Canyon mine in the sage-covered foothills north of Elko to renew his hauling contract with local mine managers.

Even if he finally gets his gold fortune, it probably won't entice him into retirement. "It's kind of like a disease, this prospecting thing," Mr. Pruett says. "I don't know if I can quit."

Greenpeace Just Kidding About Armageddon (WP)

By Philly.com

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

The environmental activist group Greenpeace wanted to be prepared to counter President Bush's visit last week to Pennsylvania to promote his nuclear energy policy.

DOJ_NMG_0031333

"This volatile and dangerous source of energy" is no answer to the country's energy needs, shouted a Greenpeace fact sheet, decrying the "threat" posed by the reactors Bush visited in Limerick.

But after that assertion, the Greenpeace authors were apparently stumped while searching for the ideal menacing metaphor.

"In the twenty years since the Chernobyl tragedy, the world's worst nuclear accident, there have been nearly [FILL IN ALARMIST AND ARMAGEDDONIST FACTOID HERE]," the sheet said.

The Greenpeace spokesman who issued the memo, Steve Smith, told the Web site that a colleague was making a joke in a draft that was then mistakenly released.

The final version did not mention Armageddon; instead it warned of plane crashes and reactor meltdowns.

Bush Admin. Wants To Cut Meth Use 15 Pct. (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration wants to cut methamphetamine use in the United States by 15 percent by 2009, relying on cooperation with Mexico and steps at home that include expanded random drug testing in schools.

Administration officials said Thursday they have reduced the number of U.S. labs that make meth but have not been able to stem the flow of the cheap and highly addictive drug from Mexico, estimated to be the source of 80 percent of the U.S. supply.

Most of the details of the administration's synthetic drug control strategy have been previously announced, including new specialized enforcement teams on both sides of the border.

Fewer than 600,000 Americans use meth, just two-tenths of 1 percent of the nation's population, according to administration estimates. But more than the half the nation's counties count meth as their top problem, said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

He said the administration supports increased drug testing in schools as a sort of early warning program.

"It is a way to cut down student failure, truancy, gang membership," Walters said. The decision to test students will remain with individual districts, he said.

Many states and the federal Combat Meth Act, signed into law in March, have made meth ingredients like pseudoephedrine harder to obtain. Federal drug agents and local police shut down 11,189 meth labs in the first 10 months of 2005, 26 percent fewer closures than over the same period a year earlier.

New Policy Aims To Reduce Meth, Prescription Drug Abuse (SH)

"Although teen drug use in the United States has dropped by nearly 20 percent over the last three years," said John Walters, director of national drug control policy, "we will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market. The aggressive measures called for in the synthetics strategy build upon significant progress already made as a result of law enforcement efforts."

Methamphetamine is also known by many more street names such as ice, speed and crystal meth. It is highly addictive and can be injected, snorted, smoked or swallowed. It can be produced in small, hard-to-detect labs and is made with materials that have been easy to find.

Walter said drug use "is a behavior that starts with our youth in the United States. If you don't try by age 20, you're unlikely to go on and try."

Walters said the strategy has three goals over the next three years:

* To reduce methamphetamine use by15 percent.

* To reduce the number of meth labs by 25 percent.

* To reduce prescription drug abuse by 15 percent.

The policy also lays out ways to prevent the distribution and use of methamphetamine.

This starts with extensive communication and what Walters called a "unique expression of cooperation" with Mexico and other international partners, including India, Germany and China.

That will include tightening control over shipments of so-called precursor chemicals, or raw materials needed to make meth.

"If you can cut off the precursor, you can see the number of small, toxic labs go down dramatically," Walters said.

Methamphetamine is cheap and easy to produce. Legislation approved last year required that products – mainly cold medications – that contained pseudoephedrine, one of meth's main ingredients, be kept behind store counters. It also limited how much can be sold to an individual.

The use of methamphetamine was originally a problem in only select parts of the country. However it has now spread worldwide. Mike Braun, chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, referred use of methamphetamine as a "global epidemic."

"The synthetic strategy is a comprehensive plan that focuses on reducing the supply of methamphetamine and controlled substance prescription drugs through aggressive enforcement efforts," said Rachel Brand, assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy.

Walters said controlling illegal immigration will help control illegal drug imports.

"This is not an either or," he said.

Feds Set Goal To Cut U.S. Meth Use By 15 Percent (DMR)

Des Moines Register, June 2, 2006

Washington, D.C. – The Bush administration called today for cutting methamphetamine use by 15 percent over the next three years and continuing a sharp decline in the domestic labs that have plagued rural states like Iowa.

A national methamphetamine strategy released by the administration included recommendations to increase random testing of school students and use of special courts to handle drug addicts.

The administration said that much of the production of U.S.-consumed meth has shifted to larger labs in Mexico and other countries. U.S. and Mexican officials said they are working to cut the flow of precursor chemicals to Mexico and to shut down labs in that country.

"We will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market," said John Walters, the White House director of national drug control policy.

The administration's plan is a "balanced effort on supply and demand," he said.

The administration strategy document said there had been a sharp decline in meth use in the country and attributed much of the decline to measures taken by states, including restrictions on the sale of pseudoephedrine, a key chemical used in making meth.

The document cited Iowa's annual drug control strategy as an example of the way states had laid out plans to combat meth use in collaboration with law enforcement, prevention specialists and others.

The administration's plan did not set any goals for reducing international production, in part because officials doesn't know how much is currently going on, according to Walters.

There are a "variety of sources of meth" in Mexico, he said, referring to the country's meth-manufacturing rings. "Some of this is dynamic, it's moving."

He said the first priority was to cut off shipments to Mexico of precursor chemicals such as pseudoephedrine.

The 15-percent decline in meth use targeted by administration's plan would amount to 5 percent a year for 2006, 2007 and 2008. Recent trends indicate that the goal is achievable, the plan said.

Feds Take Global Approach To Meth Abuse (ABC)

By JOHN YANG And JASON RYAN

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration unveiled today a new global approach to curbing the production and abuse of methamphetamine, a highly addictive party drug produced in clandestine labs.

"It is a specific focus on methamphetamine and prescription drugs that have become, as you all know, a growing part of the drug problem in this country over the last decade," John Walters, the White House director of national control policy, told a news conference. "This represents a commitment of the administration to work toward a meaningful and a sustained reduction in meth use as well as the number of meth labs that have been poisoning too many communities."

In the past year, federal, state and local law enforcement authorities have seized about 11,000 small labs that produced an estimated 20 percent of methamphetamine sold in the United States.

The goal is to cut methamphetamine abuse 15 percent by 2008 and reduce the production from illegal meth labs in the United States by 25 percent.

To do that, the departments of Justice, State and Homeland Security will work to improve intelligence on the global market of the chemicals used to make methamphetamine, which are produced in China, India and Germany. The United States will also work with Mexico to step up law enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexican border, the site of much of the trafficking in both methamphetamine and its component chemicals.

"Mexico and the United States' joint battle against drugs has reached an unprecedented level," Eduardo Ibarrola, the deputy chief of mission at the Mexican Embassy in Washington, told reporters. "Under no circumstance can our common border be an excuse for impunity."

In addition, the strategy calls for strict enforcement of laws — part of the Patriot Act extension that President Bush signed in March — that restrict the sales of many common cold and allergy remedies that can be used to make methamphetamine.

Many states had already acted to restrict sales of those over-the-counter drugs.

Bush Adds To Drug Kingpin List (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

President Bush added three accused drug traffickers and two reputed crime organizations to the U.S. list of foreign drug kingpins on Thursday, denying them access to the American financial system and barring them from trade with U.S. companies and individuals.

The additions bring to 62 the number of individuals and entities designated under the 1999 Kingpin Act to target significant foreign narcotic dealers, their organizations and operatives worldwide.

The three individuals added to the list were Dawood Ibrahim of India, Fahd Jamil Georges of Brazil and Ali Naway of Iran. The organizations are the Dawood Ibrahim Organization in India, Pakistan and United Arab Emirates and the Amezcua Contreras Organization in Mexico.

Man Receives 15 Years (HARTC)

By Annie Tasker, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, June 2, 2006

A 32-year-old Hartford man was sentenced Tuesday to more than 15 years in federal prison for conspiracy to possess crack cocaine with intent to distribute.

Kaniel "Beevis" Forrester pleaded guilty on Aug. 23, 2005, to charges that he conspired to possess and distribute between 150 and 500 grams of crack, according to a statement released by the U.S. Justice Department.

Forrester, who his lawyer said has been on the streets since he was about 15, was on probation for a previous narcotics charge at the time of his arrest, federal law enforcement officials said.

"Unfortunately, he turned to the wrong way to make money," said his attorney, Walter Hussey.

Forrester was sentenced to 182 months in prison, and Hussey said he expects Forrester to serve about 10 years of the sentence. He also will have to complete a 500-hour drug program, Hussey said.

Forrester, a father of two, could be deported back to Jamaica after he finishes his sentence and five years of supervised release.

"It's going to be rough for him," said Hussey, adding that upon his release his client will have been away from Jamaica for more than 20 years. Forrester has hired an attorney to determine his status upon release.

Operation Big Boy, an investigation run by the FBI and the Hartford police, led to Forrester and his brother, Negus Forrester, after months of surveillance, wiretapping, crack seizures and purchases.

It led to the arrests of about 60 cocaine dealers and buyers in the Hartford area. Investigators found that Kaniel Forrester bought crack in the form of "half cookies," or 63-gram units, from his brother on several occasions, documents say.

In two phone conversations recorded Sept. 26, 2004, shortly after a crack delivery, Negus Forrester told his brother he "has it." Minutes later, Negus Forrester called again and told Kaniel that he would need to bring a knife or razor, purportedly to help cut and bag the new supply of crack, court records say.

U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said in a sentencing memorandum that the calls were considered evidence by the FBI that Negus Forrester bought crack from an accomplice, and that Kaniel Forrester was involved in the transaction.

Negus Forrester is awaiting sentencing after pleading guilty on Aug. 8, 2005, to involvement in narcotics conspiracy, federal officials said.

Desert Sun, June 1, 2006

Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary earlier this week, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner.

"I don't have anything to hide," said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert, on Thursday.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation.

Hochanadel said the box, located at a Coachella Valley Canyon National Bank branch, contained nothing, which investigators soon discovered.

According to the warrant, the search took place at 2:40 p.m. on Monday, as part of an investigation into suspected violations of federal drug trafficking laws.

"This is harassment. ... I guess they thought I had money stashed away," Hochanadel said.

Ahtens Banner Herald, June 2, 2006

Two Athens brothers will serve long sentences in federal prison after they pleaded guilty to being part of a local cocaine distribution ring.

A U.S. District Court judge in Macon on Tuesday sentenced Antron Ricardo Bishop, 24, and Antonio Ramon Bishop, 22, after they pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine, acting Middle District U.S. Attorney G.F. Peterman III announced Thursday.

"Beginning in 2000 and continuing until November 2005, both Bishop brothers and other co-conspirators were part of a group of individuals distributing crack cocaine throughout the Athens-Clarke County area," Peterman said in a prepared statement.

Antron Bishop was sentenced to 14 years in prison, and his younger brother was sentenced to just under six years behind bars.

Antonio Bishop, who dodged a murder conviction when a Clarke County jury acquitted him in the 2002 shooting death of 21-year-old Athens resident La Cedric "Ced" Shields, still faces allegations he tried to murder another Athens man two years later in a drive-by shooting on North Avenue.

In April 2005, a Clarke County jury deadlocked on aggravated assault charges for the July 2004 shooting and a mistrial was declared. A new trial date has not been set.

Since the Bishops and several other conspirators have been arrested, violent crime in the county has decreased, according to Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger.

"I would say it's had an impact on crime, which is down overall," said Hunsinger, who supervises the Athens-Clarke Police Department's Drug and Vice Unit. "A lot of the programs the police department has in effect have decreased crime, and one of those programs has been targeting crack cocaine activity."

A countywide sweep of street-level crack cocaine dealers last July netted more than 80 arrests, and local police have been working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to collar mid-level suppliers.

The DEA has provided some support, such as occasionally supplying "buy money" that Athens undercover police use to purchase illegal drugs during their investigations, police said.

By and large, however, the numerous cocaine-related arrests made in recent years were the result of local law enforcement efforts.

"We're pretty fortunate that we've got skilled investigators who can make cases that can be prosecuted on the federal level," Hunsinger said.

Drug Runner Sentenced To 90 Months (BSB)

Brighton Standard-Blade, June 1, 2006

A confessed drug runner who agreed to testify against his alleged fellow drug conspirators was sentenced May 18 to 7 1/2 years in federal prison, said U.S. Attorney Office spokesman Jeffrey Dorschner.

The sentence was slightly higher for 26-year-old Kenneth F. Fuqua of Brighton than prosecutors sought in exchange for Fuqua's continued cooperation with investigators. Prosecutors were asking for a lighter sentence in hopes of winning convictions against six others arrested in connection with a metrowide drug ring. As part of Fuqua's plea agreement, he agreed to testify against the others who are accused of moving large quantities of methamphetamine, cocaine and other drugs.

Once Fuqua finishes his 90-month sentence, he will serve five years supervised release and pay $100 to a victim's fund.

Fuqua told investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force that he ran drugs between Santiago Mena-Flores, 26, of Henderson, and runners of the drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Donald Jason Skinner, 31, of Longmont. He said he did so between January and June 2005. Children allegedly were used to move the drugs locally.

Mena-Flores was arrested at his Henderson home in December, and Skinner and four other men from Longmont were arrested at the end of the year or beginning of this year. Dorschner said those cases are in the motions phase and it could be several months before a trial date is set.

Man Killed In Blast Targeted Authorities (LONGNJ)

By Barbara Ramirez

Longview (TX) News-Journal, May 31, 2006

Longview fire official says victim faced federal firearm, drug charges

DOJ_NMG_0031338

A Longview man died Monday night while making a bomb he intended to use in retaliation against federal agents, local fire officials said.

James Charles Torrence, 38, who faced possible jail time for multiple federal indictments from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration, died in his North Longview home while putting together one of two homemade bombs.

Torrence made the bombs to retaliate against authorities with both federal law enforcement agencies, whom Torrence believed had built a case against him, according to Brian Howell, Longview Fire Department assistant fire marshal. Documents inside the home listed names of several bureau and administration agents, Howell said.

The Longview Fire Department responded to Torrence's home in the 200 block of Rowe Avenue shortly before 8:30 p.m. The home is about one mile south of Judson Middle School.

Fire officials determined a bomb had exploded inside the home, and agents with the ATF were called, Howell said.

He added that, inside the home, they found a substance that could be methamphetamine. They also found illegal weapons, including a machine gun and a pistol with a silencer. A second pipe bomb also was found.

Howell said Torrence had turned one of the home's three bedrooms into an office and used the office to build the bombs.

While putting the second pipe bomb together, the bomb exploded, instantly killing Torrence, Howell said.

Fire officials took the second bomb to a field behind the home to detonate it. Neighbors within a 300 foot radius of Torrence's home were ordered to evacuate, Howell said.

Some of Torrence's neighbors said Monday that loud noises often came from his home, and they believed the noises might have also been explosions.

Howell urged Longview residents to report all suspicious noises and activities to police and other authorities.

"We don't really have pockets (of people making homemade bombs)," Howell said. "But, we never really know who's going to be doing it. This could've been a lot worse."

U.S. Attorney Matt Orwig told The Associated Press that Torrence had agreed to plead guilty to being a felon in possession of a firearm and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine. He said Torrence was set to enter the plea June 7, and the drug charge carried a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison up to life.

"He would've gotten out of prison as an old man, if he got out at all," Orwig said.

Torrence's girlfriend, whose name has not been released, told authorities she wasn't aware of her boyfriend's activities. She was inside the home at the time of the explosions but was not injured. A more extensive interview with her is planned, Howell said.

The ATF and the Longview Fire Department spent nearly eight hours ridding the house of dangerous materials, Howell said.

MAN DIES BUILDING BOMB (TYLERT)

By Megan Middleton, Staff Writer

Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph, May 31, 2006

LONGVIEW - Authorities believe a man who died in an explosion Monday night in a north Longview home was in the process of making a pipe bomb he may have planned to use against people he thought "snitched" on him in a federal court case.

Longview Assistant Fire Marshal Brian Howell said by phone that the man who died was James Charles Torrence, 38, of Longview.

The explosion occurred in Torrence's home at 220 Rowe Avenue in Longview, Howell said. Authorities got the call about the explosion around 8:20 p.m. Monday.

"When you're putting a pipe bomb together like that, a lot of things that you do could cause it to go off," Howell said. "We really won't know if it was friction on the gun powder, static electricity or premature ignition of an ignition source. It's one of those things that during assembly, for whatever reason, it went off."

Although Torrence's girlfriend was also in the home at the time, no one else was injured in the explosion, Howell said. She was the one who called 911.

The room in which the explosion occurred suffered some damage, Howell said. There was no damage to any other homes.

Torrence suffered injuries to his head, chest, abdomen and multiple extremities, Howell said. It will not be clear what specifically caused his death until the autopsy is complete.

Howell said it is believed Torrence was making pipe bombs to retaliate against individuals he believed "snitched" on him in connection with a federal case against him. Howell said the individuals Torrence allegedly planned to use the bombs against actually were not related to the case. He told the Tyler Morning Telegraph he does not believe Torrence was targeting law enforcement agents.

Tom Crowley, a public information officer for the Dallas division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), said via phone that authorities discovered bomb-making literature, firearms and additional bomb-making material inside Torrence's residence.

Suspected methamphetamine and a second pipe bomb were also found, Howell said.

The Bossier City Bomb Squad was called in after the second device was discovered, Howell said. Eventually, that device was moved outside, placed in a hole and set off remotely. Before it was detonated, though, about 15 to 20 residents in the neighborhood were evacuated from their homes around 3:30 a.m.

"When you're dealing with a homemade explosive, you really don't know," he said. "First of all, we didn't know what was in there and secondly, you don't know how well it's built and the actual explosion that you'll get resulting from it."

He said Torrence's home was searched and anything dangerous or illegal was removed.

Torrence was likely acting alone in making these bombs, Howell said, noting Torrence seems to have been a "paranoid" man. He had installed cameras in the front of his house as well as a sensor, which would alert him if someone was in the driveway. He also had guns placed throughout the house.

"He was very paranoid," Howell said. "He had even been doing target practice down his hallway in the house with a (pistol). He could have caused a lot of damage and hurt a lot of people. We were very fortunate."

Howell said neighbors said that they had heard explosions coming from the home before. He urged people to report suspicious activity ahead of time.

"Somebody should have called 911 when they first heard the other explosions, and maybe this all could have been avoided," he said. "Obviously it's illegal to do this ... The first responders going in there to check on him and render aid could have been killed by the second device, had it gone off while they were there."

He said that device was on a shelf right beside Torrence. It was in a plastic case with arming and initiating devices.

"It was intact, ready to go," Howell said. "Depending on what the triggering mechanism was and how it worked, it could have been set off by the possibility of radio signals, somebody bumping the shelf next to it, knocking it over, reaching over moving it or pulling it."

Crowley said officials with the ATF have taken evidence from the residence that will eventually be sent to a lab in San Francisco. He said officials are looking to see what type of devices Torrence was putting together.

Howell said the investigation is wrapping up, aside from receiving test results.

"We're glad nobody else is going to be hurt because of this," he said. "Fortunately, the only one who did get hurt was the one making the bomb."

FEDERAL INDICTMENT

Torrence was facing an indictment on several federal drug- and gun-related charges, Matt Orwig, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Texas, confirmed.

Torrence had entered into a plea agreement on charges of felon in possession of a firearm, which carries with it a penalty not to exceed 10 years in prison, and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine, which carries with it a penalty of not less than 10 years and up to life in prison, Orwig said.

A plea hearing was scheduled for June 7 for him to formally enter his guilty plea in court.

Orwig said by phone Torrence was "facing a lot of time" in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0031340

In reference to the explosion and Torrence's death, Orwig said, "Every life is precious, and we're all sad that it happened. At the same time, I think it's very fortunate that no one else was injured and that a plan to use that bomb never materialized."

Pottersville Church Fire Called Suspicious (GLENSFPS)

By Don Lehman

Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star, June 2, 2006

Federal officials called in as part of investigation

POTTERSVILLE -- Christ Church Episcopal on Route 9 was destroyed by a suspicious fire late Tuesday, a blaze that came two weeks after two burglaries at the church in which religious phrases were scrawled inside the building, officials said.

"We believe, at this point, the fire was deliberately set," Warren County Sheriff Larry Cleveland said.

Investigators from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the state Office of Fire Prevention and Control, the Warren County Office of Fire Prevention and the Warren County Sheriff's Department were on the scene, sifting through the charred remnants throughout much of the day Wednesday.

The church's walls remained standing in places, but part of the roof had collapsed.

Pottersville Fire Chief Guy Swartwout said a cause had not been determined, but the area of origin appeared to be in the southeast corner of the building, which church officials on their Web site called the "sacristy."

A sacristy is a room in a church where sacred items are kept.

Cleveland said the fire started inside the building.

ATF was brought in because federal law requires the agency be notified when a church fire occurs where the cause is not clearly identifiable, said Warren County Fire Coordinator Marvin Lemery. That statute was put in place after a spate of arson fires at southern churches in the late 1990s.

"Anything where there is something that looks like it could be the least bit suspicious (at a church), you need to notify ATF," he said. "That (burglary history) was enough to say we should get these guys in to look whether this was done to cover a burglary or there was something else going on."

During the May 11 and 13 burglaries, the person or persons who went in the church scrawled religious phrases and stole religious items, officials said.

Church leaders had put digital surveillance cameras in the building to try to catch whoever was responsible for the break-ins. Investigators located the cameras in the rubble Wednesday and were working to recover images from them, officials said.

A witness reported seeing a person in front of the church about 10:30 p.m., authorities said.

The fire was called in by a passer-by around 11 p.m. Tuesday, Swartwout said. When firefighters arrived, the blaze had engulfed much of the building, he said.

"There was a lot of fire, and it had gotten way ahead of us," Swartwout said. "Church buildings are notorious (for fast spread of fire) because of their big, open spaces."

The building dates back to the 1920s. An addition was added to the back of the building last year, Swartwout said.

Much of Pottersville is dominated by Word of Life Bible Institute, a religious school and retreat that is not affiliated with Christ Church Episcopal.

Christ Church Episcopal's pastor, the Rev. Robert Limpert, did not return a phone call for comment and would not discuss the fire with Post-Star news partner WNYT-TV NewsChannel 13 at the fire scene Wednesday.

He was interviewed by sheriff's investigators at the fire scene for nearly 90 minutes Wednesday.

It could not be determined Wednesday where the church planned to hold its Sunday services.

Pottersville firefighters were assisted by their counterparts from Horicon, Chestertown and Riverside.

Anyone with information in the case is asked to call 743-2500.

Bush Urges Compromise On Immigration Bill (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, June 1, 2006

President Bush pressed a passionately divided Congress on Thursday to reach election-year compromise on immigration legislation that provides a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants already in the country.

With his speech before business leaders and members of a government-sponsored civilian volunteer group, Bush hoped to build momentum for Senate and House negotiators to resolve difficult disputes. The two houses have passed sharply different versions of the legislation. To achieve one of his top domestic priorities of the year, Bush will have to bring around conservatives in his own party.

"It's a difficult task," Bush pointedly told Congress in remarks at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

The House bill generally is limited to border enforcement, making all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and cracking down on employers who hire illegals. The Senate version includes more money for border security, creates a guest worker program to bring in new foreign workers, and provides a shot at citizenship for many of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

"The American people expect us to meet our responsibility and deliver immigration reform that fixes the problems in the current system," Bush said. "All of the elements of this problem must be addressed together, or none of them will be solved at all."

Bush also will travel to several cities next week — Artesia, N.M., Laredo, Texas, and Omaha, Neb. — to pitch his immigration approach, the White House announced Thursday.

There is skepticism that a compromise can be reached in a year when most of Congress is up for re-election, and many believe Republicans could be at risk of losing their control over one or both chambers.

The president sought in his speech to provide a roadmap to lawmakers on the negotiating teams. He spoke more specifically about legislative provisions that he supports than he has previously.

He said any measure must include a temporary worker program and the opportunity for eventual citizenship. The Chamber has supported Bush's approach, which would provide cheap labor for many jobs.

Though Bush acknowledged that illegal immigration has put pressure on U.S. schools and hospitals, spawned more crime and caused other problems, he also stress immigrants' importance to American society and the practical benefits of establishing a guest worker program.

"They are part of American life and they're vital to our economy," he said. "And yet they're beyond the reach and protection of American law."

He took on — albeit gently — those in the Republican Party who advocate a get-tough-only approach and staunchly oppose either a guest worker program or a path to citizenship.

"Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this country illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country, and that any plan to allow them to stay equals amnesty, no matter how many conditions we impose," Bush said. "Listen, I appreciate the members that are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that. Yet I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic."

The president ticked through other provisions he considers crucial for a bill to be effective.

He asked Congress to provided additional funding and the legal authority to end "once and for all" the country's much criticized "catch and release" policy, in which illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico are ticketed and freed. He said the practice has been ended for key Central American countries, but additional detention space and legal changes are needed to expand that.

Bush also embraced several changes that would make it easier for employers to verify that their workers are legal, including:

_Allow immigration officials to be notified when an employer is notified by the Social Security Administration that the name of one of their workers does not match the worker's Social Security number.

DOJ_NMG_0031342

_Require that all employers use a now-optional government program called Basic Pilot to verify employees' Social Security numbers and check them against other federal databases. Both the House and Senate bills include such a requirement

And he endorsed stiffer penalties for companies that fail to check an employee's identification and knowingly hire an illegal immigrant. "We're not going to tolerate it in this country," the president said.

'Unscrupulous' Firms Are Faulted (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

President Bush told the nation's most prominent business group yesterday that "unscrupulous" employers have contributed to the illegal immigration crisis in the United States by knowingly hiring undocumented workers, and called for steep new penalties on those exploiting the shadow economy.

As part of his emerging public campaign for the immigration legislation pending in Congress, Bush visited the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to emphasize his focus on enforcement and to combat the conservative complaint that his immigration proposals add up to amnesty for millions of foreigners violating U.S. immigration law.

"Businesses that knowingly employ illegal workers undermine this law and undermine the spirit of America," the president said during a speech against a backdrop of U.S. flags, images of the Statue of Liberty and the slogan "Comprehensive Immigration Reform." "And we're not going to tolerate it in this country." Although most businesses abide by the law, he said, "there are some unscrupulous folks who want to take advantage of low-cost labor."

Bush's speech came hours before his administration reached an agreement with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has criticized Bush's plan to dispatch 6,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican line to bolster overwhelmed Border Patrol agents, but he agreed yesterday to contribute 1,000 troops as long as the federal government picks up the full cost.

The president has tried to straddle a difficult political divide in the fight over immigration. For years, he has been promoting a guest-worker program that would allow millions of illegal immigrants already in the country to stay temporarily under certain conditions. He has also embraced a Senate plan that would offer a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants if they have been here for years, pay back taxes, pay a penalty, learn English and maintain a crime-free record.

At the same time, under withering criticism from within his own party, Bush has lately offered tough rhetoric and the National Guard plan to demonstrate his commitment to enforcing the law and to stop new waves of illegal immigrants from crossing the border. The Guard troops would stay until the government can hire an additional 6,000 Border Patrol agents. The House has passed legislation that focuses almost exclusively on enforcement and has resisted the Senate bill.

Bush used the occasion yesterday to press both sides in Congress to come up with a deal. He suggested that he is willing to concede some of what he wants. "The House and Senate bills will require effort and compromise on both sides," he said. "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

The chamber was an important setting for that message because corporate America has been among the leading forces backing Bush's guest-worker plan and the Senate approach, seeing the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants as a vital part of the U.S. economy.

Bush noted that the government is working to make it easier for businesses to check the status of would-be workers. He said both House and Senate bills would require employers to use a new online verification system called Basic Pilot. But he said the penalties for violating the law are too light, noting that a business that fails to check an employee's identification faces a fine as low as $100, and that one that knowingly hires an illegal immigrant faces a fine as low as $250.

"You might as well pay a speeding ticket," Bush said. He added: "We got to increase the penalties. If we want to be smart about work site enforcement, we got to say to somebody who's breaking the law, there's going to be a cost, and it's more than $250."

Bush Tries To Regain His Footing On Once-rock-solid Conservative Base (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

WASHINGTON — Whether President Bush is talking about a get-tough border policy or the importance of judicial restraint — he discussed both Thursday — he is sure to throw in an appeal these days to wavering conservative supporters.

Bush and his aides are playing up items such as tighter borders and judges who "administer the law" rather than make it, seeking to reconnect with conservative Republicans whose support has shrunk in recent polls — and whose votes will be critical in this fall's congressional elections.

Bush used to be able to count on overwhelming support from Republicans and conservatives, but the Iraq war and a variety of other issues have eroded that backing.

A May 5-7 USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found Bush's approval among Republicans at 68%, down from 85% in early January. Among conservatives — who also include some Democrats and independents — Bush's support fell to 52%, from 73% in January.

Now the White House is on a campaign to get that support back. Some examples:

On Thursday, the White House staged a special Rose Garden swearing-in for Brett Kavanaugh, recently confirmed by the Senate for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The White House fought a three-year battle to confirm Kavanaugh. He has been a priority for conservatives but anathema to some Democrats, who noted his role as an aide to independent counsel Ken Starr during the impeachment of President Clinton and said he was too partisan to be a judge.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., described him as a "political pick being pushed for political reasons."

Another White House event will occur next week when Bush will talk about the importance of a constitutional amendment that would bar gay marriage by defining marriage as being between a man and a woman, a major issue for social and religious conservatives.

The president is scheduled to renew his call for a line-item veto, arguing it will help him rein in the runaway federal spending that has been another nagging source of conservative discontent. Bush has also challenged the GOP-controlled Senate over extra money in a special spending bill for the costs of wars and hurricanes. The House passed a $92.2 billion measure, but the Senate added about $14 billion. "If they bust the $92.2 billion, I'm going to veto it," Bush said Thursday.

Bush's backing for a "comprehensive" overhaul of immigration laws infuriates some conservatives because it includes proposals to allow illegal immigrants to work here temporarily and would permit some to seek citizenship. Recently, though, Bush has emphasized tougher border enforcement and a crackdown on companies that hire illegal immigrants, both strongly supported by conservatives. In a speech Thursday to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce here, Bush said, "We don't have full control of this border. And I'm determined to change that."

Says Republican strategist Rich Galen: "What (the Bush administration is) doing is reaching back out to the people who elected them in the first place."

GOP consultants say renewing conservative support could help Bush raise his approval rating, which hit the lowest point of his presidency — 31% — in early May. It could also make a difference this fall, when conservative turnout will be crucial to Republican hopes of retaining Congress.

Republican pollster Bill McInturff says his polling shows that rank-and-file conservative Republicans still support Bush by about 80%. He acknowledges that vocal "radio talk show conservatives" — those who listen to Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity and others — are angry with the president over immigration and other issues.

McInturff says Bush needs to reach out to conservatives on border security. "The public needs to be more assured that more is being done to stop illegals from entering the country, and penalizing employers who hire them," McInturff says.

Democratic strategist Jenny Backus says she has noticed Bush's new "dance moves" with conservatives. She adds that worries about White House leadership on issues such as the Iraq war cross ideological lines, and Bush may not be able to win back his core supporters if he can't fix that.

"The (conservative) base cares about Iraq, too," Backus says.

A key test for Bush is whether conservative Republicans show up at the polls this fall. GOP strategist Tom Edmonds says that while most disillusioned GOP conservatives won't vote for Democrats, they could "sit on their hands" and rob GOP candidates of the votes they need to win.

"Time is on our side," Edmonds says. "We don't need to make wholesale changes. We just need to kind of get our act together."

GOP consultant Charles Black says that despite all Bush's political problems, the president remains a potent fundraiser.

"In some places, we will have to outspend our opponents," he says. "We just have to make sure everyone has enough money to do that."

Bush Chides Party Members On Immigration (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

WASHINGTON, June 1 — Beginning a public relations offensive intended to prod divided Congressional Republicans into overhauling the nation's immigration laws, President Bush rebuked conservative opponents of his plan on Thursday and warned that there is "no excuse" for delay.

With Congress set to return to Washington on Monday after a one-week recess, some Republicans have suggested they may fare better at the polls in November if the House and Senate wait until after Election Day to reconcile their vastly different immigration bills.

But Mr. Bush made clear in a speech at the United States Chamber of Commerce that he did not want Congress to wait. Next week, the president will take his case for what he calls "comprehensive immigration reform" on the road, with appearances in New Mexico and Nebraska.

"The House and Senate bill will require effort and compromise on both sides," Mr. Bush told a friendly audience gathered at the chamber's headquarters, across the street from the White House. "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

Whether Mr. Bush can bring his party's warring factions together remains to be seen. On one side are conservatives who support the House bill, which declares illegal immigrants felons and would have them deported. On the other are those, like the president, who prefer the Senate version, which would open the way for many of the estimated 11 million people living in the United States illegally to become citizens.

In his speech, Mr. Bush took aim at House members who brand the Senate bill amnesty, though he did not mention any by name. "Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country," he said. The lawmakers are "are acting on deeply felt principles," he said, but added, "I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic."

Bush Shuns Republicans' Stand To Return Illegals (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

President Bush yesterday rejected House Republicans' stance that illegal aliens must return home, calling it "wrong and unrealistic" and saying many will have to be allowed to stay.

Speaking to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a block from the White House, Mr. Bush also directly challenged businesses to hire only legal workers, and said those that don't should be prepared to face increased fines. In addition, he said both the House and Senate will have to compromise, but said voters expect a bill and he said that bill should tackle both enforcement and a pathway to citizenship for illegal aliens.

"The difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it," he said.

Mr. Bush was making his first in-depth comments since the Senate passed its broad immigration bill last week, setting up a showdown over immigration policy with the House, which passed an enforcement bill in December.

Last Friday, and again on Sunday, Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said he cannot accept any approach that allows illegal aliens to stay in the country with the government's approval.

DOJ_NMG_0031345

"The words 'path to citizenship' is a buzzword for amnesty. We ought to be honest -- it is amnesty," Mr. Sensenbrenner, a key House negotiator, said on NBC's "Meet the Press" program. He contends that more enforcement against employers would make it hard for illegal aliens to get jobs, encouraging them to go home.

But Mr. Bush dismissed that argument.

"Listen, I appreciate the members are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that. Yet I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic," he said.

He said his own plan to allow illegal aliens with "a home, a family and a clean record" to stay is the "rational middle ground" between amnesty and the House Republicans' approach.

The president plans to travel to New Mexico, Texas and Nebraska next week to stress his plans for border security and push lawmakers to pass a bill.

Mr. Bush drew praise yesterday from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, a key Democrat on the issue. He said Mr. Bush was "right on the mark" in telling Congress to get a broad bill done.

But Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, demanded the president do more to distance himself from the House bill.

Mr. Bush does differ with the Senate on one key provision -- the Senate bill creates a pre-immigrant visa, under which some illegal aliens and future foreign workers would be on a path to citizenship. While Mr. Bush supports that for illegal aliens, he has consistently opposed that for future workers.

"Temporary workers must return to their homes at the conclusion of their stay," he said yesterday.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, praised that stance, saying a "future temporary-worker plan must be just that: temporary."

Bush Presses Lawmakers To Pass Immigration Bill (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush urged House and Senate lawmakers to come together and merge competing immigration bills.

"It's a difficult task, but the difficulty of the task is no excuse for avoiding it," Bush said in a speech at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Thursday. "The United States Congress needs to pass a comprehensive bill."

The Senate passed immigration legislation last week, a measure that would establish a temporary guest-worker program and allow millions of illegal immigrants to eventually gain citizenship. It faces a difficult future, however, as House and Senate lawmakers must overcome numerous differences in conference. Many House Republicans are strictly opposed to giving illegal immigrants any path to citizenship, an idea many view as amnesty.

In recent days, however, immigration has taken a backseat with Congress on a week-long recess and other issues, like Iran and the resignation of Treasury Secretary John Snow, garnering attention.

Focusing further on the issue, the president will travel to the border area next week, making stops at law enforcement facilities on Tuesday in Artesia, N.M., and Laredo, Texas. The following day, he'll discuss immigration at a Catholic charities center in Omaha, Neb.

Mr. Bush's plan for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws would give undocumented workers a path to citizenship, create a guest worker program, make employers accountable for hiring illegal workers, and heighten security along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico by boosting the size of the Border Patrol and using high-tech surveillance methods.

"The need to secure this border is urgent," Mr. Bush said, outlining his plan to send National Guardsmen to the Southwest to assist the Border Patrol while 6,000 new agents are trained. "They're going to be a complement to the Border Patrol," which will remain in charge of law enforcement, Bush said.

Addressing some critics, Bush said his immigration proposal doesn't create an "automatic" path to citizenship. Instead, he said there's a "rational middle ground" between amnesty and trying to deport the 12 million illegal immigrants now in the U.S.

Mr. Bush also touted the economy, called for "fiscal sanity," and repeated his threat to veto a pending emergency spending bill if it exceeds his spending limit.

"This economy of the United States is strong and we intend to keep it that way," he said. "The best way to balance the budget is to keep pro-growth economic policies in place and be wise about how we spend your money."

Illegals' Tax Deal Could Kill Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The long-fought Senate immigration bill that opponents say grants amnesty to 10 million illegal aliens is unconstitutional and appears headed for certain demise, Senate Republicans now say.

A key feature of the Senate bill is that it would make illegals pay back taxes before applying for citizenship, a requirement that supporters say will raise billions of dollars in the next decade.

There's just one problem: The U.S. Constitution specifically prohibits revenue-raising legislation from originating in the Senate.

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," according to the "origination clause" in Article I, Section 7.

Republicans -- including the bill's supporters -- say this will kill the bill, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says he's offered a simple solution. He wants to attach the immigration bill to a tax bill that has already passed the House. It would then proceed as planned to a "conference committee," where negotiators from the House and Senate hammer out differences between the two chambers' immigration bills.

"This is a procedural issue that we could overcome," said Carolyn Weyforth, spokeswoman for Mr. Frist.

But Minority Leader Harry Reid won't go along with that fix. His office said yesterday that the concerns raised by Mr. Frist and House Republicans are "technical in nature" and can be ignored.

"If Republicans are serious about enacting comprehensive immigration reform, I've got a deal for them," spokesman Jim Manley said. "All they have to do is nothing. Just let the House and Senate bills go to conference and let the conferees work their will."

The bill as written, however, will never make it to conference, Republicans say. Under House rules, any member can introduce a "blue-slip resolution" to return the legislation to the Senate. And although there are plenty of House conservatives eager to kill the Senate bill any way they can, Hill staffers say it would likely be done based on "policy-blind constitutional issues."

"If there is a blue-slip issue, it is not about policy," said one House aide familiar with the matter. "It's about procedure and the House's prerogative to uphold the United States Constitution."

There is some debate about whether the constitutional ban on Senate revenue bills pertains only to bills whose primary purpose is to raise money or whether it also applies to bills that do so incidentally.

Republicans say that because the concerns already have been raised, they expect the bill to be returned to the Senate.

They point to a 2002 report written by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service that reveals how broadly the House interprets the origination clause.

"In 1992, the House returned to the Senate a bill (S.884, 102nd Congress) to require the President to impose economic sanctions, including a ban on certain imports, against countries which fail to eliminate large-scale driftnet fishing," according to the report. "In 1999, the House returned to the Senate a bill (S.254, 105th Congress) effectively banning the import of certain assault weapon attachments."

The policy of the House, according to the report, has been to interpret "any meaningful revenue proposal" as subject to the origination clause.

To skirt the ban, Republicans say, the Senate easily could agree to attach the immigration bill to the House-approved tax legislation. They see Mr. Reid's refusal to fix the problem as an attempt to scuttle the bill, and thus deny the Republican Congress a "victory" for passing immigration reform before this fall's elections.

"We can solve this constitutional issue if Harry Reid would drop his obstructionism and allow the comprehensive immigration legislation to move past the Senate," Ms. Weyforth said.

Senate Border Bill Steps On House Turf (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And James Gerstenzang

WASHINGTON — A procedural glitch is adding new, and possibly significant, hurdles to the drive in Congress to approve sweeping changes to immigration policy.

The problem stems from the Senate bill that would create a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for many of the illegal immigrants in the U.S. Participants in the guest worker program would pay income taxes; illegal immigrants would, as part of the legalization process, be required to pay back taxes and new fees.

The Constitution, however, gives the House sole authority to originate bills that include revenue measures — and it allows any House member to object if a Senate bill does so.

Late last week, Senate aides said they received word from the House committee with jurisdiction over revenue issues that it would use that constitutional power to block further consideration of the Senate bill.

This problem is stalling efforts to appoint a House-Senate conference committee that would try to reach a compromise on the final form of immigration legislation.

Those negotiations were expected to difficult at best. But unless the procedural stumbling block is resolved, the talks won't even start.

Although the impasse may prove to be a minor problem, it could provide a way for House members who staunchly oppose the Senate's legalization measures to block any compromise efforts. That could mean no overhaul of immigration policy would emerge from Congress this year.

Senate leaders are trying to determine how to move forward.

"We went into the [Memorial Day] recess at a stalemate," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Word of the problem was spreading on Capitol Hill as President Bush on Thursday renewed his push for an immigration bill. In a speech in Washington, he stressed that although he recognized the difficulty in crafting a measure, compromise was necessary — particularly in determining how to treat longtime residents who entered the United States illegally.

The president's remarks came a week after the Senate passed its wide-ranging bill. The House measure, approved in December, contains no provisions for a guest worker program or a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. It would make illegal presence in the country a felony, and would intensify border security.

As the Senate edged toward passing its bill, Senate aides received word that House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield) would block it because of its revenue-producing sections.

This practice is known as blue-slipping because Thomas would officially notify the Senate of his intentions on a slip of blue paper.

Thomas did not respond to requests for comment, and committee aides declined to elaborate on the dispute.

The Joint Committee on Taxation and the Congressional Budget Office estimate that the Senate bill provisions would increase federal revenue by about $66 billion from 2007 to 2016.

The potential for a House objection stemming from these provisions did not come up during senators' lengthy negotiations over their bill earlier this year, a Senate Judiciary Committee aide said.

Last week, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) proposed a technical way of skirting the problem: attaching the Senate's immigration bill to an existing House tax bill, Frist aides said.

After various legislative maneuvers, the two chambers could separate the tax and immigration measures and try, behind closed doors, to negotiate on a final immigration bill.

The Frist plan faces two hurdles. It requires a House vote to take effect, which would give the House members opposed to the Senate bill a chance to vote it down.

DOJ_NMG_0031348

More immediately, Senate Democrats disagree with Republican assertions that Frist's plan is the only way to go forward. Minority Leader Reid has refused to approve the plan, blocking Frist from proceeding.

"We can solve this challenge if Harry Reid would agree to this solution," said Frist spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth.

In a sign of the mistrust among leaders in both parties that has characterized much of the immigration debate, Weyforth attributed Reid's stance to a desire to thwart any resolution of the issue until after the November elections.

Many Republicans suspect Democrats would prefer such a delay so that they can keep criticizing the House's enforcement-only approach.

"With the president talking about immigration reform today, it amazes me that Reid is stalemating the entire bill," Weyforth said.

Manley, Reid's spokesman, dismissed Weyforth's assertion. And he said that if Frist was seriously committed to overhauling immigration policy, he would persuade House GOP leaders to allow the immigration bill to proceed to a conference committee.

Manley said Reid questioned the need to add the Senate's immigration bill to the tax measure, especially in light of the complications that might cause.

"We can get this done without resorting to extraordinary measures if all the parties were committed to getting it to conference as quickly as possible," he said.

Bush has said he wants an immigration bill sent to him quickly, a point he reiterated Thursday.

"The American people expect us to meet our responsibility and deliver immigration reform that fixes the problems in the current system, that upholds our ideals and provides a fair and practical way forward," he said.

He also repeated his disagreement with those lawmakers — mostly Republicans — who had said they would oppose any compromise bill that included legalization provisions.

"Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this country illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country, and that any plan that allows them to stay equals amnesty, no matter how many conditions we impose," Bush said. "Listen, I appreciate the members are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that."

But he called their approach "wrong and unrealistic."

"There's a rational middle ground between granting an automatic path to citizenship for every illegal immigrant and a program that requires every illegal immigrant to leave" the country, he said.

"The middle ground recognizes there are differences between an illegal immigrant who crossed the border recently, and someone who has worked here for many years, who's got a home, a family and a clean record," Bush said.

The Senate bill would allow illegal immigrants who have been in the country five years or more to remain, continue working and eventually become legal permanent residents and citizens after paying back taxes, paying at least $3,250 in fines and fees and learning English.

Those who have been in the United States more than two years but less than five would be required to go to a point of entry at the border and file an application to return; those who have been in the country less than two years would be required to leave.

Senate Bill Would Add 20 Million Legal Immigrants, Report Says (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The nation's population of legal immigrants would increase by nearly 20 million over the next decade if the recently passed Senate immigration bill becomes law, and taxpayers would spend more than $50 billion to operate a new guest-worker program and pay for extra welfare, Social Security and public health-care costs, according to a Congressional Budget Office report.

But the cost of absorbing the newcomers would be offset by a boost of $66 billion in federal revenue from income taxes and payroll taxes generated by the temporary guest-worker program, along with fees that immigrants must pay to participate, the report said.

By 2016, about 8 million immigrants would enter the United States as temporary guest workers, and 11 million immigrants who now live in the country illegally would become permanent legal residents under provisions of the bill.

The report, the first definitive look at the impact of the Senate bill, was commissioned by the Senate Finance Committee and was submitted on May 16, nine days before the measure was passed. The study has been embraced by the Bush administration and the bill's supporters, but opponents said crucial omissions greatly lowered its population and cost estimates.

Critics said the report does not take into account the 950,000 newcomers who enter the country legally under current immigration law, bringing the 10-year total of new immigrants to about 30 million. Some say that number will double by 2026.

The report also does not consider the possibility of future mass illegal border crossings that might occur in spite of technological enhancement and increased personnel along the Southern border, according to critics.

An explosion of immigrants is one reason that House Republicans say they are strongly opposed to the Senate bill, and have vowed to fight it when members of the two chambers meet for negotiations in a congressional conference. Supporters of the Senate's approach, which is backed by President Bush, say they will stand firm.

"We can build miles of fences, but the fact remains that immigrants will still come because employers need workers and immigrants want jobs," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who fought for a guest-worker program. "It's far better for American jobs and wages to have a practical, common-sense policy of legal immigration, than to continue leaving millions of immigrants underground and underpaid."

Will Adams, a spokesman for Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who opposes granting residency to illegal immigrants, called legal immigration "the soft underbelly of the Senate bill." It is overlooked in the debate, he said, "but when it's exposed, the public is outraged."

Robert E. Rector, a senior research fellow in domestic policy studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the bill "is horrendous." Assisting tens of millions of low-income workers with less than a high school education would lead to costs in welfare, health care, housing and other areas that far exceed the half-billion dollars the government already pays each year, he said.

"Once [illegal immigrants] become legal, they are going to receive welfare that's vastly disproportionate to the taxes that they're going to pay," Rector said. High school dropouts, immigrants or not, earn about $22,000 yearly and pay far fewer taxes than middle-class Americans. "There's no way they can contribute to the cost of educating their children. The cost they impose on government . . . far exceeds anything they bring in in terms of tax revenue."

The budget office report, compiled with help from the Joint Committee on Taxation, disputed that account, as did others who took issue with Rector's belief that the Senate bill would increase the immigrant population by 60 million.

Earlier, Rector predicted an even higher number: 100 million. He updated the figure after an amendment to the bill capped the yearly number of guest workers at 200,000 per year.

Alan Reynolds, a senior fellow for the libertarian Cato Institute, said Rector's estimates "are preposterous." He accused Rector of compounding numbers to reach an alarming total and not taking into account that most immigrants who would become legal citizens already live in the country.

"They're basically saying, 'Gee, if we keep illegals illegal, then we would have fewer legal residents,' " Reynolds said.

A report released yesterday by the National Foundation for American Policy also said Rector "overstated the numbers." Stuart Anderson, executive director of the foundation, said most "new entrants" who would become legal residents currently live in the United States. In 20 years, the net total of new entrants would be about 47 million.

Rector is supported by other groups, including the Center for Immigration Studies and NumbersUSA, two opponents of increased immigration. He said his concern about the number of immigrants is outweighed by the cost.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, 750,000 immigrants would be eligible to receive food stamps, and 1.3 million would be eligible for some form of Medicaid, in addition to other benefits.

The cost of providing food stamps, Medicare, Medicaid and visa fees for guest workers would total $5 billion between 2009 and 2016. An additional $6.5 billion would be needed for new residents who unite with families. Providing services to illegal immigrants who become permanent legal residents would cost $10 billion more.

Schwarzenegger To Order Troops To Border (AP-Y2)

By Aaron C. Davis

DOJ_NMG_0031350

The AP, June 1, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger agreed Thursday to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border, ending a 17-day standoff with the Bush administration.

The two sides had been at odds over whether California Guardsmen would join the effort to bolster the Border Patrol and who would pay for it.

They reached an agreement under which California will contribute about 1,000 Guardsmen for border duty and the federal government will pick up the full cost, Schwarzenegger said.

"It is not my preference to send the National Guard, but there's an important need to protect the border," he said.

However, in a separate act that was not part of the agreement with the federal government, Schwarzenegger will sign an executive order that ends the California National Guard's participation on Dec. 31, 2008, state officials said.

Schwarzenegger intends for the mission to be carried out mostly by troops who volunteer for six- to 12-month assignments. The Bush plan called for sending Guardsmen on border duty instead of their annual two-and-three week training exercises.

The state would have to pay for normal training sessions, while long-term assignments are funded by the federal government.

Altogether, President Bush has proposed sending 6,000 National Guardsmen to the U.S. border with Mexico. The overall cost of the multiyear deployment has been put at more than $1 billion.

In California, National Guard officials have said the mobilization could begin immediately.

A planning force could reach the border within days and the full deployment could be in place by July 15, but California Guard officials said they would not send anyone until Congress approves funding for the operation.

Schwarzenegger said he would sign a memorandum of understanding between the federal government and the governors of the four southern border states. It serves as a federal promise to repay the cost of the deployment.

It also establishes rules of engagement prohibiting Guardsmen from handling detainees, but allowing them to carry guns. The rules are similar to those the California Guard follows when deploying to a riot, officials said.

The document also contains a provision allowing the border governors to decline to participate in any part of the mission they deem inappropriate.

Schwarzenegger's decision ended an awkward period for the Republican governor. He held out longer than Democratic governors in Arizona and New Mexico before saying he would send troops.

He also had risked alienating voters in a state that has repeatedly backed a tough approach on immigration — although his reluctance to send troops had been seen as popular among Hispanics.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano signed an agreement Thursday for her state to participate in Bush's plan, with 300 Arizona National Guard soldiers set to take part beginning in mid-June.

National Guard troops will be used for engineering, road and fence building, transportation, logistics and surveillance, reconnaissance and port-of-entry duties but not direct law enforcement.

Gov. To Send 1,000 National Guard Troops To The Border (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Despite some misgivings, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Thursday he would send 1,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican border as part of President Bush's plan to curb illegal immigration.

Schwarzenegger said the mission would begin July 15 and end no later than Dec. 31, 2008 — a deadline, he said, that ensures the Guard won't be locked into an open-ended commitment.

Schwarzenegger, speaking at a news conference in the Capitol, also said the Guard would rely on volunteers for the assignment and that troops would be spared the riskiest duty, involving arrest and detention of people crossing the border illegally. About 700 Guard troops have expressed interest thus far, he said.

They will fix trucks, repair roads, operate cameras and perform other logistical duties, freeing U.S. Border Patrol agents for potentially more hazardous work.

Stints at the border would last from six months to a year — reflecting Schwarzenegger's conviction that Bush's plan to rotate troops in and out every two weeks made little sense.

Amid a bitter debate over illegal immigration, Schwarzenegger seems to be staking out a middle ground.

He is striving to deflect accusations that he is "militarizing" the border, emphasizing that most Guard troops will be unarmed and a step removed from the front lines. At the same time, the governor does not want to be seen as ignoring Bush's call to shore up a border that Schwarzenegger has derided as dangerously porous.

The governor is expected to sign an agreement with the federal government spelling out the terms of the operation. Dubbed "Operation Jump Start," the agreement specifies that the federal government would cover costs that may run to $96 million a year, state officials said.

As of Thursday night, Schwarzenegger, the Pentagon and governors in other southern border states were working out details of the agreement. Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano agreed to deploy 300 National Guard soldiers from her state to the border beginning in mid-June, the Associated Press reported.

Maj. Gen. David Rataczak, the Arizona National Guard adjutant general, said some of the Arizona troops will go to the border with their units for weeks-long annual training, while others will go as volunteers for longer stints.

As of now, the president's $1.9-billion request to finance his plan for increased border security is pending in Congress.

Bush laid out his plan to shore up the border in a nationally televised speech May 15. He said he wanted 6,000 National Guard troops to aid in border security.

Schwarzenegger quickly voiced doubts about the plan. He questioned whether it would make a real difference and worried that the state might not be repaid.

At his news conference Thursday, the governor said that over the last two weeks he had struck a satisfactory compromise with the Bush administration.

"The mission that I will assign to our California National Guard will be significantly different from the plan laid out by President Bush," Schwarzenegger said. "We will assist in a manner that protects our troops and uses our men and women in the most effective and appropriate way possible."

One key was setting a date by which the operation would end, he said.

As Bush structured the plan, the governor was free to cooperate or opt out, according to state Guard officials. Should the president try to extend the deployment, Schwarzenegger said, he would use his authority as commander of the California guard to resist.

"Well, I'm the commander in chief, so I can take back the National Guard at any time that I want," the governor said. "That is the most important thing, that there is control over that. And like I said, we are doing this, may I remind you, reluctantly. I mean, it's not my preference to send the National Guard to do this mission."

But it was necessary, he said, "to help the federal government to secure our borders … "

State Democratic leaders said that committing Guard troops is a mistake.

Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), who was briefed on the plan by the governor, predicted that Latin America would find the move offensive.

Nuñez said he also feared the commitment would stretch thin a National Guard that is crucial to California's recovery in the event of an earthquake or other natural disaster.

"When you deploy the National Guard to the southern border — but you don't do the same to the northern border — then you send a message that the problem is Latin America," he said. "This doesn't send a message of friendship. It sends a message of antagonism to our friends in the south. I don't think it will be well-received."

Most Guard troops won't be armed, though local commanders will be free to authorize firearms if they determine soldiers are in jeopardy, Guard officials said.

They also said there should be enough Guard troops to respond to natural disasters — despite the commitment of troops overseas and, now, at the border.

Of the 20,000 California National Guard troops, about 2,200 are overseas. Assuming 1,000 go to the border, that still leaves plenty of troops to respond to disasters, Guard officials said.

Nuñez said he was not convinced. The Assembly speaker said the governor and Guard officials "seem to feel confident we have enough manpower in the National Guard to respond to a natural disaster. I'm not totally convinced that's the case."

Immigration Figures At Polls (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- To Brian Bilbray, the "greatest ethics scandal in America" isn't about Washington lobbyists or the bribery conviction of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, formerly this area's unbeatable congressman.

Mr. Bilbray, a former Republican House member seeking Mr. Cunningham's vacant seat, is fighting what he calls the scandal of illegal immigration. He hopes that tough talk on the campaign trail about securing borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal workers will bring enough supporters to the polls on June 6 to help him defeat a challenge from Democrat Francine Busby. A local school-board member, she takes a softer line on the issue, supporting proposals to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens and create new guest-worker programs.

Voters in this district near the Mexican border are "furious at everyone in Washington for ignoring this problem," Mr. Bilbray says.

Ms. Busby emphasizes the need for changes in ethics rules that would unravel Washington's "pay to play" system. Immigration "is not the only issue, nor is it the most important issue affecting people's lives," she says.

More is at stake in the Bilbray-Busby showdown than one congressional seat. If Ms. Busby wins Tuesday, she would take over what has long been a Republican district. Such a shift could portend a wave of Democratic wins this fall, just as Republicans are fighting to hang on to control of the House and Senate amid dismal approval ratings for President Bush.

The race also is shaping up as an early test for how immigration and scandal could play out this year in the polls, and which issue may get greater traction with voters.

With the San Diego runoff just days away, polls show a close race. SurveyUSA, a nonpartisan market-research firm, reported a dead heat -- 45% for Mr. Bilbray and 45% for Ms. Busby -- in May. Ms. Busby acknowledges an uphill battle in a district where 44% of voters are registered Republicans, and less than 30% are Democrats. Victory, Ms. Busby says, "would take just a tectonic shift."

Mindful of the broader implications, national party organizations are pouring money into the race, largely for negative television ads. One ad sponsored by the National Republican Congressional Committee calls Ms. Busby a "liberal" and says she supports "amnesty" for illegal immigrants. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has launched a campaign to highlight Mr. Bilbray's work as a lobbyist in recent years, and votes he missed as a lawmaker while he went on trips to "hang out with special interests."

In a tacit admission that Mr. Bilbray's immigration position may be more popular in the district, Ms. Busby and her backers are trying to blur the candidates' differences on the issue. He opposes allowing illegal immigrants to become citizens, which he calls "amnesty." Ms. Busby says because the citizenship comes with hurdles, it doesn't amount to amnesty.

Ms. Busby says the barrage of commercials, even negative ones, have boosted her name recognition. On a recent walk outside her campaign headquarters in Encinitas, a coastal, Democratic-leaning enclave north of downtown, she was stopped by several people who asked if she was Francine. "We're pulling for you," said one wetsuit-clad surfer climbing the stairs from the beach.

While Mr. Bilbray enjoys the advantage of running in a strongly Republican district, he faces the danger of his party fracturing along different fault lines. Because he favors abortion rights and has supported gun control, he's fighting an impression among some Republicans that he's too moderate.

His main draw for the conservative base is his credibility as a hard-liner on immigration. He has supported legislation eliminating automatic citizenship for U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants. One of his lobbying clients was the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that wants to limit both illegal and legal immigration.

But he still faces a challenge to his right from William Griffith, an independent candidate on Tuesday's ballot, who is running as a "conservative alternative" to Mr. Bilbray. While Mr. Griffith has little chance of winning -- he got just 1% of the vote in the April special election, compared with 15% for Mr. Bilbray -- he may peel off some conservative Republican voters. Mr. Griffith has picked up endorsements from the local Minutemen activist group and the American Independent Party, both of which are pushing for a crackdown on illegal immigration.

And yet, if Mr. Bilbray steers too hard against immigration, he may risk losing moderate Republicans. Earlier this week, Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) canceled a visit to San Diego for a Bilbray fund-raiser. Mr. McCain supports a Senate immigration bill that would allow millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S. to eventually become citizens. Mr. Bilbray opposes that measure, and Mr. McCain didn't want to distract from the candidate's campaign message, according to a statement sent to the Bilbray campaign by Mr. McCain's political action committee. Mr. McCain still endorses Mr. Bilbray, the statement said.

On Tuesday night, Mr. Bilbray met with a handful of members of the local chapter of the Republican National Hispanic Assembly and faced some probing questions. Todd Garcia VanBoxtel, vice chairman of the group, said he was concerned that mass deportations of illegal immigrants would create an "uproar" by separating families and disrupting neighborhoods.

In response, Mr. Bilbray sounded a softer tone than he often does on the campaign trail. "You're going to have displacement," he said. But he also predicted the House and Senate dealmakers would find a "moderate, middle ground" in their negotiations, including removing a provision in the House bill that would make illegal immigrants felons. "We're not going to be punitive to immigrants, and we're not going to reward illegal immigrants," he said. An avid surfer, Mr. Bilbray tempered his remarks with tales of traveling to Mexico's beaches and growing up near the "frontera."

Mr. Bilbray seemed to have walked the tightrope just right. Mr. Bilbray "probably didn't have enough votes to get an endorsement when he walked in" to the meeting, Mr. Garcia VanBoxtel later said. But the group ended up supporting the Republican candidate and plans a mailing to 1,000 Hispanic households urging them to vote.

"What impressed us was his affection for travel in Mexico ... and his love of the people... Obviously he didn't tell me necessarily what I wanted to hear, but he had firsthand knowledge of the situation and that won us over," Mr. Garcia VanBoxtel said.

118 Aliens Arrested In Raid Of 'Safe House' In Arizona (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol arrested 118 illegal aliens at a "safe house" in Rio Rico, Ariz., just north of the U.S.-Mexico border, in a raid this week by a unit of undercover agents that has targeted alien smugglers and those who help them.

The team, known as the Disrupt unit, raided the house near Interstate 19 after receiving a tip about "suspicious activity." The agents took the illegals into custody and seized four vehicles. Twenty-three houses used by smugglers to stash illegal aliens awaiting transportation to cities throughout the U.S. have been uncovered by the team since October.

Created by former U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) Commissioner Robert C. Bonner as part of the Arizona Border Control Initiative, the team has focused on southern Arizona, where more than half of the 1.15 million illegal aliens apprehended last year were caught -- about 1,700 arrests a day in that state.

Mr. Bonner, who retired in November, described the Disrupt team as part of a "full-court press to reduce the number of illegal aliens crossing our borders, and to detect and arrest those engaged in illegal cross-border activity."

Working with investigators from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the team targets and seeks to disrupt the criminal organizations that smuggle foreigners into the United States.

"The community is the second set of eyes and ears for not only the United States Border Patrol, but for all law enforcement," said Jose L. Maheda, a Border Patrol spokesman in Nogales, Ariz.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar told a Senate subcommittee last month that the detection and disruption of alien and drug smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border was a top priority and that efforts to identify and dismantle these criminal organizations have resulted in an increase in violence aimed at his agents.

Chief Aguilar said that nearly 200 agents had been assaulted since Oct. 1, the start of the fiscal year, and that the number of agents assaulted during fiscal 2005 was more than double that in fiscal 2004.

"This line of defense does come at a price, and our dedicated agents face significant risks," Chief Aguilar told the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on terrorism, technology and homeland security. "As we continue to bring larger areas of the border under operational control, we can expect spikes in border violence as border criminals discover they can no longer operate with impunity and are prevented from using the border for their criminal activities."

The owner of the Rio Rico house, Diva Boreale, told reporters that she and her husband were "surprised" by the raid because she had no idea the residence -- which was rented out -- was being used to house illegal aliens.

Mrs. Boreale said "trash, covers, pillows and clothes" were just some of the items left by the illegals and their smugglers. "The house looks damaged."

Two Billboards Join Colorado Debate On Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

DENVER -- Two prominent billboards criticizing sanctuary policies for illegal aliens were uncovered here yesterday in the latest salvo in Colorado's simmering immigration debate.

The first billboard shows three military helmets atop rifles and has the message, "Mr. President, Mr. Governor, Mr. Mayor; they did not die for ILLEGAL SANCTUARY."

The second purports to welcome illegal aliens to Denver, which has policies forbidding authorities from asking about immigration status.

"Welcome to SANCTUARY CITY ... Relax, you made it! Brought to you by Executive Order 116," the black-and-white billboard says.

The 48-by-14-foot billboards are the brainchild of Denver radio talk-show host Peter Boyles, who frequently criticizes national immigration policies on his popular KHOW-AM morning show.

He broadcast yesterday's show at a rally featuring Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, and Jim Gilchrist, founder of the national Minuteman Project. As work crews uncovered the first billboard, the crowd of about 150 people cheered, while a lone protester held a sign that said, "No Billboards for Bigots."

The anti-sanctuary messages come as the immigration issue rises to the forefront of this year's state election. Activists are gathering signatures for a ballot measure that would deny state services to illegal aliens, and the Republican gubernatorial candidates are sparring over who is tougher on protecting the border.

The military-themed sign is a replica of a New Mexico billboard erected by Bob Park, a former Border Patrol agent who became frustrated with government policies that he said provided better medical care to illegal aliens than to military veterans.

Mr. Boyles' organization, Billboard Colorado, plans to erect at least one more billboard with a similar anti-illegal-entry theme. The signs, which cost $18,500 per month, are funded mainly by contributions from radio listeners and other Coloradans, Billboard Colorado spokesman Mike McGarry said.

"We've been deluged with contributions coming from all over the state," Mr. McGarry said. "We're getting $2 and $5 contributions from self-described little old ladies in their 80s where the return address is from a nursing home. This was truly a grass-roots effort."

Polly Baca, president of the Latin American Research and Service Agency in Denver, said she was "amused" by the billboard campaign, adding that most people would find the messages sarcastic and obscure.

"I find it rather interesting that they would put up billboards that most people can't understand," said Ms. Baca, who opposes the proposed ballot initiative. "When they say 'sanctuary,' does that mean a wildlife sanctuary? There are probably a handful of people who understand these messages, and they've probably already made up their minds on the issue."

Imam Agrees To Be Deported (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. – A Seattle-area mosque leader who was investigated for possible ties to terrorist groups agreed Thursday to accept an order of removal from the United States, federal officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0031355

Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed appeared in immigration court here, and Immigration Judge Victoria Young ruled that he had no legal basis to remain in the United States, according to a news release from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

During the hearing, Immigration and Customs lawyers presented evidence that Mohamed has Kenyan citizenship. Young ordered him deported to Kenya or, if that cannot be done, to Somalia, the agency said.

Mohamed was an imam of the Abu-Bakr Mosque in Seattle's Rainier Valley area.

He was arrested Nov. 14 at Seattle-Tacoma International Airport as he returned from a trip to Dallas. Federal officers said he lied to obtain legal asylum status after coming to the U.S. in 2000.

He has been detained by ICE without bond since his arrest, as agency attorneys argued that his ties to terrorist organizations in the horn of Africa made him a national security risk.

Among other things, federal agents believed he came to the country to help raise money for the Ogaden National Liberation Front, which wants an independent state for ethnic Somalis in Ethiopia, FBI Special Agent David Rubincam said during a February hearing in the case.

The outcome of the case "underscores ICE's commitment to protecting the integrity of our nation's legal immigration system," said Dorothy Stefan, the agency's chief counsel in Seattle.

Mohamed's defense attorney could not immediately be reached for comment after business hours Thursday.

Seattle Imam Ends His Effort To Stay In U.S. (SEAPI)

By Tracy Johnson, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 2, 2006

Mosque leader, held for 6 months, ordered deported to Kenya

A Seattle mosque leader who has been accused of funneling money to terrorist groups -- allegations that angered his many supporters in the local East African community -- gave up his fight Thursday to stay in the United States.

An immigration judge ordered that Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed, who isn't charged with any terrorism-related crimes, be deported to Kenya.

Mohamed has been locked up since his arrest Nov. 14 on immigration violations, and nearly six months of confinement -- much of it in isolation -- weighed heavily on his decision to accept deportation, according to his lawyer, Hilary Han.

"He's lived in the United States for almost six years. He has many ties here, and this is a place where he has been able to be safe," Han said. "This was not an easy decision for him."

Mohamed was accused of lying about being a member of a minority clan and his country of origin, among other things, in order to gain asylum. Federal immigration prosecutors say he is a citizen of Kenya and not war-torn Somalia.

With his fingerprints, authorities obtained several identity and passport-application documents that show he is from Kenya, according to Dorothy Stefan, regional chief counsel for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"We are gratified by the outcome of this case. It underscores ICE's commitment to protecting the integrity of our nation's legal immigration system."

Han said that while Mohamed applied for such documents in Kenya, he is a native of Somalia and likely would have been able to prove it -- though he has now waived that chance. His deportation hearing had been scheduled for later this month.

Mohamed told Immigration Judge Victoria Young through a Somali interpreter Thursday that it was "a very difficult time" for him but said he was willingly giving up his efforts to stay.

Young ordered him deported to Kenya but left Somalia as an alternative if the Kenyan government won't take him.

Six members of the Abu-Bakr Mosque attended the hearing but declined to comment about their friend's situation.

Mohamed had led prayers as imam of the Rainier Valley mosque for five years before federal agents arrested him last fall at Sea-Tac Airport, where he'd just arrived on a domestic flight.

In February, more than 200 people rallied in front of the mosque while Mohamed sought to be freed on bond.

But during his bond hearing, FBI agents and other witnesses testified that he had ties to terrorism and was raising money for a radical Islamic holy war.

DOJ_NMG_0031356

A man who ran an African restaurant near the mosque said $50,000 to $100,000 was raised each week for al-Itihaad a-Islamiya, a Somali terrorist organization to which he said Mohamed belongs.

The man also claimed that "jihad training" took place regularly in a nearby parking lot, where young people with BB guns were taught how to shoot people and blow up buildings.

Mohamed's supporters called such allegations ludicrous. They painted a picture of a peaceful leader who worked to keep Somali children on productive paths, and Han argued that some of the government's witnesses had grudges or other reasons to lie.

In March, Young concluded Mohamed was a threat to national security and denied his request to be freed on bond.

Han said Mohamed's decision to agree to be deported had nothing to do with the terrorism allegations.

An FBI spokeswoman said she could not discuss whether there was an ongoing criminal investigation of Mohamed.

Aziz Junejo, who hosts a local cable TV show on Islam, said it was "a very sad day" for the Muslim community. He said he has known Mohamed for several years and believes the man gave up his fight "to keep his dignity and respect."

"If one of our leaders was involved in terrorism, we wouldn't want him as a leader," Junejo said. "There's just no evidence of that."

AP, June 2, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) Another judge has been assigned to fill in for an immigration judge recently criticized by an appeals court for his handling of asylum cases, the court administrator said.

The Executive Office for Immigration Review, which manages the nation's immigration courts, has assigned a judge from Arlington, Va., to fill in for Judge Donald V. Verlise following an unexplained two-week absence.

Elliott Edwards, the administrator for the immigration court of the Philadelphia region, said Ferlise's absence was not due to illness, and the arrangement would continue for an indefinite period.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in April that Ferlise, 62, a former prosecutor, prejudged cases and bullied asylum-seekers, denying them their right to fair hearings. The Philadelphia City Council last month called for his removal.

Calls to Ferlise at home and at his office were not returned.

Washington attorney Ralph Conte, who said he was defending Ferlise but declined to say why he had been retained, referred questions to the Justice Department, which declined comment on what a spokesman called a ``personnel action."

A 2000 study published by the San Jose Mercury News ranked Ferlise as among the 10 toughest asylum judges in the country, saying he had granted 74 of 715 asylum requests between 1995 and 1999.

IRS Ruling Imperils 'Gift Fund' Charities For Home Buyers (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon And Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

A ruling by the Internal Revenue Service threatens to extinguish a fast-growing -- but controversial -- charitable industry that has funneled hundreds of millions of dollars in cash to first-time home buyers for their down payments.

The unexpected IRS edict throws into question a practice that has helped boost national home ownership rates to a near-record 69 percent in the past six years.

Almost 200 charities, such as AmeriDream, based in Gaithersburg, and Nehemiah Corp. in California, have acted as cash conduits between home sellers and buyers.

Under the system, sellers provide cash to the charities, which then give it to home buyers for their down payments. The sellers, who pay the charities a service fee, often recoup their money by charging a higher price for the homes -- usually 2 or 3 percent more, or an amount equal to the down payment, says a Government Accountability Office study.

Federal authorities have raised concerns, because the mortgages are insured by the Federal Housing Administration. When a home buyer defaults, the FHA loan fund suffers. Home buyers receiving assistance from the charities were more than twice as likely to default or become delinquent in their payments as those who used FHA loans without the charities' assistance, according to a GAO study last year.

Although the system has helped hundreds of thousands of low-income households buy their first homes, it is riddled with abuse, according to the IRS and a variety of government studies. The IRS called the programs "scams" in its ruling last month and said that by providing down payments, the charities actually inflated home prices, making it more likely that homeowners would default on their loans.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, who is pushing for charitable reform measures, blasted the down-payment assistance charities and praised the IRS ruling.

"Unfortunately, this sector of charities is riddled with individuals who believe their role is to help themselves, not to lend a helping hand," he said. "Some so-called charities need a wake-up call that their business is charitable work."

The IRS's "revenue ruling," issued May 4, states that charities that dole out cash to home buyers that comes from sellers do not qualify as tax-exempt organizations because they benefit private interests, such as builders and other home sellers. The IRS expects to begin revoking some charities' tax-exempt status as it finishes audits, said Marvin Friedlander, chief of the IRS's exempt-organizations technical branch. The IRS also could assess the organizations millions of dollars in income taxes if it decides they are for-profit organizations, not charities.

Executives at the charities say they have helped renters who would not otherwise have been able to buy homes because they were unable to afford the down payment. They dispute the GAO study and disagree with the IRS findings.

Last week, a coalition of the charities asked the Treasury Department to suspend the IRS ruling and solicit public comment before issuing a final decision.

"This could have a sweeping impact on the whole housing industry," said Ann Ashburn, chief executive officer of AmeriDream, the nation's second-largest down-payment assistance charity, and the coalition chair.

The IRS action has also roiled the real estate industry, which depends on the charities as a way to move cash-poor home buyers into the housing market. The charities say they move $500 million a year from sellers to buyers -- money that would disappear if many down-payment assistance charities were put out of business.

"Almost anybody building for the first-time home buyer is using these programs," said David Ledford, staff vice president for housing finance and housing policy with the National Association of Home Builders. "Builders are concerned about what would happen not just in the future but for buyers who have already qualified and are going through a sale but who have not closed yet."

Among those who have benefited are Beverly and Kevin Queen, who used $2,500 they received through the AmeriDream down-payment program to move their five children out of an Anacostia apartment to a four-bedroom single family home they bought in Fort Washington in 2000. The only cash the couple had at the time, Beverly Queen said only half-jokingly, "was the $5 holding our bank account open."

Their brick-front home sits on a half-acre backing up to farmland. "This is what I wanted," said Beverly Queen, 44.

The Queens said they have faced no problems keeping up with their mortgage payments.

But consumer advocate Allen Fishbein, director of housing and credit policy with the Consumer Federation of America, said some borrowers have been financially damaged when they fell behind on their mortgages but could not sell the houses because they paid inflated prices.

"Our concern is that people who became homeowners will have trouble making payments," which he said could cause them to lose their homes and wreck their credit.

The IRS has discovered other irregularities in the down-payment charities. Although the organizations are meant for home buyers of modest means, the IRS has found that affluent home buyers have improperly taken advantage of them -- even using the "gift funds" to buy vacation residences, Friedlander said.

The charities have also lavished perks on themselves, according to the IRS. Recent audits of 15 of the largest down-payment organizations have raised questions about extravagant pay to executives, problematic ties to for-profit companies and inflated prices to low-income buyers that the charities were purporting to help, Friedlander said.

As a result, the IRS has widened its investigation to include an additional 170 charities -- virtually all of the down-payment assistance charities that use seller funds.

The "gift fund" mechanism was devised by Don Harris, a Sacramento lawyer and minister who in the late 1990s found a loophole in the rules governing FHA mortgages that generally forbade home sellers from helping customers directly with down payments. He devised the idea of establishing a charity as a go-between for buyers and sellers.

The group Harris started, then called Nehemiah Home Ownership, gave buyers cash for the down payment on an FHA mortgage, generally 3 percent of the purchase price. The sellers then paid the charity an equal amount toward the down payment plus a service fee, typically 0.75 percent of the down payment.

Harris got a ruling from HUD approving the arrangement, and others copied Nehemiah's concept. Within a few years, a multibillion-dollar charitable industry was born, with about 200 nonprofits offering the service. In all, the industry says, it has given down payments to 625,000 households.

These loans make up an increasing amount of the FHA's volume. In 2006, about 28 percent of households receiving FHA loans got their down payments from the charities, up from 1.7 percent in 2000.

Ex-Norristown Councilman Pleads Guilty (PHI)

By Jeff Shields

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

A former Norristown councilman whose criminal activity inspired a four-year corruption investigation pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion charges.

Ernest W. Scott Jr., 56, admitted in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia that he hid more than $142,000 in income from his auto tags business between 1999 and 2001. He is scheduled for sentencing Sept. 8; federal guidelines call for a sentence of 12 to 18 months in prison.

He is the third Norristown official to be convicted or plead guilty in the last six weeks in a series of indictments resulting from the U.S. Attorney's investigation. Ex-Mayor Ted LeBlanc was convicted on bribery and tax evasion charges April 18, and former municipal administrator Anthony Biondi pleaded guilty to corruption charges May 12. Scott is currently serving a 6 1/2- to 20-year state sentence. In 2003, Scott, then a member of the Norristown municipal council, admitted to running a corrupt organization that included issuing fake insurance cards and dealing marijuana.

The Montgomery County District Attorney's wiretap evidence from Scott's case was handed over to federal investigators in late 2002. The U.S. Attorney's Office used it to launch a wide-ranging probe that produced indictments against Scott and the man who prepared his taxes, as well as LeBlanc, Biondi, and four businessmen who were awarded contracts with Norristown.

Arthur Farquharson, who prepared Scott's taxes, is serving a 42-month sentence on conspiracy, tax evasion and other charges. Scott and Farquharson "often laughed" about the false tax returns they were filing, prosecutors said in court documents.

Strip Club Owner In Las Vegas Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 2, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A strip club owner pleaded guilty Thursday to a felony tax evasion charge but avoided any mention of organized crime as the government ended a decade-long federal probe of whether the club was linked to the mob.

Rick Rizzolo, owner of the Crazy Horse Too, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to conspiracy to defraud the government, pledged to sell the club, and agreed not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution.

The financial settlement includes a $10 million payment to Kirk Henry, a tourist from Olathe, Kan., whose separate civil lawsuit alleges he was paralyzed when he was beaten by club employees in 2001.

The club, using the corporate name The Power Company Inc. and represented by Rizzolo's lawyer, Tony Sgro, pleaded guilty to racketeering and will bear the brunt of the financial penalties.

Under the terms of the deal, the company acknowledged that employees had padded customers' bills and used threats and force to compel customers to pay disputed charges.

DOJ_NMG_0031359

Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for Nevada, called Thursday's deals an efficient way to achieve what he called a primary goal of the investigation - to strip Rizzolo of club ownership and bring closure to Henry and his family "for the brutal and tragic extortionate attack at the club."

The plea deal allows the government to veto a sale if the buyer is a close relative or business partner with Rizzolo, a felon or has proven ties with organized crime.

"The corporate plea to racketeering charges acknowledges the serious threat that the Crazy Horse Too has presented to the community," Bogden said.

The plea agreement requires Rizzolo to divest his interest in the white-pillared, Roman-themed club just off the Las Vegas Strip. It prohibits him from owning any other adult entertainment business in the U.S.

Rizzolo, 47, is expected to be sentenced to no more than 16 months in federal prison, prosecutors said. U.S. District Judge Philip Pro set sentencing for Sept. 15.

Rizzolo declined comment as he and Sgro left the courtroom.

"It's a relief to have it behind us," Sgro said.

Rizzolo remained free without bail following his conviction.

The pleas came a day after 16 current and former club employees pleaded guilty to federal charges. Fourteen pleaded guilty to felony tax evasion for failure to report income from tips given to dancers and shared among club employees.

One club manager, Robert D'Apice, 51, pleaded guilty Wednesday to a racketeering charge. A former waitress, Paula McBride, 28, pleaded guilty to perjury. All remain free pending sentencing. None is expected to get more than 16 months in prison. None of those who pleaded guilty this week case admits direct responsibility for the September 2001 beating that left Henry paralyzed from the chest down.

Henry's lawyer, Donald Campbell, did not immediately respond Thursday to requests for comment.

Club executives long denied allegations of ties to organized crime, kickbacks to cab drivers for delivering tourists to the door, and roughing up patrons who protested allegedly inflated credit card bills.

The federal probe of the Crazy Horse Too dates at least to 1995, when Sgro said the FBI submitted documents to obtain authorizations for wiretaps. Las Vegas police raided the club in late 2001, following Henry's injury, and the FBI and local police raided it again in February 2003.

"Buffalo" Jim Barrier, the flamboyant owner of a neighboring car repair shop who has often clashed with Rizzolo and club employees, called the pleas the end of a "reign of terror" dating to the 1980s.

"It's better than nothing," said Barrier, who said he summoned police after watching one patron beaten to death outside the club in 1995. "It was hard to stop him, but he's a convicted felon."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's New Team Scores A-list Names (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - These are hardly the waning days of the Bush White House, but in some ways, time is running short for major new policy initiatives. And in the inevitable changing of the guard, as top appointees move on, it might seem a tough sell to lure A-listers onto the team. The pay isn't much to write home about, especially for those used to a healthy private-sector paycheck, and the administration remains deeply unpopular with much of the public.

But something has happened on the way to the makeover of Team Bush: The president has managed to bring in some first-string players, at a time when two-term White Houses are typically moving to the bench, analysts say. Exhibits A and B are Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, tapped to take over Treasury, and FOX TV commentator Tony Snow, the new press secretary. Joshua Bolten, the new chief of staff, is also getting high marks for his energetic retooling work - including helping snag his former colleague, Mr. Paulson - and setting his sights on upgrading the White House's communications and domestic policy shops.

"The conventional wisdom - which is sometimes right - is that it gets more and more difficult to hire from the outside," says Stephen Hess, a veteran of the Eisenhower White House and a Brookings Institution scholar. "Time is short, it's not as much fun, policy has already been made. People give up big things to do government service, not just money, but going through confirmation. So you usually just get people from within, and you wind up with the Peter Principle - people rising to their level of mediocrity."

Mr. Bolten's promotion-from-within belies that principle. But in that case, analysts say, it was probably wise for President Bush to bring a familiar face into the chief of staff hot seat - someone with whom he is already personally comfortable and who knows the president.

The Treasury slot is one that Mr. Bush has struggled to fill to his liking from Day 1. His first pick, Paul O'Neill, had a propensity for straying from the company line, and the current secretary, John Snow, failed to convince the public that the economy is strong. As Treasury secretary, Paulson would fill one of the four principal Cabinet slots - the others being State, Defense, and Justice - but under Bush, the Treasury job has not been viewed as a power center. Paulson signed on only after much wooing, and reportedly only after receiving assurances that he would have access to Bush and serve as more than just a cheerleader for the economy. Still, why would someone at the top of the financial world worth a reported $700 million take that leap?

"Paulson's an older guy, probably close to retirement anyway," says Bruce Bartlett, an economist who served under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. "And there's a certain prestige and cachet - not literally, but figuratively - to sitting in Alexander Hamilton's chair."

The Treasury job also entails lots of global travel and no shortage of serious policy issues, including budget and trade deficits and the rise of China. Party loyalty is another likely factor; Paulson has donated and raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Bush and other Republicans.

For all the new Bush appointees, too, entering the fray while the president is at a low point means there's no place to go but up. For an outsider like Tony Snow, jumping in now means he is free of the uncomfortable questions his predecessor, Scott McClellan, faced over various controversies, including the Valerie Plame scandal - the case of the CIA employee whose exposed identity has entangled top White house officials. Early on, Mr. McClellan said things that later proved to be untrue.

The early reviews on Mr. Snow have been positive - at least as an articulate, telegenic public persona for an administration under fire.

"Snow had a presence right away," says Paul Light, a public-policy professor at New York University.

How much Snow can prove to be the "full-service press secretary" he says he intends to be remains an open question. For now, that involves fiddling with reporters' malfunctioning tape recorders on the podium during briefings. But will he improve the press corps' access to officials and information? Bush's communications strategy has already been evolving for some time: He has been more open to taking potentially hostile questions in public forums, and more willing to admit mistakes. When USA Today broke the story about data mining of phone calls, Bush was out responding within hours.

"They're all good appointments," Professor Light says, referring to Paulson, Snow, and Bolten. But "I don't think they reshuffle the deck in terms of public approval so late in the term."

Among other recent personnel changes, many have involved old faces taking new assignments: US Trade Representative Rob Portman is now budget director, replacing Bolten. Mr. Portman's deputy, Susan Schwab, has been tapped for the top trade job. Political guru Karl Rove lost his policy portfolio, which was taken over by Joel Kaplan, former deputy budget director. Michael Hayden was easily confirmed to replace Porter Goss at the CIA, after an initial burst of controversy over General Hayden's role in secret surveillance programs from his days running the National Security Agency.

But another recent appointee who would never have gained much notice outside the Beltway did cause a flap. Two days after Karl Zinsmeister was announced May 24 as Bush's domestic policy director, it was revealed that he had doctored some quotes in a profile of himself posted on the website of the magazine he edited, The American Enterprise. Mr. Zinsmeister later told The Washington Post that what he did was "foolish."

Talk continues that Bolten might retool the White House's congressional liaison office and bring more change to the communications team. But discussion that Bush might bring a "graybeard," perhaps a former senator, into the White House as a senior adviser to help improve relations with Congress and project an image of stability has died down. Still, some analysts suggest the retooling so far may not be enough for Republicans eager for major change - especially heading into a tough campaign season.

"I don't think it's the shake-up the Republicans were longing for," says Light. "But it may be enough to stop further conversation for more shake-up."

A Global Warming Believer In Bush Cabinet (AP-Y2)

By John Heilprin

AP2, June 1, 2006

Henry Paulson may find the tightrope he'll be walking as President Bush's Treasury secretary will span a wider gulf than in his current twin jobs as chairman of Goldman Sachs and The Nature Conservancy.

Both the Wall Street powerhouse and the world's richest environmental group look at global warming as a dire threat requiring government-mandated reductions in carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere like a greenhouse.

Bush doesn't.

In fact, the president has rejected the Kyoto international global warming treaty that was negotiated during the Clinton administration. And that's the rub for staunch supporters of Bush's environmental policies.

"You do not want someone serving as a Cabinet officer who has a habit of indulging his environmental hobby at the expense of his financial responsibilities," said Tom Borelli of the Free Enterprise Action Fund, a mutual fund set up partly to debunk climate science that accepts the idea of global warming.

Steve McCormick, president of The Nature Conservancy, said Paulson won't shy from sharing his views on global warming in Bush's Cabinet.

"He is unhesitant in expressing his opinion when he thinks it's the right thing to do," McCormick said. "I'm sure that if there's an opportunity for Hank to provide his point of view on this issue, he will take advantage of it."

Paulson, nominated Tuesday by Bush to succeed John Snow at Treasury, took an early interest in nature. He was raised as a Christian Scientist on an Illinois farm, where he still keeps five acres and has let raccoons have the run of the house. Before college he wanted to become a forest or park ranger. Instead he opted for a business career, getting an MBA from Harvard.

He and his wife, Wendy, are both skilled birders. At their house in Illinois, they've raised birds, dogs, cats, raccoons, flying squirrels, lizards, snakes, mice, turtles, frogs and a tarantula.

"Environment is my passion," Paulson told Charlie Rose in a PBS interview in 2004.

At Goldman Sachs, he arranged for a handler with a leather glove to bring in captive-bred birds of prey to show off each year. The handler would come from The Peregrine Fund, another conservation group on which he serves on the board.

In New York, he often stops in Central Park, close to where the couple lives, to go bird-watching while on his way to work. Wendy Paulson volunteers as an environmental education teacher at public schools in Harlem. She also is board chairman of Rare, an international environmental nonprofit group.

Environmentalists normally critical of Bush believe they may have an advocate with access to the president's ear.

"It isn't every day that the Sierra Club finds itself welcoming a nomination to George W. Bush's Cabinet while ultraconservatives decry the move," said Carl Pope, the Sierra Club's executive director.

"But on issues like global warming, Hank Paulson appears to favor managing risk rather than cooking the books," Pope said. "It is heartening that someone of Mr. Paulson's stature in the financial world is willing to say that immediate action must be taken to combat global warming."

Like Bush, the Goldman Sachs statement endorsed a market for businesses to buy and sell rights to emit greenhouse gases, saying it will spur technology advances by companies "that lead to a less carbon-intensive economy." But, it added, "Voluntary action alone cannot solve the climate change problem," a position contrary to the Bush administration's view.

The Nature Conservancy, under Paulson's direction, likewise supports a mandatory approach. It supports legislation by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., to cap U.S. greenhouse gases at 2000 levels, within five years. The Senate defeated the measure last year.

William Reilly, who headed the Environmental Protection Agency in President George H.W. Bush's administration and now chairs the World Wildlife Fund, said Paulson is "very much at home in the outdoors."

Paulson became chairman of The Nature Conservancy in 2004 after The Washington Post a year earlier raised questions about tax breaks claimed by the group's benefactors and private side deals on conservation easements.

He quickly assuaged lawmakers' concerns while also promoting conservation to Asia's business leaders and working with Chinese government officials to set land aside for parks.

"He has a reputation of being a very hands-on and supportive chairman," Reilly said of Paulson's work on behalf of environmentalists. "He was personally very generous and helpful in congressional relations the past year or so."

Paulson's Résumé With China Could Become An Asset For Bush (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Few U.S. business leaders have courted China as assiduously as Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, and those ties could prove crucial as the administration deals with China's emergence as an economic powerhouse.

Mr. Paulson says he has traveled to China more than 70 times in the past 15 years, rubbing shoulders with the country's political, financial and academic elite, both as chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and as a director of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental group.

Mr. Paulson's ties could be pivotal as the U.S. tries to navigate its delicate relationship with China -- a country that puts a premium on loyalty among its foreign friends and where personal credibility counts for more than a corporate title.

"The biggest impediment to a healthy U.S.-China economic relationship has been misgivings about motives, a sense of insecurity about what the other side intends," says Daniel Rosen, principal at China Strategic Advisory and an adviser for international economic policy under President Clinton. Mr. Paulson, he says, "is going to make a big difference in U.S.-China economic relations."

As founding chairman of the advisory board of the School of Economics and Management at Tsinghua University, one of China's top colleges, Mr. Paulson, 60 years old, has established a personal rapport with former Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji, the first dean of the school. The two men sat together at the first two board meetings that Mr. Paulson attended and watched the 2004 U.S. presidential-election returns together on TV in Beijing.

Mr. Paulson's work with the Nature Conservancy brought him together with former Chinese President Jiang Zemin, who spent more than an hour talking about global finance and environmental issues with Mr. Paulson in 2001.

Mr. Paulson's efforts have paid off both for his business and his interest in conservation.

In 2004, Goldman Sachs became the first Wall Street firm to gain Chinese approval to set up a joint-venture investment bank. The bank also has won underwriting business on some of China's largest initial public offerings of stock in the past decade.

Goldman helped underwrite the 2000 IPO of PetroChina Co., in what was then the country's largest stock-market listing, and it was a co-manager of yesterday's Bank of China IPO. In 1998, Chinese leaders invited the Nature Conservancy to work on conservation efforts in Yunnan Province, a region the size of Taiwan that is a favorite project of Mr. Paulson's.

The U.S. has a widening trade deficit with China, which has been a source of friction as the two countries become increasingly interdependent. China is one of the biggest holders of U.S. debt and produces low-cost goods on which the U.S. has come to rely. At the same time, China is transitioning to a market-oriented economy from a socialist one, has a poor human-rights record and maintains relations with nations hostile to the U.S., including Iran and North Korea.

If confirmed, Mr. Paulson would have to deal with China's currency and its value relative to the dollar. Critics complain China manipulates the yuan, keeping the value artificially weak so that it can produce goods more inexpensively and give Chinese companies an advantage in the world market. So far, the Bush administration has resisted efforts to brand China a manipulator, preferring to encourage the country to let its currency strengthen.

Some economists and analysts say Mr. Paulson's appreciation of the immense problems Beijing faces in holding together an economy so powerful yet so vulnerable might temper his approach to the currency issue. At the same time, Mr. Paulson has said publicly that China's leaders recognize the need for a "mutually beneficial" economic and trade relationship, saying in a 2004 television interview PBS's Charlie Rose in 2004 that its leaders are "smart enough to recognize if it's not mutually beneficial it's not going anywhere."

Chinese analysts say that while personal knowledge of China will be a plus, they aren't counting on Mr. Paulson to give Beijing an easy ride. "It is unwise to rely on some personal ties," says Mei Xinyu, a researcher with a think tank under the Ministry of Commerce. "If there is some friction between China and the U.S., I believe he will put the U.S. national interests as a priority," he says.

Mr. Mei says Mr. Paulson's experience in China "would help him to become a better coordinator between the two countries." But he worries that his engagement with China might end up as a liability. "Maybe we should not even bring up his China ties," says Mr. Mei. "If he feels too much pressure from Congress, he might have to adopt unfavorable measures just to show his position."

Bush's Lie (WP)

By Dan Froomkin

It's not necessarily a huge deal in itself, but with credibility a paramount issue for the White House these days, it's worth noting that when asked about Treasury Secretary John Snow's future last week, President Bush could easily have ducked the question, or told the truth -- but instead, he chose to lie about it.

Lying is probably the one word mainstream journalists are the most averse to using when recounting what the president said -- even when they know he's not telling the truth. The act of lying requires not just the presentation of false information, but an intention to deceive. Reporters -- and, particularly editors -- are notoriously resistant to ascribe such volition without ironclad evidence.

But there's really no other way to describe what Bush said Thursday. Press secretary Tony Snow's widely-quoted explanation that Bush's statement was in some way "artfully worded" is just plain wrong.

It may not have been an important lie. And there are some mitigating factors: It was, after all, a personnel matter and there was some possibly legitimate concern about the financial markets. But it couldn't be more clear that Bush was being intentionally deceptive.

Here's the transcript of last Thursday's joint press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair. Bloomberg White House correspondent Richard Keil, who Bush calls "Stretch," asked the president the following question:

"Has Treasury Secretary Snow given you any indication that he intends to leave his job any time soon?"

Keil also tacked on a question about the economy. But Bush responded to his first question first: "No, he has not talked to me about resignation. I think he's doing a fine job."

DOJ_NMG_0031364

At Tuesday's press briefing , spokesman Tony Snow (no relation) confirmed that Bush had offered John Snow's job to Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson several days before the press conference, and the spokesman didn't deny that Bush and his treasury secretary had talked about it.

So was Bush being intentionally deceptive?

Tony Snow's response: "No, he said, 'He's not talked to me about resignation.' That does not mean that there were not other discussions. I mean, it was artfully worded. . . . [T]he one thing you do not want to do in a situation like this is to start speculating about changes before the changes are ready to be made. Those do have impacts on markets, and you have to be responsible and cautious in the way you deal with them."

Several White House correspondents dutifully reported Snow's explanation -- but neglected to note that it doesn't wash.

First of all, Bush's direct answer to the question of whether John Snow had given him any indication that he intended to leave his job was, "No." Hard to get around that.

And what was supposedly so artful about Bush saying "he has not talked to me about resignation"? The spokesman acknowledged that Bush and Snow had some discussions, and that over some period of time Snow "had made it clear that he wanted to move on."

So is the White House claiming that Bush was on solid ground because, in the direct Bush-Snow discussions, the word "resignation" literally didn't come up? That they talked about Snow's desire to leave and his succession, but not his "resignation"?

In the best-case scenario -- and if you ignore the "No" at the beginning of Bush's statement -- Tony Snow's description of what the president said as "artful" rests on hair-splitting wordplay at least as preposterous as any Clintonian parsing. Worst-case scenario, the spokesman was just spinning like a top -- and the press corps, by and large, bought it.

A History of (Not) Lying

How hard is it for reporters to call what Bush says a lie? Consider Dana Milbank's near-legendary front-page Washington Post story from October 2002, headlined: "For Bush, Facts Are Malleable."

Milbank wrote that some of Bush's statements "were dubious, if not wrong"; that Bush's "rhetoric has taken some flights of fancy"; that he was guilty of "distortions and exaggerations"; that he had "taken some liberties," "omitted qualifiers," and made assertions that "simply outpace the facts."

But you won't find the word lie in there anywhere. It just won't get by the editors.

Mitigating Factors

One potentially mitigating factor to Bush's lie is that pretty much everyone in the room knew he was lying.

That very morning, Edmund L. Andrews had reported in the New York Times: "John W. Snow has signaled his readiness to step down as Treasury secretary, possibly by the end of June, or as soon as the White House has a candidate to succeed him, say Republicans with ties to the administration."

So here's how Peter Baker and Paul Blustein chose to report on the Bush statement in The Washington Post: "Bush, when asked about the Treasury secretary at his news conference last night, indicated only that he had not spoken directly with Snow and quickly changed the subject to positive economic indicators."

Justified?

One could also argue that it was just an innocent lie, intended simply to temporarily cloak an ongoing personnel matter -- or a justified lie, intended to avoid market disruption.

But the fact remains that Bush and his aides inevitably anticipated a question about Snow would come up. So his response was not an accident.

In other words, here is proof that when Bush feels it is justified, for one reason or another, he is more than capable of lying in response to a direct question, rather than just ducking it.

The obvious follow up question for the White House: When else is lying justified? In times of war, for instance, the commander in chief actually has a responsibility not to divulge secrets that would aid the enemy. But how widely does Bush envision that responsibility? Does it extend to lying, rather than just being discreet? What assurance can Bush give that he's not lying about all sorts of other things?

This is not an incident in a vacuum.

Internet Reaction

Blogger Steve Benen writes: "In the grand scheme of things, examples of Bush's mendacity are so common and disturbing, lying about replacing his Treasury Secretary probably doesn't rank very high. It is, however, an interesting example of the White House spinning a fairly obvious falsehood."

The liberal Think Progress blog has a video clip of the exchange. You can see Bush rubbing his mouth as Keil asks his question. Is that a tell? It's also at 26:44 in the official White House video .

Philadelphia Inquirer reporter Dick Polman headlines his blog post on the subject: "Maybe it all depends on what the definitions of 'no' and 'leaving' and 'resignation' are."

John Dickerson writes in Slate that Bush "could have simply said yes," but instead "answered in a way that was not--to use a White House term--reality-based. . . .

"We allow presidents a measure of obfuscation because in public they must give nuanced answers in some sensitive areas like national security. On personnel matters like this one, the public's right to know is not done grave harm when a president is less than candid. . . .

"In this case, though, the president jumped over the menu of bland dodges available to him and picked the least truthful statement short of 'Secretary Snow is staying.'"

Dickerson writes: "When a person hears a question, dissects it, and fashions an answer on the spot that deceives, it suggests a lot of practice and comfort with fibbing. This is a problem area for Bush: Fifty-six percent of the country does not find him trustworthy, according to recent polls .

But Dickerson, formerly a White House correspondent for Time, can't quite bring himself to call it a lie: "A hat is artful. A toupee is a lie. Bush's answer was toupee-like. Even if it was technically true that Bush had not talked to Snow about 'resignation,' the president knew his confected statement was deceptive. I'm reluctant to call it a lie, but the president abused our trust."

About That Hire

Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey write for Newsweek that "there is one area where Bush has regained some momentum in his troubled second term: his hiring practices."

Mike Allen writes for Time: "Tuesday's announcement that Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, who holds the world's most prestigious investment banking job, had agreed to be nominated for Treasury Secretary was a thrilling coup for a White House that has had little cause for rejoicing lately. . . .

"Aides said Bush convinced his quarry that he would have a seat and voice at the table, and the President seemed to underscore that during his Rose Garden announcement by saying that Paulson 'will be my principal advisor on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans.'"

But Daniel Kadlec writes for Time that "there is no guarantee that Paulson can live up to his reputation as a get-it-done boss. 'We'll have to see if he signed a pre-nup,' says Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers. That's a pointed reference to the limited role that Snow was allowed to play in shaping economic policy under Bush, who has preferred to keep his own counsel and that of Vice President Cheney and top adviser Karl Rove. Snow was widely seen as a pitchman for policies that others wrote."

Iranian Turnaround

Michael A. Fletcher and Glenn Kessler write in The Washington Post: "The Bush administration offered for the first time yesterday to join European talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if the Iranian government suspends efforts to enrich uranium and reprocess spent nuclear fuel, which the administration calls part of a covert attempt to make bombs. . . .

DOJ_NMG_0031366

"The Bush administration previously refused to engage in direct talks with Iran on its nuclear program, preferring to let three European Union nations -- Britain, France and Germany, known as the E.U.-3 -- conduct negotiations. But Germany lately has increasingly urged Washington to deal with Tehran directly, as have a growing roster of foreign policy experts and at least two U.S. senators."

In a news analysis for The Post, Kessler calls it "perhaps the biggest foreign policy shift" of the Bush presidency, coming from "an administration stocked with officials who have made little secret of their desire to overthrow the government in Tehran."

David E. Sanger writes in the New York Times: "During the past month, according to European officials and some current and former members of the Bush administration, it became obvious to Mr. Bush that he could not hope to hold together a fractious coalition of nations to enforce sanctions -- or consider military strikes on Iranian nuclear sites -- unless he first showed a willingness to engage Iran's leadership directly over its nuclear program and exhaust every nonmilitary option."

But wait. Here's what I suspect is the real story, deeper in Sanger's article: " '[Vice President Dick] Cheney was dead set against it,' said one former official who sat in many of those meetings. 'At its heart, this was an argument about whether you could isolate the Iranians enough to force some kind of regime change.' But three officials who were involved in the most recent iteration of that debate said Mr. Cheney and others stepped aside -- perhaps because they read Mr. Bush's body language, or perhaps because they believed Iran would scuttle the effort by insisting that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the right to develop nuclear fuel. . . .

"In the end, said one former official who has kept close tabs on the debate, 'it came down to convincing Cheney and others that if we are going to confront Iran, we first have to check off the box' of trying talks."

You know what this reminds me of a bit? That Blair-Bush summit in the weeks before the invasion of Iraq. Bush came out of the meeting ostensibly seeking a second United Nations resolution. But in fact, as Don Van Natta Jr. wrote for the New York Times in March, Bush was so dead-set on war that he was secretly talking about "ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire, or assassinating Mr. Hussein."

Haditha Watch

Thomas E. Ricks writes for The Washington Post: "The U.S. military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday. . . .

"President Bush, in his first public comment on the Haditha incident, said yesterday that if an investigation finds evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished. 'I am troubled by the initial news stories,' Bush said after a meeting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame."

The investigation "is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the U.S. military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago."

Here's the text of Bush's remarks.

Zinsmeistered

Zachary A. Goldfarb wrote in The Washington Post on Tuesday: "Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, acknowledged he did something wrong when he took a newspaper profile of himself, altered quotes and text, and then posted it on a Web site without noting the changes."

For links, see the very end of my Friday column . One of the quotes Zinsmeister altered was his assertion that "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings."

The Washington Post editorial board yesterday coined a new term for doctored: "Zinsmeistered."

"White House press secretary Tony Snow said Mr. Zinsmeister wanted 'to set the record straight' but did so in an 'unartful' way. Other terms -- perhaps even some of Mr. Zinsmeister's own adjectives -- come to our mind."

Taheri Watch

DOJ_NMG_0031367

Paul Kiel writes for TPM Muckracker: "Two weeks ago, Amir Taheri published an op-ed in Canada's National Post about an Iranian law that forced Jews to wear a yellow stripe. The story, reminiscent of Nazi Germany, quickly provoked outrage, but was just as quickly revealed to be a total fabrication . It also ran in the New York Post .

"Apparently this is just the sort of reliable advice that President Bush needs. Yesterday, Taheri had a face-to-face with the President as one of a small group of 'experts' on Iraq that visited the White House.

"According to Press Secretary Tony Snow, the experts were invited to the White House for their 'honest opinions' on Iraq."

New Staff Secretary

Bush swears in White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the U.S. Court of Appeals this afternoon in the Rose Garden. Yesterday, he announced Kavanaugh's replacement: Raul F. Yanes, currently the general counsel for the White House budget office, formerly senior counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and before that an associate counsel at the White House, also under Gonzales.

So not exactly new blood.

Yanes, in fact, was one of two White House lawyers coordinating the initial White House response to the investigation into the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Marriage Amendment Watch

Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard about how a Senate vote on the proposed amendment to the Constitution to restrict marriage to a man and woman is coming up next week.

"And President Bush, despite his wife Laura's admonition that the marriage issue ought to be kept out of politics, plans to host a pro-amendment event at the White House and speak out in favor of the amendment."

Barnes writes that Bush "will appear on June 5 in the Rose Garden before a gathering of amendment supporters and, a White House official says, 'strongly support' the amendment. The president has rarely mentioned the amendment in the past. The choice of the Rose Garden as a venue means he is raising the marriage amendment to a higher level on his agenda, his wife's advice notwithstanding."

Missing Man

Matthew Mosk writes in The Washington Post: "President Bush shuttled into Maryland last night to help the state Republican Party raise more than $1 million for a number of high-profile 2006 races, but only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him.

"Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent. Steele had a scheduling conflict, campaign spokesman Doug Heye said."

Here's the text of Bush's remarks.

No New Contrition

My Friday column was largely about how the regrets Bush expressed in his press conference didn't really reflect any new contrition -- in spite of the continuing insistence by the press corps that it was some sort of watershed moment.

Several readers e-mailed me to call my attention to one thing I missed. Here's Richard Wolffe of Newsweek with Keith Olbermann on MSNBC later that night: "But of course, it is very rehearsed, everything from the mannerisms you saw, the upwards glance up at the ceiling for inspiration. And for me, the big giveaway was at the end of that answer--I don't know if you could see it on camera, but the president flashed a big grin to those of us sitting in the front rows. It didn't seem that he was quite as contrite as his performance."

And yes, you can actually see that grin at the 51:40 mark of the White House video .

Predictions Redux

David S. Broder writes in his Washington Post opinion column: "In its September 2004 issue , Washington Monthly magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term.

"The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced. . . .

"The one commentator who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum , who runs the magazine's blog. 'What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?' he asked. 'One word: scandal.' "

Worst Ever?

David Lightman writes for the Hartford Courant: "A Quinnipiac Poll released today gives President Bush one more reason to be concerned about his approval numbers: Lots of voters not only think he's doing a lousy job, but they rate him as the worst president since World War II.

"And to add to the sting: They say Bill Clinton was one of the best."

Here are the complete results .

Secretary, Protect Yourself (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

To: Henry Paulson, Treasury secretary-designate

So you decided to take the job, after all. It's no surprise that they wanted you. As the joke that's making the rounds puts it, they're so desperate they're scraping the top of the barrel. But most of us are surprised that you accepted.

No doubt you received assurances that like Robert Rubin, but unlike your predecessors in this administration, you'll get to be a real Treasury secretary. And you probably believe that those assurances can be trusted, if only because the Bush people currently need you a lot more than you need them.

But Paul O'Neill, who received tremendous acclaim from the news media when he was appointed Treasury secretary, must have believed the same thing. The fact is that you'll be treated well as long as you are perceived as someone who adds credibility with people outside the administration, and not a moment longer. Yet I'm sure you're already under pressure to say things that will fatally undermine your credibility.

Before we get to the specifics, you need to disabuse yourself of any illusion that this administration rewards loyalty. Nobody was more loyal than Larry Lindsey, President Bush's first top economist. Yet when Mr. Lindsey blurted out an inconvenient truth — that the Iraq war was likely to cost a fair amount of money (although we now know that his estimate was only a small fraction of the true cost) — he was fired.

And not just fired; he was fired in as insulting a fashion as possible, including snide remarks about his personal appearance. (White House aides made a point of telling reporters that Mr. Bush complained about Mr. Lindsey's failure to exercise.)

So what are you being asked to do that will undermine your credibility? Right now, I'd guess, you're being pressed to support the administration's illusions about how the economy is doing.

Americans are very unhappy with the state of the economy. According to Gallup, only 4 percent of the public considers the economy "excellent," and only 25 percent considers it "good." And there's good reason for this unhappiness. Although profits and C.E.O. compensation have soared, most workers are significantly worse off than they were a year ago.

The official line, however, is that it's a great economy, but that Americans for some reason aren't hearing the good news (just like they aren't hearing the good news from Iraq). Mr. Bush — who, by the way, isn't the affable guy you may have thought you met — doesn't seem as if he realizes that the economy isn't all that good; in his public appearances he seems peeved that he isn't getting credit for a great economy. And he expects you to explain to working Americans that the trouble they're having paying their bills is just a figment of their imagination.

Moreover, if past experience is any guide, you won't be pressured just to spin on the administration's behalf, you'll be pressured to lie.

Look at what happened to Edward Lazear, the chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers. Last month Mr. Lazear and another member of the council published an op-ed article in The Wall Street Journal containing this astonishing assertion: "The president's tax cuts have made the tax code more progressive, which also narrows the difference in take-home earnings."

Now, you can play games with the meaning of the word "progressive," but by any measure the Bush tax cuts have made differences in after-tax earnings wider, not narrower. And just like that, any credibility that Mr. Lazear, a well-regarded academic without a prior reputation as a political hack, may have brought to the job was gone.

What will they ask you to lie about? Maybe you'll be asked to declare that we're on track toward a balanced budget. Or maybe you'll be asked to lie about environmental policy. Some of the administration's right-wing supporters opposed your selection because you are known as a supporter of action against global warming, so the political types might want you to throw them a bone by endorsing the administration's failure to do anything about the threat.

Right now, you're being flattered. You have a natural urge to be a team player. But if you play the game your new bosses want you to play, your credibility with the public will evaporate in no time at all. And when you're no longer useful to your new friends, you'll be tossed aside.

President Celebrates Judge's Swearing-in (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Associated Press, June 1, 2006

President Bush hosted a Rose Garden swearing-in ceremony Thursday for long-stalled judicial nominee Brett Kavanaugh, a White House lawyer who once worked for independent counsel Kenneth Starr's investigations of President Clinton.

Kavanaugh won Senate confirmation to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit late last month on a 57-36 vote after a three-year wait. It was a victory for Bush's drive to place a more conservative stamp on the nation's courts.

Presidents usually are not present when new judges take their oaths. But Kavanaugh, whose nomination was opposed by Democrats, has worked at the White House for the past five years — in the White House counsel's office and as staff secretary.

"I call upon the United States Senate to meet its responsibility to give every nominee a fair hearing and a timely up or down vote," Bush told the 120 guests, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Bush highlighted Kavanaugh's background, saying he had clerked for judges Walter Stapleton and Alex Kozinski on the appeals court and for Justice Anthony Kennedy at the Supreme Court, who gave him the oath.

"Thirty-one years ago today, a young Anthony Kennedy took the oath to be a court of appeals judge," Kavanaugh said. "Since then he has taught all of his law clerks that the Constitution of the United States is a compact between generations that must be preserved and revered and cherished and passed on. I feel that lesson very powerfully today."

In addition to clerking for judges, Kavanaugh was a partner in a national law firm, worked in the solicitor general's office and was an associate independent counsel under Starr. Kavanaugh worked on both the long-running Whitewater case and the 1998 Clinton impeachment case.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has called Kavanaugh a political operative who is the least experienced and most partisan appointee to the court in decades.

Democrats also highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from "highly qualified" to "qualified." Bush countered, saying that in three separate evaluations, all 42 ABA reviewers rated Kavanaugh as "well-qualified" or "qualified" to serve on the federal bench.

Senator Reid Admits Erring On Ethics Rule (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0031370

WASHINGTON, June 1 — Senator Harry Reid's office acknowledged Wednesday night that he had misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and had decided to avoid taking such gifts in the future.

Mr. Reid, a Nevada Democrat, is the Senate minority leader. His office said that Mr. Reid still believed it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but that he had decided to avoid doing so again.

The Associated Press reported Monday that Mr. Reid had accepted the free seats from the Nevada commission as it was trying to convince him that there was no need for a federal boxing commission. Mr. Reid voted to set up a federal commission, but the measure was never enacted.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, joined Mr. Reid for one of the fights and decided to reimburse $1,400 for his seat.

Senate ethics rules warn against taking gifts if the giver may be trying to influence official action.

Mr. Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said Wednesday night that Mr. Reid "misspoke when he said the rule applies only to senators who represent the state agency."

Several ethics experts criticized Mr. Reid's rationale that he felt obligated to take the tickets to ensure that boxing was being properly conducted in his home state.

"He is no more obligated to go to boxing matches than he is to a Celine Dion concert in Vegas," said Melanie Sloan, a former Justice Department prosecutor and head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

Hastert Is Longest-serving GOP Speaker (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, June 1, 2006

Rep. Dennis Hastert, who vaulted out of political obscurity when Newt Gingrich resigned as speaker of the House more than seven years ago, on Thursday became the longest-serving Republican speaker in history.

Hastert, 64, surpasses fellow Illinoisan Joseph "Uncle Joe" Cannon, a pugnacious politician who ruled the House from November 1903 until the Democrats regained the majority in March, 1911.

"The House has achieved unprecedented success under his leadership," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., noting GOP successes in Medicare, education and tax cut legislation. "It's no wonder Denny has become the longest-serving Republican speaker in history."

A former high school history teacher and wrestling coach, Hastert was elected to Congress from a heavily Republican district west of Chicago in 1986. A low-key conservative with ties to former GOP leader Bob Michel, also from Illinois, Hastert was appointed chief deputy whip in 1995 after the Republicans, under new House Speaker Gingrich, gained the majority in the House for the first time in four decades.

Gingrich abruptly resigned as speaker in 1998 after Republicans fared poorly in the midterm elections. The heir apparent, Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., shortly thereafter admitted to an extramarital affair and resigned his seat.

The Republican rank-and-file, looking for a change from the high-profile Gingrich, bypassed better-known but more controversial people, including then-Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, and Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas. They chose Hastert as their next leader, in January 1999.

The longest-serving speaker is Democrat Sam Rayburn of Texas, who served more than 17 years, with two breaks when Republicans were in power, from 1940 through the early 1960s. Like Cannon, Rayburn has a House office building named after him. The longest-serving speaker without a break was Thomas "Tip" O'Neill, D-Mass., House leader from 1977 through 1987.

Medicare Posts 30 Procedures' Prices (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

DOJ_NMG_0031371

How much Medicare pays for hip replacements, cardiac surgery and 28 other procedures in each of the nation's counties went online Thursday, in the government's first effort to post hospital price information for consumers.

The move comes as employers and others who pay the nation's $1.9 trillion health care tab encourage patients to be more like savvy shoppers when it comes to medical care, currently a difficult prospect because so little comparative information on cost and quality is available.

That the federal government, the nation's largest purchaser of health care, is posting such information on its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services website is important, employer groups say.

"The days of medical costs and the difference in health care quality being invisible to consumers are over," says Peter Lee of the San Francisco-based Pacific Business Group on Health, although he says it may still take time to get truly useful consumer information.

Officials at Medicare, which serves about 43 million elderly and disabled people, say releasing the data is a first step in what they hope will be a broad effort by both the government and the private sector to publish price and quality information. The cost data join some hospital quality data on Medicare's website. In the private sector, a few insurers have made limited cost and quality information available to their members.

"Our ultimate vision is that patients will be able to compare hospitals and physicians on cost, quality and consumer satisfaction," said Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt.

Even so, the cost data posted by Medicare won't be useful to most consumers, because:

•The data show the range of what Medicare pays for procedures in each county, not what those with private insurance or the uninsured might pay.

•They do not show what an individual Medicare member pays, although savvy beneficiaries could estimate based on the program's typical co-payments and deductibles.

The newly released data, however, do give consumers hospital-specific information on how many of each of the 30 procedures or treatments each hospital did in 2005. That's important because studies have shown that, in general, the more experience a facility has with a procedure, the better the outcome for the patient.

Data expected to be released later this year will include countywide cost ranges for various procedures paid for by Medicare in outpatient surgery clinics and doctors' offices.

Even though the information is Medicare-specific, Leavitt said it may prove useful for the uninsured, who could use it as a baseline for negotiating with hospitals on the cost of their care.

USA Today, June 2, 2006

At a trial unfolding this week, jurors have been treated to some enlightening testimony about the way Washington works. A former aide to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, recounted how he, Ney, lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others went on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002 aboard a Gulfstream jet arranged by Abramoff.

The trip, documented in photos of the group in front of a jet and on the famed St. Andrews golf course, is now a major liability for the congressman from Ohio, who's under investigation and faces a tough re-election bid. It also provides a window on the sorry state of congressional ethics.

If the golf junket was legal at all, it would have been because it employed two commonly used ruses for skirting ethics rules: the special interest-funded vacation dressed up as a fact-finding mission, and the use of a private jet at a fraction of its true cost.

Here's how Ney's aide, Neil Volz, described the system when he worked on Capitol Hill: "I was given tickets to sporting events, concerts, free food, free meals. In return I gave special treatment to my lobbying buddies."

The testimony and the photos do not make for a pretty picture.

So what is the response from Congress? Well, not much. In separate "lobbying reform" bills crawling through the legislative process, the House of Representatives and Senate leave many of the loopholes allowing members and their staff to accept gifts from lobbyists well above the stated $50 limit. These include sham trips, bargain rates on jets, and premium seats for major sporting events and concerts.

Neither bill would create an office capable of enforcing the few ethics restrictions that do exist.

Perhaps the most comical element of the legislation is the single limit the House version would place on members flying on private jets. The lobbyist whose employer provided the jet would not be allowed to be on board. That would allow the House member to enjoy his indulgence in peace. But don't think for a moment that the lobbyist would have any trouble getting face time.

The legislation has one objective: to make it appear as if a scandal-racked Congress is doing something in an election year. But the fact is that many members of Congress feel cruelly cheated by the $165,200 annual salary they have voted for themselves and harbor a sense of entitlement to supplement their incomes with freebies.

How else to explain behavior like that of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., After it was revealed that he had accepted ringside boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission over a two-year period in which the commission was trying to influence pending legislation, Reid first said he saw no problem. Then, on Wednesday, he said he did nothing wrong but wouldn't do it again.

In fact, there is a problem in his behavior, and in that of many of his colleagues. Perhaps the biggest, however, is that so few seem to see that there is a problem.

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Appears To Be Decelerating (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy is cooling from the torrid pace of earlier this year, with home construction, housing price gains and manufacturing activity starting to slow, according to government and private data released Thursday.

Factories are paying more for materials. Labor costs are rising more slowly than previously estimated — bad news for workers who have seen wages lag but a signal that inflation pressures aren't mounting.

Economists said the reports add credence to the Federal Reserve's prediction that the economy will slow in the second half of the year but added it's not yet clear where inflation is headed.

“It creates a real dilemma for the Fed, because it can see growth slowing, and it can believe at some point in the future slowing growth is going to bring inflation down again, but how long can it wait?” said Nigel Gault of Global Insight.

“The markets have gotten much more nervous … the way ahead is much less clear,” Gault said.

The Fed is debating whether to keep raising rates to combat inflation or take a breather to assess the impact of 16 rate increases since mid-2004. The Fed has raised its target for short-term rates to 5% from a historic low of 1%.

Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, is slightly above the Fed's 1%-2% comfort zone.

In a sign of the slowdown, construction spending dipped 0.1% in April, as residential construction dropped by 1.1%, the largest decline in more than two years, the Commerce Department said. Commercial real estate is booming as housing slows.

So far, the housing slowdown is moderate. The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight says average home prices rose 12.5% from the first quarter of 2005 to the same period in 2006.

Price appreciation in the first three months of 2006 was 2%, or an annualized rate of about 8.1%. While that's still robust, it shows the heady price gains of the past several years could be tapering off as interest rates rise.

“Housing prices (are) still growing stronger than some might have expected,” said OFHEO acting Director James Lockhart. “Price growth is moderating in some parts of the country, particularly in areas where prices have been rising the most.”

In a separate report, the Labor Department said productivity, or output per worker, rose at a healthy annual rate of 3.7% January through March. Salaries and benefits inched up 1.6%, after falling 0.6% in the fourth quarter of 2005. Wage gains had been estimated at a 2.5% clip.

The private Institute of Supply Management said manufacturing activity expanded less quickly in May than in April, while prices paid surged to the highest level since Hurricane Katrina hit last year.

Data Indicate Economy Is Cooling (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Readings on home prices and manufacturing activity offered fresh evidence that the economy is cooling after a blazing start to the year.

Home prices rose 2.0% in the first quarter, the slowest such pace in two years, according to the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. As with other data suggesting a moderate slowdown in the housing market, the Ofheo report shows that the rate of appreciation has gradually declined since peaking last year. Still, the rate of growth in house-price appreciation has retreated only from extraordinary highs, and in the first quarter prices were 12.5% more than a year ago.

A second report showed that the manufacturing sector experienced slower growth. The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said its index of manufacturing activity fell to 54.4 in May from 57.3 in April.

Lower readings on new orders, production and employment contributed to the decline, which left the index at its lowest point in nearly a year.

Together, the figures point to an economy shifting into a slower period of expansion after a robust first quarter.

"The rate of growth is slowing a little bit but we have to realize that we're coming from a first quarter when growth was very strong," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the ISM index and also serves as Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director. "At the end of the day, business spending is staying quite strong and the consumer is the wild card."

Because consumer purchases drive most economic growth, one of the major concerns among economists has been that the softening housing market and high gas prices will cause consumers to curtail their spending. Yesterday's Ofheo report alleviated some concerns on the housing side.

"These data show average housing prices still growing stronger than some might have expected," said James Lockhart, the office's acting director. If prices keep rising, consumers can continue tapping the equity built up in their houses to fuel other forms of spending.

Ofheo is considered the best authority on house prices because it best tracks the changing value of individual homes over time. Its index incorporates data from refinancings as well as purchase transactions. When refinancing data are removed, the index showed purchase prices up 10% in the first quarter compared with a year earlier.

Other measures have shown even less appreciation, and economists at UBS Securities LLC noted that the Ofheo index doesn't include condo and co-op prices, which have experienced some of the sharpest pullbacks.

Regardless of the measure used, however, a consistent theme of gradual cooling in the housing market emerges. "Increasing sales inventories are apparently giving buyers greater bargaining power, while increasing interest rates are dampening demand," said Patrick Lawler, chief economist at Ofheo.

In other signs of the housing slowdown, the Commerce Department said construction spending dropped 0.1% in April as residential home building fell 1.1%. Separately, the National Association of Realtors said its pending-home-sales index, a measure of future activity in the sector, was at 111.8 in April, down 3.7% from March and 11.7% from a year ago.

The ISM reading of 54.4 in May still points to growth for manufacturers, but several components provided reasons for concern. The new-orders index, a barometer of future production, fell to its lowest point in a year.

The employment index fell to 52.9 in May from 55.8 in April, raising more concerns about future growth. The index for prices, an indicator of potential inflationary pressures, jumped to 77.0 last month, its highest mark since the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina late last summer.

Other data released yesterday offered a more comforting signal on inflation. The Labor Department revised upward to 3.7% its measure of nonfarm business productivity in the first quarter, as output jumped 6.5% and hours worked rose 2.7%. Unit labor costs rose 1.6% during the first quarter.

1st-Quarter Home Prices Rise, But At Slower Pace (WP)

By Sandra Fleishman

U.S. home prices continued to rise in the first quarter of the year, but in another sign of a cooling market the pace slowed from the last quarter of 2005, according to a report released yesterday.

Home prices nationally were 12.5 percent higher in the first quarter than a year earlier, according to the survey released by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. In 2005, the average home price jumped about 13.3 percent.

The typical home's value, though, rose only 2 percent in the first three months of 2006, an annual rate of 8.1 percent. That is about a percentage point below the rate from the fourth quarter of 2005 and the lowest quarterly rate of increase since the first quarter of 2004.

Also, for the first time since late 2002, average home prices fell for the quarter in two states, Iowa and South Dakota.

"These data show average housing prices still growing stronger than some might have expected," said James B. Lockhart III, acting director of OFHEO, which regulates mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. "They do indicate, however, that price growth is moderating in some parts of the country, particularly in areas where prices have been rising the most."

In the Washington area, price growth slowed but still far exceeded the national rate. The District, which is counted as a state in the report, came in fifth in the nation, with 20.8 percent growth for the 12 months and 1.5 percent for the quarter. That compares with about 23.4 percent growth in 2005.

In the market that includes the District, Northern Virginia, and Prince George's, Charles and Calvert counties in Maryland, and Jefferson County in West Virginia, the average home price increased 21.8 percent for the 12 months and 2.4 percent for the quarter. In the Montgomery County-Frederick County market defined by the Census Bureau, it was up 18.4 percent for the 12 months and 2.5 percent for the quarter.

For the fourth quarter of 2005, prices in those two markets had increased at annual rates of 24 percent and 20 percent respectively.

Economists said the data were consistent with previous reports of slowing sales of new and existing homes and rising inventories. Many blame rising mortgage rates and a five-year run-up in prices for hurting affordability and sales.

"We've seen substantial home price appreciation in the last five years, particularly on both coasts, that has begun to pinch affordability, especially for first-time home buyers," said Frank E. Nothaft, chief economist for Freddie Mac. As mortgage rates have moved up for the past six months, housing starts, single-family home sales and prices have moderated, he said. "It's clear that it peaked somewhere during the fall of 2005."

Freddie Mac reported yesterday that rates on 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.67 percent, up from 6.62 percent last week. Rates have not been that high since June 2002.

The OFHEO survey is considered the best gauge of prices because it compares prices of the same houses sold or refinanced over time.

Part of the reason prices have held up is that even though homes are taking longer to move, sellers are holding out for their asking prices, said Patrick Lawler, OFHEO chief economist, and "largely they are getting them."

Prices continued to rise the most in vacation areas, such as Arizona, Florida and the Pacific Northwest, although the growth is also slowing there, Lawler said.

The slowing in prices doesn't surprise Donna Evers, head of Evers & Co. Real Estate Inc. in Northwest Washington. She said "prices have more or less leveled off" as the inventory of homes for sale has grown.

Inventory, Evers said, has reached numbers not seen since 1999. But she said sellers should not worry: "1999 was a boom year."

Why Those Pay Hikes Are Not Going Very Far (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

BAINBRIDGE TOWNSHIP, OHIO - As a restaurant manager at Zeppe's Pizzeria, Kym Costello says she's earning good money selling pizzas, subs, and some of the best French fries on the east side of Cleveland.

As a college student who drives 35 miles to class each day, she's also spending a lot - and she reckons her income is not keeping pace with the rising costs of living.

It's a common quandary in today's economy.

On average, American paychecks are rising, as employers offer higher salaries to attract and retain staff. At the same time, inflation has been heating up, burning a bigger hole in consumers' pockets.

The result is a dynamic that's challenging for workers and potentially risky for the economy.

Some analysts say now is the time for workers to enjoy an overdue improvement in their living standards. But others fear a wage-price spiral, in which pay raises ripple into the costs of goods and services, making no one better off.

"Wages are accelerating. I think that's a good thing," says Ken Mayland, president of ClearView Economics in Pepper Pike, Ohio. "But what the [Federal Reserve] will worry about is that these wage increases will just get caught up in more price increases."

That hasn't happened yet. But once a spiral starts, it can be hard to stop, experts say. Concern has risen in recent weeks. Two gauges of inflation have edged up beyond the Federal Reserve's comfort zone - with higher than 2 percent annual growth in "core" prices, which exclude food and energy.

Meanwhile, wages seem to be picking up, although a report Thursday suggested some softening of the trend. The Department of Labor said hourly compensation - which includes benefits as well as wages - rose at a 5.3 percent pace in the first three months of the year, but fell at a 0.9 percent annual pace in the final quarter of 2005.

The Labor Department's April jobs report, released a month ago, showed the sharpest rise in average hourly earnings during the current economic expansion: a 3.8 percent jump from the same month a year earlier.

Fed policymakers will be watching the May jobs report, due out Friday, for further signals on whether they need to boost short-term interest rates for the 17th time when they meet June 28 and 29. A weaker-than-expected number on job creation, for example, could temper worries that a tight labor market is fueling inflation.

"The Fed has a lot of credibility as an inflation fighter now," says Dr. Mayland. "But if it does anything to reduce that credibility, then the economy would pay the price of that for a long time."

Long-term interest rates, for example, could rise as investors demand a premium to cover expectations of higher future inflation.

Still, it isn't necessarily inflationary when wages rise faster than prices. Rising "real" (inflation-adjusted) wages are the norm in a healthy economy.

Employers typically cover the cost of pay raises by improving productivity. A reduction in corporate profits, now at record levels, is another way to pay for wage hikes. It's when pay raises lead to price hikes, and then to expectations of further gains in wages and prices, that a spiral gets going. Some current straws in the wind suggest that the risk is real enough:

• An April survey of small businesses found that more are raising prices - and about the same number say they are hiking wages.

• Companies are working harder to fill positions. With the unemployment rate down to 4.7 percent nationwide, a survey of 100 human-resource executives in April found that one-fourth of them reported a "severe" shortage of workers, according to Challenger, Gray & Christmas, an outplacement firm based in Chicago.

• Expectations of inflation have risen, according to consumer surveys and signals embedded in bond prices on Wall Street. This is important because such expectation can, by itself, help fuel inflation.

Still, not all signs point toward higher inflation.

By some measures, the labor market does not appear to be overly tight. The number of new jobs added each month hasn't been far in excess of the number of new workers entering the labor force, for example. A nationwide index of help-wanted ads has fallen in all nine regions tracked by the Conference Board in New York.

Meanwhile, consumers remain very sensitive to prices, as interest-rate hikes and flatter home prices dampen their spending power.

"Everything is in the hand of the consumer," says Rajeev Dhawan, director of the economic forecasting center at Georgia State University's J. Mack Robinson College of Business in Atlanta.

Consumer spending is much needed here in Ohio, where the pace of job creation is among the slowest in the nation. Ohio has just 0.5 percent more jobs now than it did a year ago, compared with job growth of 1.5 percent nationwide.

But at Zeppe's Pizzeria, with a "drivers wanted" sign in the window, business is brisk enough to support some raises.

"My pay here has gone up a lot since I started," says Ms. Costello, who is majoring in chemistry at Lake Erie College in Painesville, Ohio.

If the economy runs smoothly and the Fed does its job just right, she and other workers stand to benefit from more raises as the job market strengthens. Living standards should rise.

That would be a welcome reward for workers. Average hourly earnings, at $16.68 last month, are below the peak they reached in 2003, after adjusting for inflation. "It's been remarkable how little the wages have moved" as the current expansion has gained traction, says John Challenger, president of Challenger, Gray & Christmas.

Statistics for compensation, which is a broader measure of pay, appear to be brighter because benefits are included. But today's workers are reaping smaller rewards from rising productivity than they did in the past. In the 1960s and 1970s, hourly compensation grew 1.9 percent a year, adjusted for inflation.

From 1985-2004, real hourly compensation grew just 1.3 percent a year, even though per-hour output was rising at a similar pace of more than 2 percent.

One reason for the gap, economists say, is globalization, which has put downward pressure on American wages. Several billion workers are now part of a global labor market.

As labor has lost clout, investors have gained. More of the gains from productivity go to shareholders, in the form of higher profits, rather than to workers.

Now an important question is how much worker clout will bounce back.

Salaries at small businesses have risen for eight consecutive months, according to SurePayroll, a Chicago-area firm that processes paychecks nationwide. The April rise alone showed a salary gain of 0.93 percent over March.

Worker output has been improving, up to a 3.7 percent annual pace, according to the first-quarter number released by the Labor Department Thursday. That could bode well for noninflationary wage growth, as long as there's no recession. "I'm optimistic," Mayland says.

Stocks Surge As Inflation Fears Ease On Factory Data, Falling Oil Prices (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

As June replaced May, hope replaced fear, and stocks moved strongly higher.

A fresh batch of economic reports spurred hopes that inflationary pressure might be easing, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average, which has been under pressure for almost a month, rose 91.97 points, or 0.82%, to 11260.28. It is up 5.1% this year.

Investors shifted money to stocks they had fled. The Nasdaq Composite Index, whose beleaguered technology stocks had pushed it into the red for 2006, surged 1.88%, or 40.98 points, to 2219.86. It is up for the year again, by 0.7%.

Chain stores reported strong May sales, belying an earlier lukewarm report from Wal-Mart. The reports softened fears that high gasoline costs were stifling consumer spending.

A wide variety of commodity prices fell, including oil and gold, easing inflation fears. Crude-oil futures fell 95 cents to $70.34 a barrel, while gold fell $14.90 to $627.60 a troy ounce.

A report on May manufacturing activity was lighter than expected, easing fears that a hot economy would force the Federal Reserve to push short-term interest rates higher at its meeting June 28 and 29. New jobless claims for last week came in stronger than expected, also helping calm inflation fears.

"The inflation scare has settled down a little bit," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at Greenwich, Conn., brokerage firm Execution LLC. "As long as there are no negative surprises on some of the economic numbers, I think the market is still in decent shape."

The reduced inflation fears pushed bond prices higher, sending yields lower. Falling yields help hold down a variety of market interest rates, which also was good news for stocks.

Investors now will be examining this morning's much-awaited May hiring report, looking for signs of inflationary pressure in this indicator, which is said to be much-watched by the Fed.

DOJ_NMG_0031377

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, whose 3.1% May decline was its worst monthly drop in two years, rose 1.23%, or 15.62 points, to 1285.71, up 3% for 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.20%, or 0.43 point, to 214.74.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.42 billion shares, as 2,566 stocks rose and 720 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.108%. The 30-year bond was up 12/32 to yield 5.201%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 112.70 yen, up from 112.54, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2799 from $1.2816.

Economic Reports Push Stocks Higher (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 2, 2006

NEW YORK — After a dismal May, stocks rose sharply in the first day of June trading.

The spark: a batch of economic reports that flashed benign inflation readings, which data-watching investors interpreted as a sign the Federal Reserve will have some more wiggle room in deciding whether to raise its target for short-term interest rates when it meets in late June. A strong retail sales report for May, bucking the cautious comments from Wal-Mart earlier in the week, also gave stocks a boost Thursday.

The Dow Jones industrials climbed 91.97 points, or 0.8%, to 11,260.28. Broader stock indicators surged. The Standard & Poor's 500 index gained 15.62 points, or 1.2%, to 1285.71; the Nasdaq composite surged 40.98 points, or 1.9%, to 2219.86, returning to positive territory for 2006.

“People are finally starting to realize that there is some value in the market (after the May swoon),” says Chris Orndorff, head of equities at Payden & Rygel.

Ever since the Fed noted in the minutes of its last meeting that it would make its decision on rates based on incoming economic data, investors have closely monitored economic reports for any hints as to what the Fed might do.

Signs of a slowing economy in the form of an increase in the number of first-time jobless claims last week and a dip in a closely watched manufacturing index was viewed positively, as it indicates the Fed's 16 rate increases since June 2004 are causing the economy to moderate. An upward revision in first-quarter productivity was also viewed as non-inflationary.

Textron climbed $3.24 to $94.17 after the maker of products ranging from Bell helicopters to E-Z-GO golf carts said it would sell its fastening systems operation for $630 million in cash to a private equity firm as part of a plan to exit slow-growing businesses.

•Movado jumped $4.42, or 24%, to $23.11. The luxury watchmaker said its first-quarter earnings more than doubled on solid sales growth.

•Chicago Bridge & Iron added $1.78 to $24.26. Although the construction and engineering firm posted a lower quarterly profit, its sales came in sharply ahead of targets.

Economy Holds Good News — For The Rich (USAT)

By Julianne Malveaux

USA Today, June 2, 2006

The American economy grew by 5.3% in the first quarter of 2006, and the unemployment rate, at 4.7% in April, is the lowest it has been in years, prompting Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez to say that this year, "the American economy hit the ground running."

But if the news is so good, why is the stock market skittish, and why did consumer confidence dip 6% last month? Why isn't the economic good news trickling down? The White House may be concerned that the news isn't trickling up, either.

Goldman Sachs' chairman, Henry Paulson, has been nominated to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow, some say because Snow couldn't sell the Bush administration's economic policies on Wall Street.

As well respected as Paulson is, can the deficit hawk flip-flop enough to sell our growing deficit to Wall Street? Perhaps he'll spin it by saying the deficit will mandate spending cuts, but that's not good news to those folks who still need a safety net and government help with education, housing, retirement and health care.

The average American has not experienced much good economic news lately. The wealth gap is growing. Median family income has been dropping. Meanwhile, gasoline prices are up 36% from a year ago. With interest rates rising, those with adjustable rate mortgages face higher payments, and residential rents also are nudging up. Incomes are not keeping pace with inflation, and the job market is weak.

New York Times writer Louis Uchitelle describes workers as "disposable Americans," and daily headlines about layoffs — recently reports surfaced that Walt Disney Studios will lay off up to 10% of its workers — reinforce the sense of job insecurity.

There don't seem to be many breaks out there for those at the bottom.

The $5.15 hourly minimum wage has not been raised in a decade. The most recent tax cut legislation that extends breaks on capital gains and dividends will provide the bottom 40% of taxpayers with less than $20 in tax cuts over a three-year period. In contrast, more than two-thirds of the benefits of the tax cut will go to the top 5% of our nation's earners.

Snow is passing the Treasury secretary baton to Paulson because he couldn't "snow" America with economic happy talk. Paulson might be able to make a more convincing case to Wall Street, but who will make the case for a shared economic growth that trickles down far enough to benefit working people and the poor?

Freakoutonomics (NYT)

By Charles R. Morris

LAST month saw one of the sharpest drops in consumer confidence since the recessions of 1979-1982. But those were truly dreadful times. Oil prices tripled, rates on home mortgages shot into the mid-teens, the stock market was a disaster area and unemployment rates reached double digits.

Over the past three years, by contrast, American economic performance has been almost glittering. Inflation is still low, while employment and productivity have all been rising strongly. True, stock markets are clearly nervous, and the sharp upsurge in gas prices is adding to consumer skittishness. But the reaction still seems inconsistent with the economy's underlying strengths.

There are parallels with another historical period, however, that suggest the deeper currents of uneasiness.

Pan the camera back to Pittsburgh, July 1877. The Pennsylvania Railroad yard, stretching along the city's riverfront, is a raging inferno, set afire by angry mobs of railroad workers. A contingent of state militiamen, trapped in a burning railroad roundhouse, fight their way through the flames with a Gatling gun.

Over the next few weeks riots rage throughout the country. In Chicago, newspaper headlines declare that "howling mobs" control the city. In New York, The Sun demands a "diet of lead" for rioters. Unrest in San Francisco explodes into a vicious anti-Chinese pogrom. The same period marks the glory years of the rural Granger movement and the Roman-candle growth of the Knights of Labor. American Populism puts down permanent roots.

Historians long attributed the turmoil to a "great depression of the 1870's." But recent detailed reconstructions of 19th-century data by economic historians show that there was no 1870's depression: aside from a short recession in 1873, in fact, the decade saw possibly the fastest sustained growth in American history.

Employment grew strongly, faster than the rate of immigration; consumption of food and other goods rose across the board. On a per capita basis, almost all output measures were up spectacularly. By the end of the decade, people were better housed, better clothed and lived on bigger farms. Department stores were popping up even in medium-sized cities. America was transforming into the world's first mass consumer society.

But why did people feel so miserable? Partly they were confused by prices, which were dropping sharply. Farmers thought falling grain prices meant they were getting poorer, without noticing that the price of everything else was falling too. Farmers' terms of trade — the price differences between what they sold and what they bought — actually racked up solid gains in the 1870's.

But ordinary people still had good reason to be terrified, just as ordinary people do today. Midwestern 1870's factory farms — thousand-acre spreads with 70-horse plowing teams — quickly dominated world markets but also wiped out the much smaller grain farmers of New York. Globalized grain markets were more volatile: good weather on the Russian steppes could ruin an American grower's year. Farmers found themselves caught in the coils of grain futures markets.

After the Civil War, artisanal local manufacturers usually enjoyed comfortable mini-monopolies. But with the rapid spread of the railroads and the telegraph, new department stores and mail-order catalogs pressured local producers and middlemen with mass-produced goods, a precursor to the Wal-Mart era. In the mid-1880's, the Bloomingdale's catalog promised that orders would arrive within two weeks in virtually the whole of the United States, including large swathes of territory reachable only by wagon-train a decade before. The productivity shock was comparable to that from the Internet in our own day.

Before the Civil War, America was perhaps the most egalitarian society in the world. But the unbridled entrepreneurialism of the 1870's gave rise to the robber barons. Even if ordinary people were doing better in the 1870's, the yawning gap between the very rich and everybody else fanned resentments. Interestingly, wealth inequality in today's America is roughly the same as in the Gilded Age.

The sharply increased social and geographic mobility of the 1870's set people adrift from traditional sources of security in families and villages. In our own day, the destruction of employer-employee relationships, the erosion of pension protection and employee health insurance may be creating a similar loss of moorings.

If one counts only the size of houses and cars, and the numbers of electronic gadgets stuffed into rec rooms, Americans are probably better off than ever before. But as the 1870's suggest, economic well-being doesn't come just from piling up toys. An economy has psychological or, if you will, spiritual, dimensions. A conviction of fairness, a feeling of not being totally on one's own, a sense of reasonable stability and predictability are all essential components of good economic performance. When they were missing in the 1870's, in the midst of a boom, the populace was brought to the brink of revolt.

N.Y.'s Hevesi Apologizes For Bush Remark (AP-Y2)

By Adam Goldman

AP2, June 1, 2006

State Comptroller Alan Hevesi publicly apologized Thursday for a "beyond dumb" remark about a fellow Democrat "putting a bullet between the president's eyes."

Hevesi hastily called a mea culpa press conference hours after putting his foot in his mouth at the Queens College commencement.

In the videotaped speech, Hevesi describes Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., as, "the man who, how do I phrase this diplomatically, who will put a bullet between the president's eyes if he could get away with it."

At the news conference, a contrite Hevesi said he was trying to convey that Schumer has the strength and courage to stand up to the president.

"I do speak extemporaneously," he said. "And I've never said anything like this."

Hevesi apologized to Bush and Schumer and said he is "not a person of violence."

"I am apologizing as abjectly as I can. There is no excuse for it. It was beyond dumb."

Hevesi, a longtime professor of government and politics at Queens College before becoming comptroller, said he hadn't been in touch with the White House but hoped his apology reached President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0031380

A White House spokesman did not immediately return a telephone message seeking comment Thursday. But one Republican seized on Hevesi's words.

"Threats against the president are no joke and this incident raises real concerns about Alan Hevesi's fitness to hold public office," GOP comptroller nominee J. Christopher Callaghan said during his acceptance speech at the Republican state convention on Long Island.

Schumer spokeswoman Risa Heller said the senator was satisfied with Hevesi's apology.

"Comptroller Hevesi was trying to make a point. He went way too far and it was inappropriate and wrong," Heller said. "He has apologized to both the senator and the president and we believe that ends the matter."

Republicans Fear Waning Political Fortunes (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y., June 1 — Twelve years ago, when they gathered at their state convention, Republicans were so hungry to retake the governorship that party bosses led by Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato brokered a deal to spare George E. Pataki a primary against his fiercest opponent.

But when the Republicans met here on Thursday to choose a new candidate for governor, the party found itself dispirited and deeply divided. Last-minute efforts by Governor Pataki, a lame duck, and other party leaders to avoid a potentially damaging primary fell apart. And the leadership's favored candidate for governor, William F. Weld, finished a distant second, earning a spot on the primary ballot but failing in his bid to be the party's designee.

It was a largely gloomy gathering, except for the rambunctious partisans of John Faso, a former assemblyman who pulled off an upset when he became the party's designee with 61 percent of the vote. If the Democrats seemed to taste victory at their gathering in Buffalo earlier this week and let their excitement spill over at their many breakfasts and receptions and parties, many Republicans here said privately that they feared their 12-year run of good fortune was coming to an end. Empty chairs pocked many of their events.

Many Republicans, from state senators to consultants to county chairmen to a former Pataki administration official, said privately that some of the blame lay with Governor Pataki. They used phrases like "train wreck" to describe the party and "lack of leadership" to describe the governor's stewardship of it.

Anthony Scannapieco Jr., the Republican chairman of Putnam County, where the governor lives, lamented: "The governor lay back for a long time. I don't know where his thoughts were, maybe they were in Washington, but he lay back for a long time."

Robert Smith, the chairman of the Onondaga Republican Party, complained that the state party chairman, Stephen J. Minarik III, had tried to foist the Weld candidacy on the rank and file. "I feel abandoned by the hierarchy of our party," said Mr. Smith, a Faso supporter. "I think this is a complete testament to the leadership of Mr. Minarik."

Governor Pataki, for his part, tried to rally the troops Tuesday afternoon. He showed the convention a glitzy, campaign-style video about himself (complete with images of the twin towers burning) and tried to make the case that the Republicans could run on his record and win.

"We are in the process of putting together a great ticket," he said in a speech, as some delegates drifted out of the Hofstra Arena. "We have a record that people can run on, because this is a better state than it was 12 years ago."

But the candidates running to succeed Governor Pataki painted a bleak view of the state of the state after 12 years under him. While Mr. Faso praised the governor's leadership, both he and Mr. Weld complained in speeches that New Yorkers were leaving the state in record numbers, that taxes were too high and that the state spent too much.

And Mr. Weld, stressing his independence and outsider status, said, "I haven't cut secret deals with Dennis Rivera, or Randi Weingarten or the trial lawyers lobby," referring to two union leaders who endorsed Governor Pataki in 2002 and an organization that recently contributed $50,000 to his national committee.

It got so bad that J. Christopher Callaghan, the party's nominee for comptroller, found himself insisting "I detect a pulse" from the stage and delivering a mild rebuke. "We've gone from blaming Democrats to blaming each other," he said. "I've got a hunch this is not a winning strategy."

Even the setting of the convention, Long Island, was a reminder of how bad things have gotten for Republicans in New York. The Democrats took over Nassau and Suffolk County governments this year for what party officials say is the first time. Since Mr. Pataki took office in 1994, he has been the only Republican elected to a statewide post. And statewide, Democrats have seen their edge in voter registration grow by 600,000 votes over the past decade, according to Board of Elections figures.

"It's like Dutch elm disease," said Nelson Warfield, a Republican strategist who was Bob Dole's press secretary in 1996. "The great Republican trees are dying."

He continued: "In the last dozen years, the Republican Party has largely become all about Pataki. The governor never focused on trying to establish a farm team within the party, and now, as his era ends, it is apparent that the party has not prospered under him."

This week party leaders made a last-ditch attempt to avoid a primary by trying to broker a Weld-Faso ticket. Mr. Faso rejected their bid to have him step aside and run for lieutenant governor instead.

After all, Mr. Faso had stepped aside once before. In 1994, he was persuaded to pull out of the comptroller's race so Herbert London, who was popular with Conservatives, could campaign for that post instead of challenging Mr. Pataki in a bid for governor. There was no such deal this year.

Some tried to adopt a philosophical tone. "Ebb and flow, ebb and flow," said James Ortenzio, the Manhattan chairman, who supports Mr. Weld. "Twelve years, and the other party has some energy, has some vigor. But I think we need this. I think this is required revamping. Catharsis can occur. Don't know."

N.Y. Republicans Set Up Faso-Weld Primary (AP-Y2)

By Michael Gormley

AP2, June 1, 2006

State Republicans on Thursday designated former Assembly minority leader John Faso as their candidate for governor but gave enough support to former Massachusetts Gov. Bill Weld for a spot on the primary ballot.

Faso became the party designee by receiving more than 50 percent of the weighted vote after negotiations that went into the early morning and included Gov. George Pataki, said state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik.

Faso, who had lost a December straw poll, came away Thursday with 59.5 percent of the weighted vote to Weld's 40.5 percent.

"Today we begin a battle for the hearts and minds of our fellow New Yorkers," Faso said. "Our message is clear: We need to cut taxes, we need to create jobs and we need to restore opportunity, and we need to reform New York state's government."

Weld questioned the value of the party designation in a primary campaign. "I suppose it would be nice, but my campaign would be unaffected," he said Thursday.

Republican leaders, meeting this week in their state convention on Long Island, had been hoping to avoid a primary campaign, which could hamper and divide fundraising at a time Democrat Eliot Spitzer has large leads in early polls.

Democrats on Tuesday gave their overwhelming support to Spitzer, a two-term attorney general with a national reputation for his Wall Street investigations.

Faso and Weld have both declined to seek the lieutenant governor spot, a possibility some Republicans thought would create political balance. Weld, the former two-term Massachusetts governor and Reagan administration prosecutor, is considered more socially moderate than Faso, who opposes abortion and gay marriage.

"Pragmatically, the state is moderate to left statewide on social issues," Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno said. "If you put them together, you have one viable ticket."

N.Y. Republicans Send Faso, Weld To Governor Primary (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Greg Bensinger

Bloomberg, June 1, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- Former New York Assembly Minority Leader John Faso won backing from a majority of Republican convention delegates for the party's nomination for governor today, defeating former Massachusetts Governor William Weld.

Weld still qualified for the Sept. 12 Republican primary ballot, with 38.8 percent of the delegates' vote at Hofstra University in Hempstead to 61.2 percent for Faso, and said he would stay in the race. Weld needed 25 percent to avoid having to get on the ballot through petition signatures. Faso's majority support makes him the party's designated choice.

Either Republican would face an uphill battle in the November general election against the Democratic front-runner, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, according to recent polls. Republican Governor George Pataki is stepping down after serving three terms.

``Spitzer's ahead in the polls and ahead in the money and that does present some big challenges for Faso or Weld," said John Spencer, designated the Republicans' preferred candidate in the U.S. Senate race yesterday. ``We do have a problem with voters downstate in facing Spitzer and we're going to have to motivate our base if we're going to win."

Spitzer, 46, who built a national reputation with investigations of Wall Street, won the Democratic Party's designation by acclamation two days ago at a convention in Buffalo.

Divergence

Both Republican candidates have called for more fiscal restraint to keep taxes lower and encourage business investment. They diverge on social issues, with Weld supporting legalized abortion and gay rights and Faso opposing them.

``Eliot Spitzer's problem is that he has allied with the big government special interests who have already placed their bets with millions and millions of dollars in his campaign," Faso said in a speech to the convention. ``You can be sure they want something for their money, and it's not tax cuts."

In response, Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson said, ``The sort of shrill, partisan accusations that we heard today have nothing to do what Eliot Spitzer has said, how he has governed, or where he plans on taking the state."

Weld, 60, the Massachusetts governor from 1991 to 1997 and current head of a New York City investment firm, had been endorsed by state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik. Faso, 53, drew support from county leaders around the state.

Conservative Backing

Faso, a lawyer from New York's Hudson Valley, also has the endorsement of the state Conservative Party, which has backed every successful statewide Republican candidate for the past 30 years.

Weld has been dogged by questions about his presidency of Decker College a Kentucky trade school, which fell into bankruptcy a month after he resigned. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating the school for fraud.

Republican State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno said Faso's win ``was a very decisive vote." Without saying whether he would ask Weld to withdraw, Bruno described Faso as ``the nominee."

Weld said he would stay in the race. ``This is the first day of the rest of the campaign," he told reporters. ``I will predict with some assurance that I will win the primary." Faso said, ``I would certainly like to avoid a primary, but if we have one, so be it."

Polls

Among New York Republican voters, Faso led Weld 30 percent to 21 percent in a May 10 Marist poll, with 49 percent undecided.

A May 17 Quinnipiac University survey showed Spitzer leading both Faso and Weld by at least 49 percentage points. The poll also ranked Spitzer as the most popular statewide officeholder, with a job approval rating of 66 percent.

Spitzer led his Democratic opponent, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi, by 73 percent to 13 percent in the Quinnipiac poll. Suozzi, 43, needs to collect 15,000 petition signatures to qualify for the primary ballot.

In a Jan. 15 filing, the most recent date available, Spitzer reported he had $19 million in the bank compared with Weld's $2 million and Faso's $1 million. Suozzi reported raising more than $5 million. The next filings are due July 15.

Faso said he faced a big challenge in catching up on fundraising So Spitzer. ``We have to fundraise this evening when I leave here, and will raise from ever person I can see."

Other Races

DOJ_NMG_0031383

Republican delegates also put two candidates for lieutenant governor on the primary ballot. A majority made Faso's choice, C. Scott Vanderhoef, 57, the designee. His opponent is Weld's running mate, New York Secretary of State Chris Jacobs, 39. The lone Democratic candidate is State Senate Minority Leader David Paterson, 52.

The unopposed Republican choice for comptroller is Saratoga County Treasurer Christopher Callaghan, 59. He will face Democrat Alan Hevesi, 66, who is seeking re-election to a second term, in November.

War Handicaps Senators In '08 White House Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

With Iraq looming yet again over an American presidential campaign, senators considering a White House race are at a disadvantage over governors who might run, forced to explain their votes — and in some cases, alter their views — on an increasingly unpopular war.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, both prospective 2008 candidates, have encountered hecklers protesting their support for the Iraq war. Both responded with hints of recalibrations in the way they discussed the issue, with Mrs. Clinton telling Democrats who nominated her on Wednesday for a second term to "stand with me" in pressing the White House and Iraqis to develop a plan that would permit American troops to come home.

Two other prospective Democratic presidential candidates, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, say they regret voting for the war. Both have called for setting a deadline to withdraw American troops, a position that analysts say enjoys strong support among Democrats who are active in primaries and who were wary of both men for their pro-war votes in 2004.

"I think I was wrong to vote for the war," Mr. Edwards said in an interview. "Bush made this mess that we are in now. My view is what America needs to do now is make it clear that we are going to get out."

By contrast, governors are finding considerable maneuvering room when it comes to Iraq. And they are taking advantage of it for now, while realizing that their lack of foreign policy experience is a disadvantage in an election that could focus on international affairs.

Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, a Democrat, declined to say in an interview how he would have voted on the war.

"I'm not going to get into that; this isn't about what happened in the past," Mr. Vilsack said. "If we're looking at the elections of 2006 and 2008, I think it's important to look to the future and learn from whatever mistakes we made in the past."

Mark Warner, a former Virginia governor and another likely Democratic presidential contender, said he did not support setting a deadline for troop withdrawal.

"We have been put in this extraordinarily difficult situation," Mr. Warner said. "My sense is going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan. So I have not been one of those people who say that come heck or high water, we are going to leave by a fixed date."

Mr. Warner spoke empathetically of his potential rivals who as senators voted for the war.

"I don't think any U.S. senator, regardless of party, if they had known there weren't W.M.D., that we were going to get selected leaks, I don't think anybody would have voted for it," he said. "Second-guessing people who made a valiant attempt at judgment is not where I am at."

On the Republican side, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts applauded the invasion and said the United States should stay until the situation was settled. But he was critical of Bush administration management of Iraq, including the lack of sufficient troops to help secure the country to and the Abu Ghraib torture scandal.

"As the president and Tony Blair said, knowing what we know today, would we have managed the postconflict effort differently?" Mr. Romney said, referring to the British prime minister. "Of course."

Asked if he had voiced those concerns before public opinion turned against the war, and Mr. Bush himself acknowledged the shortcomings, Mr. Romney responded: "I haven't spoken out on this topic until relatively recently. I can't pull you quotes back from that time."

DOJ_NMG_0031384

The prospective candidates are planning now as if the war will be as big an issue in 2008 as it was in 2004. If anything, the politics surrounding the war are likely to become more volatile with disclosures about alleged killings of Iraqi civilians by marines in Haditha, a case that has prompted comparisons with the My Lai massacre in the Vietnam War.

"I think it's going to get worse before it gets better," Mr. Kerry said in an interview.

As Mr. McCain saw when he was hooted down at a speech at the New School in New York, this issue could be a problem for candidates from both parties. Opposition to the war is no longer confined to Democrats; it is also on the rise among independents, who are the heart of Mr. McCain's appeal in a general election.

Both Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton have, to varying degrees, shifted their tone in talking about the war as they find themselves on the frontier of public opinion. Mr. McCain has given three speeches over two weeks affirming his support for the war, but he used conciliatory language as he noted its high costs and declared that "Americans should argue about this war."

When Mrs. Clinton was heckled by war protesters last week, she said that she stood by her support for the war, but added that she was beginning to see circumstances where the United States would be able to withdraw.

An adviser said this could prove to be the start of an evolution that would lead to Mrs. Clinton's increasingly distancing herself from the conflict.

Governors have historically had an advantage over members of Congress in presidential elections; no sitting member of Congress has been elected to the White House since John F. Kennedy in 1960. Some officials in both parties suggest that the 2008 contest could break that pattern if the debate focuses largely on the candidates' credentials to manage difficult foreign policy issues.

Some of the highest-profile governors and former governors who are thinking of running for president, including Mr. Romney and Mr. Vilsack, have in recent months made trips to Iraq.

Mr. Vilsack said in an interview that he thought it was a mistake to set a deadline for troop withdrawal, but that the United States had to make clear to Iraqis "how they should not rely on the United States."

Democratic analysts said Mr. Warner and Mr. Vilsack had more flexibility in resisting party members' pressure for withdrawal because they lacked the baggage of having supported the war in the first place.

On this issue, Mr. Warner and Mr. Vilsack are closer to some of the probable Republican candidates than to Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards. "We should stay in Iraq until the Iraqis are able to maintain their own security," Mr. Romney said, rejecting the idea for a deadline.

In calling for a deadline, Mr. Kerry said that having one would give Iraq the impetus to take responsibility for dealing with a war that had devolved into an unmanageable civil strife.

"There's nothing that our troops can do — nothing — to resolve the fundamental differences between the factions," he said.

Mr. Kerry derided Mr. McCain for his continued support for the war, saying: "He's dead wrong. I think it's the wrong war in the wrong place. We've paid a huge price for this in the Middle East."

Kerry Attacks Bush Over Iraq Policies (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) harshly criticized the Bush administration for "disdaining diplomacy" in favor of a confrontational and unilateral foreign policy that has hurt the United States' standing around the world and made it less safe.

In a speech Thursday in Los Angeles, the former (and perhaps future) Democratic Party presidential candidate warned that the mistakes of Iraq must not be repeated in the current standoff with Iran.

"War is the ultimate failure of diplomacy," Kerry told a gathering of the Pacific Council on International Policy. "Yet our current leadership has arrogantly discarded this basic principle…. All too often they disdained diplomacy as little more than an inconvenient detour on the chosen path to armed conflict."

The result, he said, was an ill-advised rush to war in Iraq that alienated other governments and diminished sympathy for the U.S. generated by the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. America's current isolation, and the presence of thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq, is "playing right into Iranian hands…. The Iranians are delighted," Kerry said.

Emphasizing that a nuclear-armed Iran would be "a very serious threat to the U.S. and our allies," Kerry contended that the most conservative estimates are that Tehran is at least five years away from developing atomic weapons.

"There is time for diplomacy to work here," he said, but added that negotiating with Iran is "an uncertain proposition at best."

Kerry spoke before news broke of the agreement between six major powers, including the U.S., to offer an incentive package for Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions. He hailed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent offer of direct negotiations with Iran, but said any talks "must be more than an effort to check the box on diplomacy as they move toward a confrontation."

The 21-year veteran of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee also had harsh words for the Iraqi government. The sight of politicians haggling over Cabinet seats in the midst of an undiminished insurgency is "a disgrace, and this administration ought to get tough," he said.

He proposed intense U.S. pressure to force consensus, either by withholding reconstruction funds or threatening a unilateral withdrawal of troops.

Kerry, who voted to give President Bush authorization to use force against Saddam Hussein in 2002, said he would attach an amendment to this summer's defense appropriations bill calling for a total withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of this year. But he acknowledged that the idea would be unpopular. "I know I'm not going to get the majority of my own caucus."

On domestic issues, Kerry predicted that rising public dissatisfaction with the Bush administration could translate into huge gains for Democratic candidates in November's midterm congressional elections.

"There is something bubbling up in America that I believe is going to be reflected in the polls," he said.

As for his own political ambitions, Kerry would say only that he is "thinking very hard" about another presidential run in 2008.

"And I'm thinking about it a lot earlier than I'd like to because it's clear there are several other people also thinking about it," he said

Ex-C.I.A. Officer In New Book Talks (NYT)

By Motoko Rich

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The $2.5 million book deal that Valerie Plame Wilson, the former Central Intelligence Agency officer whose identity was publicly disclosed three years ago, negotiated with Crown Publishing Group last month has fallen through.

Ms. Wilson, who could not agree on terms with Crown, is now in exclusive negotiations with Simon & Schuster, which originally had lost an auction for the book to Crown.

Although no contract has yet been signed with Simon & Schuster, David Rosenthal, the publisher, said, "We are optimistic about these talks."

When Crown announced the deal last month, Steve Ross, senior vice president and publisher, said the book had a working title of "Fair Game" and would be published in the fall of 2007. He said at the time that the book would be the "first airing of her actual role in the American intelligence community, as well as the prominence of her role in the lead-up to the war."

Yesterday, Tina Constable, a spokeswoman at Crown, said, "We had a difference of opinion on some of the contract terms, and we agreed to release each other from any publishing obligations."

Elyse Cheney, Ms. Wilson's agent, declined to comment on the nature of the disagreement.

This is not the first time that Crown has lost a deal with a former member of the C.I.A. It originally agreed to publish a book by George J. Tenet, a former director of central intelligence. That deal too fell apart, and now Mr. Tenet's book will be published by HarperCollins in February 2007 as "At the Center of the Storm."

Two Important Rulings On AIDS (NYT)

Federal judges in New York and the District of Columbia have declared unconstitutional a 2003 rule that limits the way U.S. health groups spend their privately raised money if they want to get federal money for international AIDS work.

Under this sweeping edict, nonprofits that want government support must sign a pledge saying they oppose prostitution and will not spend any money — public or private — on programs the government does not approve of. Many groups are wary of signing, not because they favor prostitution, but because it is an offense to free speech, and because they are worried about harming vital programs aimed at teaching prostitutes about condom use.

In the New York case, one of the plaintiffs challenging the prostitution pledge, Alliance for Open Society International, told the court it was constrained from fully participating in an AIDS conference that included a discussion of the proper legal regime for prostitution. Another group, Pathfinder International, said it feared it would lose public money for other projects if it used private money to collaborate with overseas groups that have a track record of engaging prostitutes in AIDS prevention.

The plaintiff in the second case, DKT International, a nonprofit family planning and AIDS prevention group that works in 11 countries, saw one of its federal grants canceled after it declined to sign the pledge. It said it refused to sign because it was concerned about stigmatizing and alienating sex workers whom the program was trying to reach.

The judges in both cases found that extending the requirement to privately raised money went too far, violating the First Amendment.

It remains to be seen whether the government will now stop trying to impose the pledge on other groups. We also don't know how many groups will now feel emboldened to rescind pledges they have already signed. And, lamentably, the restriction still stands when it comes to spending federal dollars. Still, by declaring that government may not use its spending clout to compel or coerce private speech, the new decisions have vindicated an important constitutional principle, while removing at least one impediment for health groups trying to reach a high-risk community, and save lives.

Another $10 Billion (WP)

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

THE GENERALS in the global battle against HIV-AIDS are meeting at the United Nations this week, five years after another U.N. summit promised an intensified push against the crisis. The target of mobilizing $7 billion to $10 billion per year has been met: Last year low- and middle-income countries spent $2.5 billion of their own money and an additional $5.8 billion from donors on AIDS treatment and prevention and the care of orphans. But that money has bought less than expected. Rather than hitting the "three by five" target of getting medicines to 3 million people by 2005, the world has put only about 1.4 million people on treatment -- a big improvement on the 240,000 who were receiving drugs in 2001 but still well less than half of the number who need medicines immediately. Equally, better-financed prevention efforts have succeeded in driving down infection rates among young adults, notably in Kenya, Uganda, Zimbabwe and Haiti. But last year there were 4.1 million new infections worldwide. The plague is still advancing.

The summiteers in New York therefore confront a daunting problem. The latest U.N. estimate, which may prove as optimistic as the last one, is that fighting the disease will soon require $20 billion to $23 billion a year, more than twice the current spending. What's more, this is not a temporary commitment: Once people go on antiretroviral treatment, they need medicines for years; caring for orphans is also a long-term proposition. Assuming that some of the extra resources will be provided by middle-income countries, the rich world may need to reach into its taxpayers' pockets for an extra $10 billion a year. Official development assistance, which has already jumped by more than two-thirds in real terms between 2000 and 2005, would have to grow by a tenth or so.

Moreover, the effect of that money will be limited unless the world expands its commitment to other development efforts. Donor-financed AIDS programs can suck nurses and doctors out of the rest of the health system, so an increase in AIDS spending requires a parallel increase in general health investment. AIDS flourishes in poor societies because illiteracy and penury make people vulnerable; success against the virus depends partly on broader progress. As President Paul Kagame of Rwanda told The Post on Wednesday, there's no use in giving someone antiretroviral drugs if he has no food.

The imperative to raise extra money for AIDS and other development objectives raises an institutional issue. To carry out its commitments of five years ago, the world created the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which has raised and spent an impressive $5 billion; the question is whether this venture should be the vehicle for the next step-up in AIDS funding. The fund's critics, notably the Bush administration, rightly say that it has suffered from poor management, that it has occasionally given money on the basis of poor grant proposals and that it has indulged grantees whose performance should have led to a suspension of disbursements. But rather than snipe at the fund, the critics should work to improve it. The fund's structure provides a way of sharing the financial burden globally. The quality of its grants has recently gone up. And centralizing AIDS finance simplifies the administrative burden on stressed officials from poor countries. The fund's entrepreneurial leader, Richard Feachem, has announced that he will leave when his term expires this year. The priority should be to find a replacement who is pushy enough to raise extra money and savvy enough to solidify the institution's management.

Russia, China Endorse Package To Push Iran (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- Russia and China endorsed a package of incentives and penalties Thursday designed by Western nations to push Iran to suspend its nuclear program.

Few details of the agreement were forthcoming, and British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett, who announced the deal in muted language, cautioned that negotiators wanted to present the package to the Iranians before making it public.

But diplomats close to the issue said incentives were similar to past proposals, including helping Iran obtain a civilian nuclear reactor. The term "sanctions" was noticeably absent from discussion, but diplomats strongly signaled that Iran would be subject to the full array of Security Council punitive measures should it refuse the offer.

"We have agreed to a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussion with Iran," said Beckett, flanked by top officials of the five permanent United Nations Security Council members and European Union foreign minister Javier Solana in the ivy-lined garden of the British Ambassador's Vienna residence.

"We are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities as required" by the International Atomic Energy Agency. "And we would also suspend action in the Security Council. We also agreed that if Iran decides not to engage in negotiations further steps would have to be taken in the Security Council."

Western powers believe that Iran is pursuing the capability to produce a nuclear bomb, but Tehran insists that it seeks only the technology to enrich uranium for civilian purposes.

Iran was circumspect in its first public comments on the offer. "Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions, but (we) won't give up our (nuclear) rights," said Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki in a statement read on state television. "We are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold a dialogue about common concerns."

Iran will have "weeks not months" to decide whether it is willing to negotiate and suspend its enrichment-related activities, Western diplomats said. They added that the demand will be a tough one for the Muslim nation, and will include a categorical requirement for Iran to stop all research and development activity, including even "dry run" operation of centrifuges used to enrich gaseous uranium, a senior state department diplomat said.

In addition, Iran would have to answer outstanding questions from the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, the IAEA, which has been seeking to learn the full extent of Tehran's nuclear activities. Tehran also would have to abide by additional IAEA regulations, including more extensive inspections of nuclear-related facilities.

Whether Iran agrees to resume negotiations or refuses, there is sure to be months, if not years of diplomacy ahead, diplomats said.

The absence of specifics in Thursday's announcement appeared aimed at minimizing the likelihood that the proposal would be the subject of public debate before the Iranians had a chance to hear it explained by the Europeans, who will likely present the package to Tehran in the next few days. Diplomats hope that if the package is laid out privately, its seriousness will be clear and the Iranians will be hard put to dismiss it.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov, speaking to Russian press after the meeting, said, "Nobody will be going into details now. In the first place, this (proposal) should be given to Iran. Then we will look at the reaction of the Iranian side."

Lavrov urged Iran to take the offer seriously.

"We count on Tehran meeting these proposals in a constructive manner," Lavrov said.

U.S. diplomats were clearly pleased by the Russian endorsement. "These are conditions (set by) six countries. ... We are very satisfied," said a senior state department official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the discussions.

Russia and China are key to any future sanctions on Iran because they hold veto power on the Security Council. Both countries also are major trading partners with Iran.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who on Wednesday announced the U.S. was willing to join Europeans in direct talks with Iran if it suspends its nuclear activity, arrived in Vienna Thursday. She spent more than eight hours meeting with leaders on the proposal, which is a five- to six-page document.

Diplomats close to the negotiations said all parties had agreed to the incentives side of the proposal, but that penalties would be drawn from a list. Also undetermined was the timing of the penalties, which diplomats said would depend on how the Iranians respond.

The incentives under discussion are not new; they include help with construction of a light-water reactor, guaranteed access to nuclear fuel for civilian power plants, and imports of many goods for which the United States holds licenses, such as parts for airplanes. Under U.S. law it is illegal to trade with Iran and Washington has no diplomatic relations with Tehran.

Although diplomats avoided the term "sanctions," punitive measures would include action by the Security Council, a panel that has the power to ban travel, freeze assets, restrict visas and impose economic embargos on exports of nuclear technology and a wide array of other goods to Iran -- all penalties that are under discussion in the Iranian case.

Diplomats said the package offers a clear choice to Iran: suspend uranium enrichment and be treated as a full partner in the world community, or face painful consequences from a united international community with the power to undermine Iran's economy and stability.

"So there are two paths ahead," said Beckett. "We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals which would bring significant benefits to Iran."

The agreement Thursday finalized discussions begun in London on May 8 in which diplomats decided that they would present Iran with a choice, diplomats said. "But the details all came together tonight," said a senior state department official.

Russia and China both expressed interest Thursday in joining the so-called E.U. 3 and U.S. if negotiations go forward. That approach would mirror six-party talks with North Korea over its nuclear program.

The United States and Europe have been struggling to keep world powers united against Iran, but Russia and China had been reluctant go along with any deal that mentioned sanctions. The first signal that they were wiling to consider stronger measures to contain Iran came in January when they agreed to report Iran to the security council. Previously, Iran's violations of the nuclear nonproliferation regime had been dealt with at the IAEA in Vienna.

But soon after, Russia seemed to have second thoughts about its support for Iranian censure and prolonged the discussions at the security council. Meanwhile, Iran appeared defiant. In early April it announced it had successfully enriched uranium using its own centrifuges at the Natanz nuclear plant, flouting international demands that it stop all enrichment related activity.

A round of intensive diplomacy in the past week, including a call by President Bush to Russian President Vladimir Putin on Tuesday and the U.S. decision to open the door to direct talks for the first time since the Iranian hostage crisis in 1979, helped win the full backing again of the Russians.

Many experts suspect that if Moscow is again faced with the demand that it back sanctions, it will refuse, but for the moment it is holding firm.

"It is very important that the proposal for negotiations came from all six [powers], including the USA, for which this was not an easy step," said Lavrov, referring to the U.S. decision to open the door to relations with Iran.

World Powers Reach Agreement On Iran (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

World powers agreed on Thursday night on a package of “far reaching proposals” to encourage Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but warned of “further steps” if Tehran refused to co-operate.

After talks in Vienna between foreign ministers from the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, plus Germany and European foreign policy chief Javier Solana, the UK’s Margaret Becket said European governments would resume negotiations with Tehran and stop action at the Security Council if it suspends all uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

She added, however, that if Iran refuses to engage, steps would be taken at the UN.

"We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals which would bring significant benefits," she said.

European officials refused to divulge the details of the incentives agreed and it was unclear whether Russia and China, until now opposed to sanctions, had signed up to specific penalties if Iran spurns the offer of engagement.

But the rare show of international unity will substantially raise the diplomatic pressure on the Islamic Republic. It comes a day after the US announced a major shift in policy, dramatically bolstering the package of incentives.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said on Wednesday the US would be ready to join other nations in multilateral talks with Iran if Tehran suspended uranium enrichment and reprocessing.

A senior European diplomat, speaking before the meeting, said the UK, France and Germany – the three European governments that have led policy on Iran – were expected to hold talks with Iranian officials, perhaps as early as next week, to present and explain the proposals.

The package agreed is believed to include a guarantee of fuel supply to Iranian nuclear reactors, and the construction of a light water reactor. Crucially, the proposals are said to call on Tehran to cease all uranium enrichment activities but do not rule out a potential reconsideration of this at a future date, if and when Iran reassures the international community of the peaceful intentions of its nuclear programme.

Diplomats are hoping that the US offer, combined with the package of incentives, will persuade senior members of the Iranian regime to opt for a less confrontational approach and agree at least to a temporary freeze of enrichment activities, which could allow negotiations to begin.

Iran, however, has already warned it would reject proposals that did not allow it to retain a small-scale enrichment capability, the process that produces nuclear fuel for reactors or atomic weapons.

The first official reactions from Tehran on Thursday on the US policy shift were also not encouraging but nor did they represent an outright rejection of the American overture.

Manouchehr Mottaki, the foreign minister, played down the significance of the Bush administration's policy reversal and shrugged off American demands for a halt in all uranium enrichment and reprocessing as a pre-condition for dialogue. But he also said Tehran was ready to hold talks "over mutual concerns".

Iranian commentators, however, were deeply sceptical of the US readiness to join Europeans in multilateral talks with Iran, insisting the offer was not serious because it included a conditionality that was unacceptable to Tehran.

Hossein Shariatmadari, influential fundamentalist commentator and managing director of the Keyhan newspaper, condemned the US offer as a "trick" and argued that giving in to US demands would amount to "blackmail".

But Iran's friends and foes around the world urged the regime to take its time and carefully consider its response.

The foreign ministry in Russia, which has long pressed for a softer international approach towards Tehran, described the American policy shift as "a real chance" to achieve a settlement over Iran. "We call on Iran to constructively respond to it [the chance]," the ministry said.

Package Of Terms (No Sanctions Included) For Iran (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, June 1 — The United States, Russia, China and three leading nations of Europe announced an agreement Thursday on a package of incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, shelving any punitive action by the Security Council until Iran has time to respond to the proposals.

The initiative is aimed at encouraging Iran to return to a freeze of its nuclear activities, including turning off the fast-spinning centrifuge machines that produce enriched uranium.

The specifics of the proposals were not revealed on Thursday. But they are expected to be presented to Iran in coming days by a delegation headed by Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. The government in Tehran would then be given weeks — but not months — to respond, American and European officials said.

Britain's new foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, read a statement on behalf of the six countries, saying: "We have agreed on a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussions with Iran. We believe they offer Iran the chance to reach a negotiated agreement based on cooperation."

She said the nations represented at the talks "are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment related and reprocessing activities" as required by the International Atomic Energy Agency. "And we would also suspend action in the Security Council," she added.

Ms. Beckett warned that "further steps would have to be taken in the Security Council" if Iran did not comply. But the statement carefully avoided any mention of sanctions or other specific, punitive measures, and Ms. Beckett took no questions.

The word "sanctions" was not uttered in the public dialogue on Thursday, perhaps in an effort to avoid giving Iran an obvious target for early objections. But should Iran reject the incentives, differences are likely to re-emerge among the six nations as they consider specific punishments in the Security Council.

Two officials who attended the talks on Thursday described the lengthy and, at times, tense negotiations.

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, insisted that any consideration of punitive action in the Security Council be frozen until Iran had a chance to respond to the current offer, said one senior European official who, like some others, spoke on the condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic rules.

"The Security Council has stopped," this official said. "If we fail, we will come back to the Security Council, but the process is now stalled until we see the reaction of Iran. They asked for it to be frozen, and they got it."

A resolution is currently before the United Nations Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which invokes the Council's power to demand compliance of member countries and threaten punishment if they refuse.

Another senior European official expressed fears that the process could allow Iran time to "string this along for a very long time."

Pressed on whether the six nations had reached full consensus on Thursday, R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, expressed broad satisfaction. "We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna," he said. "We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear weapons capability."

The emphasis of the agreement on Thursday was less on how to punish Iran, than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities. There had been optimistic predictions in recent days, particularly by the Bush administration, that the foreign ministers of the countries meeting Thursday — the five permanent Security Council powers, plus Germany — could agree on a complicated formula that would persuade Iran to stop making enriched uranium.

On Wednesday, before her departure from Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We are agreed with our European partners on the essential elements of a package containing both benefits, if Iran makes the right choice — and costs if it does not."

The afternoon talks extended into dinner, only a day after the Bush administration reversed course and offered to sit down at the same negotiating table with Iran — if Iran fully suspended its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Iran has said it has no intention of stopping these activities. On Thursday, Iranian officials embraced the idea of talking to the United States, but rejected preconditions for talks.

"We will not negotiate over our nation's natural nuclear rights but we are ready to hold fair and unbiased dialogue and negotiation over mutual concerns within the context of a defined framework," said Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, the official Iranian news agency reported.

His spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, said later, "There is no obstacle to negotiating with the United States on an equal footing, with respect and without preconditions, since what is important for us is to secure our nuclear rights."

In Washington on Thursday, President Bush seemed to describe the American offer of direct talks with Iran as much as a threat as opportunity. "The choice is up to the Iranians whether or not they're going to listen to the world demand, and if they do, we've got something to talk to them about," Mr. Bush told reporters after a cabinet meeting.

Mr. Bush, who spoke by phone with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Wednesday and President Hu Jintao of China on Thursday, also sidestepped a question on whether Russia and China had come on board with the disputed package.

Asked about Mr. Mottaki's remarks suggesting that the suspension of Iran's nuclear activities was nonnegotiable, Mr. Bush said: "We'll see whether or not that is the firm position of their government. If that's what they decide to do, then the next step, of course, will be to — for our coalition partners to go to the United Nations Security Council."

Neither Mr. Mottaki nor Mr. Asefi has the authority to make policy. Still, their statements are important because they reflect efforts by Iran, like the United States, to inch away from old fixed positions that the other side is not worth dealing with.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, long rejected contacts with the United States, branding those who seek reconciliation "simpletons and traitors." But recently he has approved the idea of talking to Washington about Iraq, if there was respect for mutual interests.

Behind the scenes, Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, urged Iran to embrace the American offer. In a telephone conversation Wednesday evening with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Dr. ElBaradei described the overture as "very significant" and told Iran "to seize the opportunity of talking to Washington," an agency spokeswoman, Melissa Fleming, said.

Although all countries agreed to the initiative, the major gap was one that has been there since the beginning: the insistence by the United States and the Europeans that Iran must be punished by the Security Council if it does not change its behavior, and the counterargument by Russia and China that the best way to win concessions — at least at this point — is through engagement.

Although the Europeans had argued against holding such a high-level, high-profile meeting without closing the gaps in lower-level negotiating and guaranteeing success, the United States insisted that the meeting was important to underscore the gravity of the issue and to keep up the negotiating momentum.

The Americans are still resisting formulas giving Iran security guarantees that it would not be the target of a military attack. The Europeans say that without such assurances, Iran will proceed with the pursuit of a nuclear weapons program despite its longstanding denials that it has that intention.

However, the Americans are willing to consider the waiving of some longstanding sanctions on Iran to allow it eventually to buy new civilian airplanes and to gain access to modern light-water reactors for civilian nuclear power, with Russia and the West controlling access to the fuel.

U.S., Major Powers Agree On Incentives For Iran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The U.S. and five major powers agreed to a "far reaching" package of incentives to induce Iran to suspend its pursuit of nuclear technologies, and pledged coercive measures through the United Nations if Tehran doesn't comply.

The announcement by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members, plus Germany, sought to buttress a pledge by the Bush administration to engage directly with Iran should it agree to give up uranium enrichment work. European leaders said the agreement reached yesterday provides Tehran with a clear path to reintegrating with the global community should it agree to talk.

Diplomats also said the dialogue format with Iran could be broadened down the road to include not only the U.S., but also China and Russia, which are viewed as crucial to pressuring Iran. To date, only Britain, France, Germany -- the so-called EU-3 -- have engaged Tehran over its nuclear program.

"We have agreed a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussions with Iran," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said after a meeting in Vienna among Germany and the members of the Permanent Five: France, Britain, the U.S., Russia and China. "We believe that they offer Iran the chance to reach a negotiated agreement based on cooperation."

American diplomats declined to specify the incentives or penalties that Iran might face in coming months, saying it could undermine efforts to engage Tehran. These officials said a European delegation was set to outline the package to Tehran in coming weeks and expected a response no later than mid-July, when leaders of the G-8 nations meet in Russia.

This is "a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear-weapons capability," said Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs. The talks were "by far the most substantive and the most concrete" held so far on Iran.

The announcement was tempered by continued statements from Tehran that the Iranian government was unwilling to give up its development of nuclear technologies and would talk with Washington only if there were no preconditions. "Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions but won't give up our rights," state-run Iranian television quoted Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki saying yesterday.

U.S. diplomats said they were waiting for Iran to receive the formal proposal from European leaders before assessing Tehran's future course of action. They were unwilling to state that Iran would automatically face economic sanctions should it fail to comply with the international community's demand.

Both China and Russia have expressed concern in recent months about enforcing economic sanctions against Iran. And concerns remain that Beijing or Moscow might balk at such stringent measures down the road.

President Bush, however, told reporters yesterday that he held talks with the leaders of China and Russia in recent days and now believes the international community is united to take coercive measures against Iran. "The next step of acting in concert is to go to the United Nations Security Council," Mr. Bush said.

The current fight with Iran centers on fears that Tehran is working to develop nuclear weapons, while the Iranian government says it is merely enriching uranium to fuel a civilian nuclear program. To ensure that Iran doesn't acquire nuclear weapons, the U.S. and others want to stop the domestic enrichment program and supply Iran with fuel from the outside, a proposal that Iran has rejected.

Iran and the U.S. seemed at loggerheads, as the two nations have been so often over 28 years of diplomatic silence since the Iranian revolution. Yet the leaders of the U.S. and the Islamic Republic are also eyeing each other from closer than ever before as they try to decide whether to talk directly about Iran's nuclear program.

But this doesn't mean the two countries will eventually talk, and their roller-coaster history of overtures made and spurned is evidence of that. The Iranian government almost immediately dismissed the initial U.S. offer to join talks, calling it a public-relations ploy.

Six Powers Reach Accord On Iran Plan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, June 1 -- The United States and five other major world powers agreed Thursday to offer Iran a broad new collection of rewards if it halts its drive to master nuclear technology, but they threatened "further steps in the Security Council" if Iran refuses.

The agreement, announced here by British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett following extended talks, brings general unity to the countries' approach to Iran after months of discord, diplomats said. It is intended to sharpen the choice facing Iran, giving it a clear reason to opt for cooperation over confrontation on its nuclear program.

"There are two paths ahead," Beckett told reporters, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and counterparts from Russia, China, France, Germany and the European Union stood at her side. "We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals, which would bring significant benefits."

Beckett made the announcement near midnight Tehran time. There was no immediate response from the Iranian government.

Rice, who spent more than eight hours in sometimes freewheeling talks with her counterparts Thursday, flew here after announcing a major shift in U.S. policy on Wednesday -- a willingness to join the negotiations with Iran that have been led, unsuccessfully, by Britain, France and Germany, provided Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment activities first.

Iranian diplomats on Thursday did not reject outright the U.S. proposal for talks, but they criticized the demand that their country end enrichment first.

Although details of the five- to six-page document agreed to in Vienna were not announced, incentives discussed before the meeting included an international effort to assist Iran's nuclear industry, including construction of a light-water reactor and guarantees of a long-term supply of fuel. That would represent a significant shift from the Bush administration's past insistence that Iran has no need for nuclear power. Increased trade and investment have also been discussed.

Aides to Rice said the deal also commits China and Russia to a long list of specific steps to punish Iran if it refuses to halt its enrichment program. Both countries have resisted sanctions for months, arguing that they could backfire.

Addressing reporters here, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov emphasized the incentives in the package and did not mention possible negative measures. He said it was important that all six powers be united in making the offer, including the United States, which he said found it difficult to offer inducements to Iran.

The possible sanctions in the agreement are listed as a menu, ranging from minor to major, diplomats said. It was unclear whether there was agreement on which options to choose if Iran fails to act.

Diplomats have said that measures under discussion include an embargo on export of goods and technologies relevant to nuclear programs, the freezing of assets of organizations and people involved in the programs, and a suspension of technical cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Broader measures include a freeze on bilateral contacts, a visa and travel ban for senior Iranian officials, an arms embargo, an embargo on certain exports and an end to support for Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

The Bush administration has repeatedly declared it "unacceptable" to have Iran armed with nuclear weapons. While publicly declaring that no option was "off the table," an allusion to military action, it had been struggling to organize unified diplomatic pressure against the country by all five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

Beckett read the brief statement after the diplomats huddled over it for two hours, fiddling with the wording. It emphasized the positive, while using vague code words for tough action, which U.S. officials said stemmed from a desire to persuade Iran to return to negotiations. Even speaking anonymously, U.S. officials repeatedly refused to characterize the possible punishments for Iran as "sanctions," using words such as "steps," "measures," "actions" and "negative disincentives."

"We are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, as required by the IAEA, and we would also suspend action in the Security Council," Beckett said.

Representatives of some of the countries involved -- but not the United States -- will present the package to Iran in the "coming days," and an answer is expected before the Group of Eight industrialized countries meet in St. Petersburg in mid-July, a U.S. official told reporters. He said the countries had agreed not to disclose details until after Iran had received a full presentation and been allowed time to "digest it."

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said Russia and China were considering joining the United States and the Europeans in the talks with Iran.

Iran offered a mixed initial reply earlier Thursday to the Bush administration's offer to join talks on the country's nuclear program: It welcomed the opportunity to deflect confrontation while resisting demands that it suspend work on the program first.

"We believe that under the current circumstances, negotiations without any precondition would be the best solution to put an end to the Tehran-Washington logjam," said Hamid Reza Asefi, spokesman for Iran's Foreign Ministry, in an interview with the official press agency IRNA.

Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, reiterated the proviso, telling reporters, "We won't negotiate about the Iranian nation's natural nuclear rights but are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold dialogue about common concerns."

Analysts and diplomats described the responses as preliminary. The most powerful elements of Iran's theocratic government remained silent on the U.S. proposal and were said to be intensely engaged in the private consultations that precede major policy announcements in Tehran.

The measured tenor of the Iranian diplomats' initial replies appeared to signal that their country was at least not dismissing the start of a process it had actively solicited in recent weeks, through back-channel messages seeking direct engagement with Washington. But one analyst in regular contact with the Tehran government said the full response would reflect skepticism about Bush's sincerity.

"The perception here is basically that the U.S. did what it did in response to domestic pressure inside the U.S., and also to convince the Russians and Chinese" to back stronger pressure on Iran, said Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University.

He predicted Iran's final response would stop short of obliging the Americans but go far enough to convince Moscow or Beijing of its good intentions. It might include steps such as suspending the installation of the next two enrichment systems and letting U.N. inspectors conduct snap inspections for the duration of the negotiations.

Six Nations Agree On Incentives For Nuke Cooperation (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan And George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- Six world powers agreed yesterday to offer Iran a new choice of rewards if it gives up its suspected nuclear activities or punishment if it refuses, a gambit that could either defuse a global confrontation with the Islamic regime or hasten one.

"There are two paths ahead," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in announcing agreement among the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China on a package for Iran that carries the threat of United Nations' sanctions.

The package would be on the table for a proposed new round of bargaining with Tehran over what the United States and its allies call a rogue nuclear program that could produce a bomb.

After a meeting of officials from the six powers, Mrs. Beckett said, "We urge Iran to take the positive path" and promised to suspend Security Council action against Tehran if it agrees to halt enrichment.

At the White House, President Bush warned that the confrontation would end up at the U.N. Security Council if Iran continues to enrich uranium.

"If they continue their obstinance, if they continue to say to the world, 'We really don't care what your opinion is,' then the world is going to act in concert," Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet.

In a major policy shift, the U.S. agreed this week to join those talks if Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment program. It would be the first major public negotiations between the adversaries in more than a quarter century.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with the foreign ministers from Britain, France and Germany, the three European nations that led talks with Iran. Those talks stalled last year. Also present were representatives of Russia and China, which have been Tehran's trading partners and could join in any future talks with Iran.

Because Russia and China hold vetoes in the U.N. Security Council, the U.S. needs their cooperation to seek sanctions or other harsh measures by that body.

"We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna," U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns told reporters. "We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran nuclear-weapons capability."

A short statement issued by foreign ministers from the six powers and the European Union did not mention economic sanctions -- the punishment or deterrent favored by the United States and that Iran has sought to avoid.

The powers agreed privately, however, that Iran could face tough U.N. Security Council sanctions if it fails to give up the enrichment of uranium and other disputed nuclear activities, U.S. officials said.

Diplomats feared Iran would immediately reject any invitation to bargain if the threat of sanctions was explicit, officials involved in the discussions said on the condition of anonymity because the negotiations of the major powers were private.

The foreign ministers' statement threatens unspecified "further steps" in the Security Council.

If Iran returned to the talks stalled since last year, "we would also suspend action in the Security Council," Mrs. Beckett said.

The Security Council, which can levy mandatory global sanctions and back its mandates with military force, has been reviewing Iran's case for two months. Its permanent, veto-holding members -- U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China -- have been at odds over the possibility of sanctions.

On Wednesday, Iran's foreign minister welcomed the idea of direct talks with the United States but rebuffed the U.S. condition that Tehran first must suspend uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0031395

"Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions but won't give up our rights," the state-run Iranian television quoted Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki as saying yesterday.

Mr. Mottaki's statement, issued as Miss Rice was arriving in Austria, was the country's first direct reaction to the U.S. offer.

"We won't negotiate about the Iranian nation's natural nuclear rights, but we are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold dialogue about common concerns," he said.

Over A Barrel (WSJ)

By William P. Kucewicz

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, in signaling a new U.S. willingness to negotiate with Iran, also warned that "international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions" would follow if Tehran defies its international obligations by continuing to develop nuclear weapons. Although the likelihood of those sanctions increased yesterday after the Iranian regime rejected the U.S. offer, it has been the threat of such sanctions, and the crippling effect an international embargo would have on Iran's economy and exchequer, that have always been the likely catalysts for any possible negotiation.

There's simply no getting around the fact that you can't eat petroleum. Iran's 132.5 trillion barrels in proved oil reserves -- 10.2% of the world total -- are of little benefit unless they're earning money. A trade embargo would hit Iran especially hard, because its economy and government budget are inordinately dependent on petrodollars. Oil shipments account for about 25% of GDP, represent 90% of total export earnings and provide as much as 50% of fiscal receipts.

Further, the country imports about one-third of its gasoline. Additional gasoline supplies and other oil products are refined in Tehran from 60,000 barrels a day (bbl/d) in imported crude that arrives via pipeline from the Caspian Sea in a swap arrangement. In Iran, gasoline, like foodstuffs, is heavily subsidized -- to the tune of $3 billion this year -- as part as the regime's strategy to buy off public opinion. With gasoline retailing at just 40 cents a gallon, consumption, not surprisingly, has been growing by 8% to 10% a year.

The regime already feels the pinch of unilateral sanctions, first imposed by Bill Clinton and extended by President Bush, that forbid U.S. companies and their subsidiaries from doing business with Iran. Additionally, the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act of 1996 authorizes mandatory and discretionary sanctions against non-U.S. companies investing more than $20 million a year in Iran's oil and natural gas industries. The effectiveness of the restrictions can be measured by the volume of Iranian crude oil output. In the six months ended March, Iranian production was down 1.3% from a year earlier versus a comparable gain of 1.5% for OPEC, excluding Iran and Iraq. Compared with the six months ended March 2002, Iran's output in the latest six-month period was up 13.4% against a 21.7% increase for the eight members of OPEC sans Iran and Iraq.

Iran's below-average oil production is explained by a shortage of investment capital. Its 40 producing oilfields need modernizing. Recovery rates are a meager 24% to 27% compared with a 35% world average. But Iran doesn't have the capital to pay for upgrades. In fact, it has been counting on foreign investment to help it boost production from last year's 4.2 million bbl/d (of which 3.9 million bbl/d was crude oil) to a targeted five million bbl/d in 2010 and eight million bbl/d by 2015. Tehran further hopes, with foreign help, to expand its oil refining capacity by 50% to 2.2 million bbl/d by 2008. Sanctions would put the kibosh on these ambitious plans.

U.S. bans on technology transfers also have frustrated Iran's efforts to develop its massive natural gas reserves, the world's second largest. U.S. companies dominate natural gas liquefaction, and most liquefied natural gas (LNG) plants in the world use U.S.-licensed processes. Iran is limited to non-U.S. technology and so far hasn't built a single LNG facility. The cost: $11 billion in foregone annual earnings from one natural gas field alone.

What Tehran knows, and what the outside world has yet to grasp, is that an international trade embargo would hurt Iran infinitely more than it would hurt the U.S.

For oil-importing countries, even though Iran exports roughly 2.7 million bbl/d in petroleum, a complete cutoff of these shipments could be offset in large measure by increased OPEC and non-OPEC output, greatly diminishing the dreaded prospect of $100-a-barrel oil. Saudi Arabia has the most untapped capacity, in the order of 1.3 million to 1.4 million bbl/d. Other OPEC members, according to the International Energy Agency, have spare capacity of 1.1 million bbl/d, not including Iraq's estimated

700,000 bbl/d. With a total of 2.4 million to 3.1 million bbl/d in idle capacity, OPEC alone could offset a loss of Iranian exports. Furthermore, global oil consumption is anticipated to grow in the range of 1.4 million to 1.6 million bbl/d this year, while new supply is expected to increase by 1.2 million to 1.3 million bbl/d. Much of the imbalance is expected to be covered by OPEC exports of LNG.

Oil's fungibility notwithstanding, Asia in general and Japan in particular would be hardest hit by a cutoff of Iranian crude. (The U.S., Canada, Britain and Germany, among others, no longer import Iranian oil.) China has already taken steps in response to high oil prices that could lessen the effects of an Iranian trade embargo. It has eliminated tax rebates on gasoline exports, raised gasoline, diesel and jet fuel prices by 3% to 5% and levied higher taxes on larger vehicles. Chinese electric power generators, too, are scaling back on oil use.

Besides, it's not like we haven't been through this before. Following the 1991 Gulf War, Iraqi oil exports fell by some 2.3 million bbl/d to a mere 61,750 bbl/d between 1991 and 1996. Even now, Iranian exports are way below their pre-revolution high of 5.5 million bbl/d, which was equal to 19.2% of OPEC's 1974 crude and products shipments. Thirty years later, Iran shipped three million bbl/d, or 11.7% of OPEC exports. * * *

To be sure, there are other risks to global oil supply -- notably in Nigeria, Venezuela, Ecuador, Chad, Russia and Iraq. But should it be necessary, the U.S. could always play its trump card -- namely, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Established after the 1973 OPEC oil embargo, the reserve has a current inventory of 688.6 million barrels of oil, sufficient to provide about two months of U.S. import protection. Were, say, 500,000 bbl/d to be siphoned off to partially offset a loss of Iranian crude, the stockpile would last more than three-and-a-half years.

Iran doesn't have the world over a barrel. It's the other way around. The economic and fiscal squeeze of new trade sanctions could indeed become so painful as to prompt regime change.

U.S. Rejects An Invitation For Talks In North Korea (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

TOKYO, June 1 — North Korea on Thursday invited the top American nuclear envoy to visit its capital, Pyongyang, for bilateral talks, but the White House insisted that the North return to long-deadlocked six-nation talks instead.

North Korea invited Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator in the nuclear talks, to Pyongyang, indicating that it wanted to discuss an agreement that was reached last September but never carried out.

"If the U.S. has a true political intention to implement the joint statement, we kindly invite once again the head of the U.S. side's delegation to the talks to visit Pyongyang and directly explain it to us," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement released through the official Korean Central News Agency.

North Korea agreed last September in the six-nation talks to abandon its nuclear program in return for energy assistance and security guarantees. But the agreement left unclear the issue of the sequence of events, and disputes arose immediately over whether disarmament or the award of benefits would come first.

Also, North Korea has said it will not return to the multination talks unless the United States lifts a crackdown on financial institutions dealing with the government and North Korean companies suspected of counterfeiting American dollars and laundering money. The other nations involved in the talks are China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

North Korea, which has long pushed for direct talks with the United States, issued the invitation a day after the United States offered to hold direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program. Washington has shifted away from decades of refusing to hold direct talks with Tehran, though the United States included the precondition that Iran suspend its uranium activities.

"The United States is not going to engage in bilateral negotiations with the government of North Korea," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. "The United States sticks by its position, which is, North Korea has to return to the six-party talks."

The United States and the North, which engaged in direct talks in the past, reached an accord in 1994 that called for the installation of two civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and other assistance after the North abandoned its nuclear program.

The accord broke down after American officials accused the North in the fall of 2002 of engaging in a secret uranium enrichment program.

The six-nation talks began in the summer of 2003. The United States has consistently rejected North Korea's request for bilateral talks, though informal talks between American and North Korean officials have taken place on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations.

In its statement on Thursday, North Korea reiterated that it would not return to the talks unless economic sanctions were lifted. The sanctions, which are opposed by China and South Korea, are said to have squeezed the North financially. Banks around the world have limited their dealings with North Korea, concerned that they would be blacklisted by the United States.

N Korea Invites US Nuclear Negotiator For Talks (FT)

By Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Pyongyang on Thursday invited Christopher Hill, Washington's top negotiator in the six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear crisis, to visit for bilateral discussions, saying the US must prove its commitment to resolving the prolonged impasse.

It again called for the US to drop the financial sanctions that have crippled cash-strapped North Korea's ability to trade with the outside world.

"If the US has made a political decision to truly carry out the joint declaration, we again invite the chief delegate to the six-party talks to visit Pyongyang and personally explain [the US position] to us," the state-run Korean Central News Agency quoted an unnamed foreign ministry spokesman as saying.

With the move, North Korea again demonstrated its capacity for wily negotiating as the invitation is unlikely to be accepted, enabling Kim Jong-il's regime to blame further the stand-off on the Bush administration.

Although Mr Hill held talks with his North Korean counterpart on the sidelines of the September round of negotiations and has previously signalled willingness to travel to Pyongyang, he was restricted from meeting Kim Kye-gwan at a security forum in Tokyo earlier this year as Washington takes an increasingly harder line.

The September talks led to an agreement for all six parties to work towards the North's nuclear disarmament, but this was soon overshadowed by an increasingly acrimonious dispute over Pyongyang's financial activities.

Washington has cracked down on eight North Korean companies and a Macao bank it accuses distributing counterfeit dollars and laundering money earned illicitly.

The North Korean spokesman said the US had violated the spirit of the September agreement because the parties had agreed to hold increased bilateral and multilateral contacts to create a favourable atmosphere for the talks.

"The US will never find a solution to the problem if it continues to shun sitting with its dialogue partner while calling for the resolution of important issues such as the nuclear issue through discussions," he said.

The US has repeatedly said the sanctions are merely a way to protect its financial system and are unrelated to the nuclear issue.

"There's an awful lot in the September agreement that benefits North Korea, and frankly I don't understand why [North Korea] isn't coming back," Mr Hill said last week after talks in Beijing with Wu Dawei, the Chinese negotiator.

Despite efforts by Mr Hill, Mr Wu and South Korea's Chun Yong-woo to restart the talks, analysts say the negotiations are again on the brink of collapse as Pyongyang and Washington each wait for the other to give in first.

Bush To Welcome Congo's Sassou-Nguesso (AFP)

AFP, June 1, 2006

US President George W. Bush will welcome Congo's President Denis Sassou-Nguesso June 5 for talks on efforts to keep peace in Sudan's Darfur region, the White House said.

"The two leaders will discuss implementation of the May 5, 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement, NATO assistance to strengthen the African Union Mission in Sudan and the follow-on UN mission, United Nations authorization to promptly transition to a UN peacekeeping force," said Bush spokesman Tony Snow.

DOJ_NMG_0031398

Bush and Sassou-Nguesso, who currently chairs the African Union (AU), will also discuss "ways to strengthen democracy and improve the lives of the Congolese people," said Snow.

Earlier, the African Union expressed "deep regret" that holdout Darfur rebel groups had failed to meet a midnight Wednesday deadline to sign a peace deal for the troubled western Sudanese region.

The peace deal aims to end three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless.

It calls for a more equitable distribution of power and wealth, the disarming of the pro-government Janjaweed militias and a referendum on the future of Darfur.

But the holdouts say the accord fails to address their concerns and have refused to sign on unless substantial changes are made.

Washington And Beijing Stoke Nuclear Fears (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary, arrives in Singapore today for a three-day conference on Asia security issues that is likely to include much discussion about China following the release last month of his department's annual report on the Chinese military.

The Pentagon drew plenty of attention last week when it suggested that US defence analysts had been surprised by changes in the capacity of China's nuclear deterrent, including the "pace and scope of its [nuclear] strategic forces modernisation".

It is not entirely clear what surprises the Pentagon was referring to since the unclassified version of the report provided few details about new developments. However, the highlighting of concerns about Chinese nuclear intentions was a reminder of the possibility for mutual miscalculation between the world's most powerful country and its most populous.

While there has been a surprising lack of nuclear competition between the US and China since Beijing exploded its first atomic device in 1964, recent signals from both sides have increased fears that they might succumb to the temptations of a new arms race.

Peter Brookes, a defence analyst at the Heritage Foundation and former Pentagon official on Asia issues, says the US and China are not "at that point right now".

But he says the increased mobility of China's nuclear forces and their desire to arm submarines is causing concern in the Pentagon.

Many Chinese observers bristle at what they see as the hypocrisy of expressions of concern from the US - which has about 10,000 strategic and tactical nuclear warheads - at a Chinese arsenal generally estimated to total less than 400.

"I do not know why they should feel surprised. Why do they assume that China should have weaker nuclear forces?" says Shen Dingli, an expert on international relations at Shanghai's Fudan University.

The Pentagon report cited China's long-standing plans to add mobile DF-31 intercontinental ballistic missiles to its current old and small arsenal of about 20 silo-based intercontinental ballistic missiles able to hit the US.

The Pentagon's focus on long-range, precision conventional weapons concerns Chinese strategic thinkers, since they could be used to launch a pre-emptive strike.

US enthusiasm for anti-missile defences means that China is likely to need more missiles or warheads to have any confidence that at least some could get through such a shield. But Larry Wortzel, a former military attaché in Beijing and now chairman of the US-China Commission, says China has been increasing its nuclear forces long before the US started looking seriously at missile defence.

"We must hold America effectively hostage, because we are being effectively held hostage by America, and we need to strike a balance - even if it is asymmetrical," says Mr Shen.

Mr Shen was mentioned in the Pentagon report as offering evidence of a possible rethinking of China's long-standing stated policy of "No First Use" of nuclear weapons. The Fudan University academic does indeed think the No First Use policy should be adjusted to take into account the possibility of a conventional attack intended to eliminate China's nuclear forces - but he insists this is a personal view not part of any wider debate.

The Pentagon has stronger evidence of a policy discussion in the comments of Chinese General Zhu Chenghu, who last year said Beijing might have to use nuclear weapons against the US if attacked during a confrontation over Taiwan.

The Chinese government assured Mr Rumsfeld in October that Gen Zhu was speaking in a private capacity. But the fact that he has been allowed to keep his job, following an administrative punishment, has fed US concerns that the No First Use policy is more rhetorical than doctrinal.

Li Bin, director of the Arms Control Programme at Beijing's Tsinghua University, argues that China's nuclear strategy has always been based on an assumption that the "nuclear taboo" ensures the US will not actually use its atomic weapons.

The greater risk is that possession of nuclear force might make policymakers rash about the use ofconventional force, Prof Li says. "Some kind of nuclear escalation could still develop," he says. "It is a danger, but it's not the number one danger."

Rift Clouds Asian Defense Talks (WSJ)

By Barry Wain

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Asian-Pacific defense ministers meet here this weekend at a time of deteriorating political relations between Japan and China.

While the U.S. has recently stepped up its criticism of Chinese military spending, some Asian countries have become alarmed about an increasingly nationalistic Japan. Government-to-government ties between a rapidly rising China and Japan, the established regional power, are at their lowest point in decades, despite strong economic links.

Although the U.S. has a major presence in the region, "the defining relationship in East Asia will be between China and Japan," said Rodolfo Severino, former secretary-general of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. "Unfortunately, they just don't like each other, and they sense a certain rivalry."

Defense ministers, military chiefs and senior officials from 22 countries, including the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and the 10 Asean members, will attend the two-day talks. The event has taken place every year since 2002. Nongovernmental security specialists from Europe, the U.S. and Asia also take part.

The forum, organized by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies, allows participants to conduct informal defense consultations and bilateral exchanges, as well as roundtable discussions. A Malaysian proposal to improve maritime security in the Malacca Strait by deploying multinational air patrols -- so-called eyes-in-the-sky -- was taken up at last year's meeting and has since been introduced by Indonesia, Singapore and Malaysia.

Tim Huxley, an IISS official, said one item arising from last year's debates is on the agenda this year: the role of major powers in Asia, and the part Asian powers might play in global security arrangements. Attention is expected to focus on China, India and Japan, he said.

The U.S. delegation will be led by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who used last year's gathering to question China's increased defense spending. Since then, U.S. officials have repeatedly criticized Beijing for annual double-digit growth in defense expenditure and for not being "more transparent" about it.

Although a U.S. Defense Department report in May again warned that China is rapidly extending its military reach with more long-range aircraft and weapons that could pose a threat to neighbors, few Asian governments seem worried -- except Japan, which has echoed Washington's concerns. Some security experts say a number of Asian governments are disturbed by China's expanding military capability but don't want to speak up for fear of offending Beijing.

"There are Southeast Asian countries that are unsure about China's long-term intentions," said Amitav Archarya, deputy director of the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore. "They don't mind the U.S. raising the issue."

Similarly, while most countries in the region haven't publicly taken sides in the China-Japan rift, Southeast Asia tends to be critical of Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi for visiting a World War II shrine containing the name of war criminals. Southeast Asia has a negative view of Japan's conduct during the war and thinks Tokyo "should be wiser," said Sheng Lijun, a scholar from China who works on international relations at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies in Singapore.

China Urges Foreigners To Look Beyond Its Big Cities (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese officials have settled on a new mantra in meetings with visiting foreign dignitaries: You've seen Beijing and Shanghai. Now it's time to go out to the countryside and see our tired, our poor, our huddled masses yearning to be fed.

Behind the polite invitation is a more substantive message. Namely, you may view us as a strategic threat poised to steal your jobs, drive up your gas prices and take over the world. But take a peek beyond the tall buildings and bright lights and you'll have more sympathy for our problems. And then maybe, just maybe, you won't be so hard on us.

"You should visit outside Shanghai and Beijing," Cai Wu, director of the information office of the State Council, China's Cabinet, told a group of newspaper editors in Beijing recently. "It's like visiting the house of a friend. The first time you stay in the living room. But next time, after you become better friends, you go into the kitchen and the basement."

Tang Jiaxuan, state councilor and a member of the Communist Party's Central Committee, also waxed metaphoric.

"When you go to the countryside, you will understand why Chinese say they are firmly walking on the road to peaceful development," Tang said in an interview last week at Zhongnanhai, the national seat of power. "China is not a country that hides its skeletons in the drawer."

Even on trips abroad, officials are making the pitch for a visit to the Chinese sticks. In Los Angeles this week, Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan reminded business leaders who may have been to Shanghai and Beijing that the masses of rural poor in China make less than half of the $4,557 of an urban Beijing dweller.

Encouraging influential foreigners to have a "Green Acres" moment not only helps outsiders better understand China in all its complexity, it also makes tactical sense.

Beijing hopes to send a couple of messages. One is that its record $202-billion trade surplus with the United States last year may look huge but doesn't amount to all that much when divided by 1.3 billion people. A second is that China has too many domestic problems and is too focused on political stability to menace its neighbors.

"The government's old way of thinking was related to traditional culture, a concern with 'face' and presenting the best side to outsiders," said Xiao Gongqin, a history professor at Shanghai Normal University. "Now we'd like Western countries to see that China is lagging far behind. It's far, far from becoming a threat."

The perception gap was on display last week after the release of a Pentagon report saying that China is rapidly extending its military reach, allowing it to compete with the U.S. and pose a potential threat to other countries.

Beijing strongly rejected those conclusions, arguing that its buildup is merely defensive. It accused Washington of Cold War-era thinking.

Beijing's call on foreigners to get a look at Chinese farmers living in squalor is also a sign of China's growing self-assurance. After all, it wasn't so long ago that officials rushed to hide even the smallest of blemishes, wary of leaving the impression that Chinese socialism was anything but perfect.

"China is much more confident," said Wang Yiwei, an American specialist at Fudan University. "It's rising, but it's eager to say it's not rising so much. And it has a point. While Shanghai is China's New York, the countryside is China's Africa."

Howard Snyder, a U.S. businessman who first came to China in 1981 to learn the language, recalls how tightly controlled the country was in those days. Foreigners were required to register before traveling even short distances, with trips to the countryside limited to Potemkin-style model villages.

In 1982, while studying at Beijing Normal University, Snyder slipped away to nearby Hebei province during the Chinese New Year break to experience a bit of rural life. The sort of visit officials now welcome was viewed at the time with great suspicion, prompting police to excoriate the university minder charged with watching over Snyder and other foreigners.

"There was both a fear of being seen as backward and a desire to avoid any foreign contact you might be accused of," Snyder said. "There's a Chinese expression, 'Once bitten by a snake, you're afraid of a rope for the next 10 years.' " After the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, a reign of terror when outside influence and Chinese tradition were demonized, "there was a real lingering fear of foreign contact," he said.

Years of rapid economic growth, an increasing number of foreign leaders knocking on its door and China's growing role as a global player have made China far more open and less reflexive about criticism.

"It's a complete shift," said David Ben Kay, an American lawyer working for a U.S. software company who first came to China in the late 1980s.

All politics are local, in China as elsewhere, and the recent invitations to experience China's countryside also dovetail with a major initiative by the administration of President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

The message to get beyond Shanghai subtly distinguishes the new leadership team from former President Jiang Zemin, a Shanghai booster whose policies benefited the moneyed, high-tech and glitzy. It also falls in line with Hu and Wen's focus on rural problems, migrant workers, the rich-poor gap and those left behind.

"It's entirely consistent with the line from the top," said Patrick Horgan, Beijing-based managing director with a consulting company and a longtime China resident. "And it's for the good. If people form their view of China from the China World and St. Regis hotels and from being whisked around in motorcades, they miss the bigger story."

China is increasingly welcoming not only potential friends but some of its harshest critics to poke around for themselves.

Early this year, it invited Sens. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., for a visit after the two drafted a bill to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on all Chinese goods imported to the U.S. unless Beijing agreed to revalue its currency. Critics say China's yuan is undervalued, giving its companies an unfair trade advantage.

Back in Washington the following week, the senators agreed to postpone a vote on the bill until September on the grounds that Beijing had assured them it was serious about currency reform.

That prompted a familiar refrain.

"I think with Senators Schumer and Graham's visit to China, both sides have a better understanding of each other's views," a senior Chinese official told a small group of U.S. reporters in advance of Hu's trip to Washington in April.

"It's just a pity that, given the brief visit by the senators, there was no time to visit the impoverished Western areas."

Opec Unites Against Venezuelan Rhetoric (FT)

By Carola Hoyos And Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's populist president, on Thursday angered Opec ministers with anti-US rhetoric as they united against him in rejecting his call to cut the oil cartel's production.

Overcoming Venezuelan objections, the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, at a meeting in Caracas hosted by Mr Chávez, decided to keep pumping at nearly maximum capacity. Opec produces 30m barrels a day of oil, about 40 per cent of the world's total output. Earlier this week Venezuela called for a cut in Opec production of 500,000 to 1m b/d.

"We are third world countries, nations that have suffered colonialism for years, we are countries that are condemned by much more powerful states," Mr Chávez told the meeting. "The US president is a danger for the world," he said, echoing his regular criticism of US foreign policy.

Opec ministers did not criticise their host openly. Shokri Ghanem, Libya's energy minister, said: "The most important thing in life is to listen, not necessarily to agree."

Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, has led the cartel's efforts to counter attempts by Venezuela and Iran to use Opec as a tool against the US, Opec's biggest customer. Venezuela backed the idea of selling oil in euros instead of in dollars, a proposal which was supported by Iran but rejected by other members.

Oil prices are at near-record highs and a reduction in Opec's output would have led to a further rally, analysts said. They warned this could have undermined world economic growth and pushed up inflation.

Using Opec to further his cause of oil nationalism, Mr Chávez backed Bolivia to join the group as an observer member, and Ecuador, a member from 1973-1992, to rejoin as a full member. Both South American countries have moved to wrest more control of energy from international companies.

Joseph Stanislaw, president of J A Stanislaw group, the consulting firm, said: “The enlargement of Opec is a natural extension of the energy nationalism we see in the world today. The high prices are encouraging every oil-rich country to find ways to maximise their resources revenue.”

Pushed by Nigeria, Opec’s biggest African member, Angola and Sudan are also considering joining the group. The two sub-Saharan countries together produce more than 1.5m barrels of oil a day. International oil companies have invested billions in Angola and oppose its membership.

If oil prices fell and Opec decided to reduce its quota level, Angola would have to ask oil companies to forgo revenues. Sudan would have to do the same to the Chinese groups that dominate its industry.

OPEC Decides Not To Cut Production Quotas (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Ministers from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries said at their meeting in Venezuela yesterday that the oil group that produces 40 percent of the world's oil would keep its production quotas unchanged at 28 million barrels a day.

"At this level of prices, the market is very sensitive," Qatar's Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah told reporters in Caracas yesterday, Bloomberg News reported. "We have to be very careful. We don't want the price to get out of control."

But oil traders and analysts took little comfort from OPEC's commitment, noting that the cushion between world supply and demand remained uncomfortably thin. Moreover, they said, the oil producers were unlikely to reduce output when they could cash in on record high prices that many consumers think are already out of control.

"Nobody expected that at these prices they'd cut back," said Edward Morse, executive adviser of Hess Energy Trading Co. in New York.

The only OPEC member pushing for cuts in output quotas was the meeting's host, Venezuela, but oil traders noted that Venezuela probably favored a cut in quotas because it has been unable to produce enough oil to meet its share of the organization's quota allotments. Morse estimated that Venezuela, OPEC's third-largest producer, was falling at least 300,000 barrels a day short of its quota because of technical problems it has had since an oil workers strike three years ago and more recent disputes with foreign operators.

Crude oil for July delivery fell 95 cents, but still remained high at $70.34 a barrel.

Sensitive to charges that they have helped drive up oil prices, some OPEC ministers pointed to speculators and traders who are too worried about tension between the United States and Iran over Tehran's nuclear program. Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali al-Naimi, said yesterday that the crude oil market was "oversupplied and overpriced," Bloomberg reported. Al-Naimi said world supply exceeds demand by about 1 million barrels a day.

Some investors agree. The manager of one European hedge fund said in a recent interview that he thought the world was "awash in oil."

Others don't see it that way. "There comes a point every year in the second quarter where supply is ahead of demand," said Jacques Rousseau, an oil analyst with Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group Inc. "It's a seasonal thing. We're out of the winter heating season and not yet in the summer driving season."

"It's in OPEC countries' interest to say that supply is not the problem and that OPEC is living up to its responsibility," said Morse, who noted that May is the month when demand is weakest. "Therefore, they say, it must be something else: speculators, a risk premium or a lack of refining capacity. But clearly the lack of production capacity is a factor in keeping prices as high as they've been."

Most OPEC countries can do little to bring prices down, however. The organization has limited excess production capacity and most of it is in Saudi Arabia, which says it could produce 1.8 million barrels more a day. But even there, about 800,000 barrels a day of that extra supply cannot be used at most of the world's refineries because of its low quality.

Meanwhile, demand continues to run strong. The Energy Department yesterday released figures showing that U.S. demand for gasoline has been running 0.9 percent above last year, despite high prices. U.S. gasoline consumption accounts for roughly 9 million barrels a day, of total world demand of about 85 million barrels a day.

Although the International Energy Agency this year trimmed its estimate for the growth in world oil demand, it still expects an increase of 1.2 million barrels a day.

Rousseau said he expects the oil-market balance to remain tight for years, regardless of what OPEC does.

"Prices will drift down to mid-60s this year and stay at that level next year because world economic conditions are softening somewhat. But it won't be until the next decade that we really drive down the price," he said.

OPEC Keeps Its Formal Output Aims (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And David Luhnow

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

CARACAS -- With oil prices still above $70 a barrel, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries left its oil-output targets unchanged as expected. But behind the scenes, some major exporters already have begun making moves to effectively trim oil supply, said delegates attending the meeting.

The cartel didn't take up the hawkish call by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez to formally cut output, set a price ceiling of "infinity" or shift the pricing of petroleum to euros instead of dollars. Qatari oil minister Abdullah bin Hamad Al-Attiyah said yesterday OPEC ministers had decided to leave output unchanged.

U.S. benchmark crude settled at $70.34 a barrel, down 95 cents, or 1.3%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

But some analysts estimate that oil supply from OPEC nations is already well below the formal output quota of 28 million barrels a day, excluding Iraq, and is running as much as one million barrels a day less than a year ago. Led by Saudi Arabia, the cartel last year opted to pump full-throttle to fatten up oil inventories globally to meet growing demand, which is at about 84 million barrels a day.

The Saudis are producing less oil, say cartel officials. Saudi and Iranian producers, through a pricing mechanism that either encourages or discourages buyers, also have taken steps to reduce the amount of oil that reaches the market, the officials said. The declines -- which are also in part due to supply disruptions like political strife -- haven't been announced and haven't shown up in official figures.

The reason for the cutbacks: While oil use is rising, global inventories are flush. This is causing concern in OPEC that if investors cut back on heavy purchases of oil futures, prices could fall precipitously.

Underscoring those concerns, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said yesterday the oil market is both oversupplied and overpriced, adding that the OPEC heavyweight is seeing no extra demand from its customers for oil, especially for heavy crude that's more difficult to refine into fuels like gasoline. "Nobody wants heavy oil," he said.

Oil ministers are saying oil prices are being driven up by financial investors, not by fundamentals of supply and demand. "Oil could drop to $40 a barrel" if hedge and pension funds decide the price has peaked and redirect money into other markets, said one senior delegate from a major Middle Eastern country.

Such worries may seem misplaced at a time when the world economy is using up more oil. OPEC's leaders reply that they have seen oil markets turn quickly in the past. In the late 1990s, prices plunged below $11 a barrel as Asian economies tanked when inventories were high. While markets can turn on a dime, curtailing production and reducing inventory can take months.

As a result, key OPEC members are adjusting their production and deliveries downward to preclude further, price-threatening increases in consumer stockpiles of oil, thus preparing for the day when markets turn against them. But they are doing so quietly, because of consumer anger over high prices at the pump. As a whole, OPEC's output has fallen by about 600,000 compared with less than a year ago, at about 27.3 million barrels a day excluding Iraq, according to PFC Energy, a Washington oil-consulting company. That doesn't include oil pumped but put in storage instead of sold. Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Nigeria are all producing less than they did a year ago.

"They're starting to draw down hefty crude stocks" world-wide, said Roger Diwan, a PFC analyst, on the sidelines of the OPEC meeting. "This will position them better for any downturn in price or demand."

Some of the decline, say OPEC officials, results from an attempt by Saudi Arabia and Iran to keep world oil supplies in check. They are doing this by opting not to discount heavy, high-sulfur grades of crude oil. These fuels are hard to sell during the summer, when refiners seek lighter grades that yield more gasoline when refined.

The Saudi decline -- estimated by PFC at some 200,000 barrels a day -- is recent. And because some of the oil is being stored, including on tankers, the reduced supply isn't showing up in output data compiled by various organizations, including the Paris-based International Energy Agency.

Acknowledging that Iran is building up stores of oil, a senior Iranian delegate said his country isn't alone in having trouble finding buyers for heavy, high-sulfur grades of crude oil. "Anybody who has oil of less than 30 API can't find buyers," the official said, referring to the American Petroleum Institute's gravity scale for oil, in which a number below 30 signifies heavier grades.

Colombia's Window Of Opportunity (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Liberty lovers across the Western Hemisphere are cheering Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's second-term victory on Sunday. Colombians gave their president more than 62% of the vote. His closest competitor, the hard-left Carlos Gaviria, whose platform mirrored the ideology of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, earned only 22%. Pro-Uribe parties also won a majority in Congress.

The Uribe win is not only an endorsement of a worldview favoring security, the rule of law and global engagement for Colombia. It is also evidence of a backlash against the economic isolation and hostility toward private property preached by Mr. Gaviria and Mr. Chávez next door. As such it casts a ray of hope on the Andean region, which has been trending toward left-wing, authoritarian populism of late.

Now comes the hard part. To secure Colombian democracy, Mr. Uribe's second term will have to go beyond the success he managed in beating back guerrilla forces around the country and stabilizing the economy in his first term. Second-term success will require equal boldness in economic reform so that Colombia might attract more capital, bring underground economic activity into the legal sector, begin to grow at its potential and provide economic mobility.

The Colombian corporate tax regime may be the country's single most pernicious policy error. It is also easily correctable by introducing a single, low corporate rate, an idea that is spreading rapidly in Eastern Europe and has proven to stimulate growth and reduce corruption. Were Mr. Uribe to embrace it, he would score an early reform victory that would have a huge payoff. Failure to seize the moment will mean a missed opportunity that is not likely to present itself again. Just ask Mexican President Vicente Fox what happens when political capital is not spent.

A low corporate rate goes against the tired old saw that high taxes on entrepreneurs make society fair, even though this model has left Latin America in poverty. But bucking conventional wisdom is Mr. Uribe's trademark. When he was first a candidate for the 2002 elections, Colombia was overrun with guerrilla terror while the terrorists enjoyed a jungle safe-haven the size of Switzerland, courtesy of the government as an olive branch toward peace. The status quo favored this concession even though the rebels warred on, using the area to store weapons, hold hostages and organize assaults against the civilian population. Washington and Colombian "experts" counseled this perpetual "peace process," while the human carnage wrought by guerrillas was mounting weekly.

Mr. Uribe saw things differently and said so: Appeasement of terrorists was making things worse. That observation got him elected and when he took office he ended the safe-haven policy, beefed up the military and sent a message to the rebels that the Colombian people would defend themselves. Four years later, Colombia has not only regained lost territory but it has also recovered national confidence.

Now Mr. Uribe has the chance to do the same thing with the economy that he did with security: break with conventional wisdom and forge a new path. His economic team has already accomplished some microeconomic reform and Colombia was named one of the world's most-improved business environments by the World Bank two years ago. Improved security has paid off in increasing investment. Yet the massive underground economy remains, holding back the productivity gains essential for development. With GDP growth still averaging below 5% annually, much more has to be done to lower the cost of complying with the law so that entrepreneurs can afford to come out of the informal shadows.

The economic eyesore is tax policy, according to the bank's annual "Doing Business" report, which ranks Colombia at the bottom of the pile (148 out of 155 countries) in the category of "paying taxes." According to the report, full compliance for a medium-sized business involves an administrative burden of 432 hours and 54 payments annually. The survey further finds that "total tax payable" amounts to more than 75% of gross profit.

That's not nearly as bad as Brazilian or Bolivian tax policy but it's a world away from Estonia -- where compliance means 11 payments a year taking 104 hours and costing less than 40% of gross profit -- or Ireland where there are eight payments annually that take 76 hours at a cost of just over 45% of gross profit.

How can the lower costs in Ireland and Estonia be explained? Easy: Both have low, flat corporate rates. Ireland's is 12.5%; Estonia's is zero on retained profits. Compare this to Colombia's 35% rate and its mishmash of loopholes. Simplification means fewer filing headaches and less corruption. Tax revenues have soared in flat tax countries as businesses invest more and comply more readily. The economic effect is more employment and more funding for infrastructure and social programs serving the truly needy.

Ireland, which for more than a century lived one of the world's most tragic emigration stories, is now experiencing net immigration and is a richer country than the United Kingdom. Estonia has one of the most competitive business environments in Europe and from 2001-2004 its average per capita growth rate was 6.7%.

Of course, any attempt at such a free-market tax policy will meet with a lot of reasons about why it can't work. Mr. Uribe could prepare for this by listening to former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar who won the Cato Institute's Milton Friedman Prize in April for his role in breaking the regulatory and tax shackles on his country and making it one of the world's superstar economies.

The humble Estonian has plenty of horror stories about living under Soviet rule. But he also notes that once the reformers came to power, economic freedom faced a different enemy. "The Western experts," he says, often advised his economic team against deep and rapid liberalization.

It is likely that Mr. Uribe is also encountering naysayers. The State Department is famous for its arm-twisting bureaucrats who push steeply progressive tax schedules. But Mr. Laar has the moral authority and his counsel is clear: Do it and do it fast and don't let "experts" talk you out of it.

The battle for security will continue but as Colombian economist Mauricio Cardenas said recently, "It's a mistake to think that the conflict must first be resolved for the economy to grow. We need economic growth in order to resolve the conflict." To meet that goal there may be no single policy as powerful as the corporate flat tax.

WHO Stumped By Indonesian Bird Flu Cluster (AFP)

By Marianne Kearney

AFP, June 2, 2006

The World Health Organisation (WHO) has admitted it was having difficulty identifying the source of bird flu infection in a case where seven people in the same family died of the virus.

The case in North Sumatra, Indonesia's largest cluster to date, has raised fears of human-to-human transmission of the virus, which has raised the spectre of a deadly global flu pandemic.

"There are three possible sources of infection, but there is no conclusion," WHO epidemiologist Steve Bjorge told reporters at a joint press conference with Indonesian health ministry officials in Jakarta Thursday.

"It's difficult to get good information from that village, and that family," he said. "Previously it had been good."

Indonesia has the world's second highest number of fatal human bird flu cases after Vietnam with 36 -- and the highest number of deaths this year globally.

The WHO has said that it could not rule out the possibility of human-to-human transmission in the North Sumatra case, where 54 people who came into close contact with the family are currently under voluntary quarantine.

Bjorge said the first family member to contract avian flu, a 37-year-old woman, could have been infected by her sick chickens, by chicken faeces used as fertiliser, or at the wet market where chickens are sold.

However, as two of the woman's chickens had fallen sick prior to her death, there was a strong possibility that the sick fowl were to blame, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031406

But as with two other clusters, Bjorge said WHO experts also suspected that perhaps members of the family could have been particularly susceptible to avian influenza.

"Some scientists are talking about something genetic. What we observed in all these clusters is that infections occur in closely related family members, and it is always the same bloodline," he said.

Indonesian Health Minister Siti Fadilah Supari said it was unlikely that even limited human-to-human transmission had occurred in this village.

"It's just a possibility, but based on the two criteria for possible transmission, virological evidence shows it's still being transmitted from animal to human," she told journalists.

However, as a precaution, Indonesian health authorities were to monitor the village for three more weeks -- one more than recommended by the WHO.

The people in quarantine, who include family members and other close contacts, are receiving the anti-influenza drug Tamiflu as a precaution and are being checked daily for flu symptoms, said Bjorge.

The WHO expert criticized Indonesia's efforts to fight bird flu, warning more people could die if outbreaks among poultry are not contained.

"The situation is that there is a leak in the roof, and the ministry of health is just mopping up the floor every day. Until they fix that leak in the roof, it's not going to stop," Bjorge told AFP.

"And the leak in the roof is this continuing transmission of the virus from bird to bird," he said.

Bjorge said Indonesia had to start mass culls of infected birds and more intensive testing of fowl suspected of carrying the H5N1 virus if it wanted to stem the spread of the virus, which he said was a "pandemic in poultry".

However, the sprawling country's hugely decentralised government -- spread over 17,000 islands -- meant preventing the spread of the virus amongst birds was a very complicated task, said Bjorge.

Indonesian health officials were also fighting lack of public awareness about the disease and its dangers, he added.

More than 120 people have died of bird flu around the world since late 2003, the vast majority of them in Asia.

Local Tests Show Indonesian Girl Died From Bird Flu (AP)

The Associated Press, June 2, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- An eight-year-old girl in Indonesia has died of bird flu, a health official said Friday, citing local tests, as a rise in human cases has put Indonesia on pace to soon become the world's hardest-hit country.

The World Health Organization has yet to confirm the death. The girl, from a city on the outskirts of Jakarta, died late Thursday after apparently coming into contact with sick poultry, said Nyoman Kandun, a senior Health Ministry official.

The girl's 10-year-old brother died three days earlier with similar flu-like symptoms, but no samples were taken, said Dr. Hariadi Wibisono, a senior official at the national Health Department. The boy died in an emergency room before being treated, and the family immediately took him home for burial, he said. "The family reported that chickens died near their house, and we have been told they had contact with birds," Dr. Wibisono said.

Meanwhile, Bayu Khrisnamurti, secretary general of the National Committee of Avian Flu Control, said a mass poultry slaughter would begin soon in the North Sumatra village of Kubu Simbelang. The village attracted international attention last month after six members of a family died of bird flu and a seventh was sickened. An eighth family member was buried before samples were collected, but WHO considers her part of the cluster of cases -- the largest ever reported.

Experts haven't found any link between the relatives and infected birds, which has led them to suspect human-to-human transmission. But no one outside the group of blood relatives has fallen ill and experts say the virus hasn't mutated.

Mr. Khrisnamurti said the decision to begin a mass cull came after a meeting Thursday with provincial officials. He said the government will compensate villagers whose birds are slaughtered, but did not provide additional details. Compensation is typically about 10,000 rupiah ($1.07) for every bird killed.

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people world-wide since it started ravaging Asian poultry farms in late 2003. It is difficult for humans to catch, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form more easily transmissible between humans, potentially sparking a pandemic. So far, most human cases have been linked to contact with infected birds. Indonesia trails only Vietnam, where 42 people have died, in number of bird flu deaths.

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 2, 2006

Thursday, June 1

7:15 a.m.: African health systems, already crumbling under the strain of AIDS, malaria and other diseases, could collapse if a bird-flu pandemic takes hold on the continent, health experts said at the World Economic Forum on Africa. Idrissa Sow, a senior WHO official, said it was vital to increase the number of laboratories capable of testing for the H5N1 virus in Africa. South Africa has advanced laboratory facilities, but other countries have had to send samples to Europe for testing.

2:40 a.m.: Indonesian officials began slaughtering poultry in a village where preliminary tests showed a 15-year-old boy had died from bird flu. All chickens will be killed within one kilometer (half a mile) of the boy's house in the Tasikmalaya district of West Java province, said Budi Utama, head of the local animal and fisheries agency.

U.N. Agency Proposes Plan To Track Birds (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

The U.N. food agency said Thursday it is considering a plan to fit wild birds with tiny backpacks and monitor their annual migrations to help combat the spread of the deadly H5N1 bird flu.

The project would rely on communications satellites and a network of computers to track the birds' movements, and would cost $6.8 million, the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization said in a statement.

"All we have now is a snapshot. We need to see the whole film," said Joseph Domenech, the organization's chief veterinary officer.

Evidence on the role of wild birds is not always conclusive in the areas where H5N1 has appeared. Migratory birds introduced the disease in Russia and eastern Europe, but in the case of recent outbreaks in Africa there is scarce evidence pointing to wild birds.

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people worldwide since it began sweeping through Asian poultry stocks in late 2003. Most human victims were infected through direct contact with sick birds, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form that spreads easily between humans, and spark a pandemic.

The virus has ravaged poultry flocks in Asia, Europe and Africa since 2003 and experts have pointed to the poultry trade as the area where the disease is easiest to manage.

The U.N. agency's plan would entail capturing thousands of wild birds before they migrate, testing sample birds for the virus, and fitting some with backpacks weighing less than 1.8 ounces. After the birds are released, the telemetry equipment inside the packs would track their every movement, FAO said.

When the birds stop for rest, ground teams would grab them and retest them and, in case of a positive result, have a good idea where the infection originated and where it might head next, the agency said.

A system of radio beacons and satellites would feed data into the computers of ornithologists, ecologists, virologists and epidemiologists around the world.

"Early warning would give governments and producers more time to respond to potential threats — with great benefits for the poultry industry and society at large," the FAO said.

The agency said it needs to raise most of the money for the project.

The U.N. agency released details of its plan a day after scientists at an international conference on bird flu in Rome urged countries to refrain from mass killings of wild birds, saying that only further research can reveal whether the H5N1 bird flu strain will become endemic in wild birds, causing periodic outbreaks across the globe for years to come.

The conference was organized by the Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Organization for Animal Health.

Death In Darfur (WSJ)

By Mohamed Buisier

DOJ_NMG_0031408

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Once again, the international community, and the U.N. in particular, is being shamed into acting to stop the massacres in Darfur, and once again the Arab League and Arab leaders are unwilling and unable to face facts, or to deal with them in a civilized and humane manner.

Indeed, the most recent Arab League summit, which took place in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum -- presumably as a show of support to the host government -- ended with a resolution denying that any massacres had taken place in Darfur and expressing resistance to any outside intervention in the "internal" affairs of an Arab country. (Not surprisingly, this stance is identical to that taken by Osama Bin Laden.)

By adopting this argument, the Arab League was not just covering up for the atrocities perpetrated by the Sudanese government, but also for the direct or indirect involvement in this part of the Sudan of some of the Arab governments attending the summit. It is but one more shameful manifestation of Arab governments turning a blind eye to the continuing inhumane atrocities committed against their own citizens.

The fact that the Arab League is ineffectual is no longer news. Indeed, it may even work to the advantage of those present at the summit that many of the delegates were asleep, as Al-Arabiya TV cameras showed: In the future, if justice were to prevail in Darfur, the conferees could claim that they were sleeping when the resolution was passed and blame the whole ugly episode there on a Western/Zionist conspiracy to destroy the image of Arabs and Muslims.

While not dwelling on the cause of the problem, other Muslim leaders, such as Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, have tried to raise awareness of the humanitarian tragedy that is taking place in Darfur. But such pleas should be directed at the Arab and Sudanese governments and not just at the international community, particularly as Sudan continues to oscillate between denying and allowing international access to Darfur. Sudan's track record does not inspire confidence.

But why should anyone be surprised that the Arab League is denying yet one more massacre in its midst? In fact, some Arab leaders and so-called Arab intellectuals continue to assert that Saddam Hussein is still the legitimate president of Iraq even after his massacres of Iraqis have been unearthed. After all, for many decades now, legitimacy in this part of the world has been gained at the point of a gun (or for those diehard romantics in Western foreign ministries, by the sword).

The contrast between the Arab League's denial of any massacres in Darfur and the handover of Charles Taylor by the Nigerian government to the U.N.-backed special court in Sierra Leone is telling, to say the least. Taylor, who had received support from some members of the Arab League, will be the first African leader to face war-crimes charges.

It remains a serious concern that while many regions of the world are moving forward and finding, with the support of the international community, mechanisms to bring the likes of Chile's Pinochet, Yugoslavia's Milosevic and Liberia's Taylor to justice, the Arab League's denial of the atrocities in Darfur demonstrates not only disrespect for human life, but proof that the Arab world may be falling into a darkness of which we had only a glimpse in New York, Madrid and London.

Can the Arab world hope for, and expect, a miracle from its warlord leaders and their heirs? Or is it condemned to a downward spiral in which cruel and autocratic leaders are replaced with even more barbarity?

The Arab world is in a race against time. Its leaders, for once, should stop and think if it is in their interest to continue governing by force, and instilling fear, hatred and a dangerous sense of impotence in their populations. It is time to break out of this culture of fear, wherein the rulers fear those they govern, and the people fear their rulers. Opening up the political space for democratic participation, and encouraging a more civilized dialogue between state and society based on respect for the rights of the individual, would be a step toward breaking this cycle of fear.

If the Arab League and Arab leaders cannot constrain or punish those in their midst who commit heinous atrocities against their own populations, they should not complain when the rest of the world acts to make this world a less welcoming place for those who are committing atrocities.

Mr. Buisier is a Libyan-American political activist.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Free And Uneasy (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

TIRANA, Albania -- After four years in Guantanamo Bay, Abu Bakker Qassim, a former terror suspect cleared last year of having ties to al Qaeda, got word last month that he finally would be set free.

He and four fellow Muslims from China were loaded onto a U.S. military transport plane in the middle of the night, shackled to the floor and flown for 12 hours to their new home: a converted military barracks in Tirana, the capital of Albania.

The compound is located on a potholed road strewn with garbage. It has high walls, bars on the windows and a guard at the gate. The five men occasionally leave but don't venture far. They've found no one in this small Balkan country who knows their native language, a Turkic tongue spoken by the Uighur (pronounced WEE-gur) people of China.

"I think Allah must be testing our patience," says Mr. Qassim, a 37-year-old father of three from Xinjiang, a historically Muslim region of deserts and mountains in western China. Pointing to strands of rusty barbed wire outside his window, he rolls his eyes. Freedom, he says, "is not what we expected."

The U.S. is also in a predicament it never expected: What should it do with Guantanamo inmates who have been found deserving of release but who face jail or execution if returned to their homelands?

It's a question that has grown urgent in recent weeks as the United Nations and even stalwart ally Britain have turned up the heat on Washington over Guantanamo prison. Critics say the camp stains America's reputation, upends the Geneva Convention governing treatment of prisoners and fuels Muslim anger. Eighty-nine inmates are now staging a hunger strike, drawing further attention to their plight.

Washington's hesitation to repatriate some detainees reflects its growing unease with authoritarian states it initially enlisted as partners in the post-9/11 war on terror. U.S. forces used an air base in Uzbekistan during the war in Afghanistan, but Washington strongly criticized the former Soviet republic last year when Uzbek security forces killed scores of unarmed protesters. Uzbekistan then evicted the U.S. military.

Fear of being sent home is so strong that an exonerated Egyptian detainee, Ala Abdel Maqsud Muhammad Salim, had his U.S. lawyers ask a federal court in January to block his release to avoid his being sent to Egypt, where he expected harm. The U.S. dropped a plan to return the sickly and nearly blind prisoner. He's still in Guantanamo.

U.S. officials say they scouted for two years for a country ready to take Mr. Qassim and his companions, beginning the search even before their exoneration. The U.S. was wary of sending them to China. Beijing severely punishes Muslims from the far west who criticize the Communist government or advocate independence. Unwilling to let the men live in the U.S., American officials say they approached more than 100 countries. All said no or waffled, fearful of upsetting China and reluctant to take on America's problem. Then Albania, an impoverished land with a large Muslim populace and a brutal communist past, said yes in April.

Messy Struggle

The decision pushed the country of some 3.5 million into a messy big-power struggle. Soon after the five Uighurs reached Tirana, China accused Washington of hypocrisy for letting them go. Beijing demanded that Albania hand over the men, whom it calls terror suspects. Prime Minister Sali Berisha says he was harangued by China's ambassador. Mr. Berisha says he's glad he gave the five Uighurs a haven, but regrets that it "has become very noisy around here." The Chinese Embassy in Tirana declined to comment.

Guantanamo Bay now holds around 460 detainees. These include four who have been declared "no longer enemy combatants" -- bureaucratic jargon for innocent. About 116 others, though not exonerated, are no longer considered a serious threat or valuable to U.S. intelligence.

Among those who have been cleared but remain at Guantanamo is Zakirjan Hassam, an Uzbek dissident desperate to avoid going back to Uzbekistan. Like China, Uzbekistan rallied early to the "war on terror," viewing it as a vindication of its own harsh measures against restive Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0031414

Before sending detainees home, U.S. officials seek guarantees they will be treated humanely and prevented from causing trouble for America in the future. Those issues have slowed U.S. negotiations with Saudi Arabia over the repatriation of Saudi nationals at Guantanamo, although 15 Saudis there were sent home last month.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has cited such complications in explaining why the Guantanamo prison can't simply be closed. The U.S. is working "almost daily" with foreign governments to reduce the number of prisoners, she has said. On a visit to Britain in April, Ms. Rice said: "We don't want to be the world's jailer."

Guantanamo critics blame the dilemma on the Bush administration's refusal to adopt swift and transparent procedures for judging guilt or innocence. They say lengthy incarceration leaves people with the stigma of terrorism even if they eventually get cleared. Lawyers for Mr. Qassim and other absolved detainees say those who are found innocent should be allowed to settle in America.

"The U.S. made this mistake," says Sabin Willett, a Boston corporate lawyer who early last year volunteered to defend Mr. Qassim and another Uighur detainee. "After four years at the Guantanamo prison, America owes them better than to be swept under an Albanian rug."

Unlike many of the world's Muslims, China's Uighurs often like America. Chafing at rule by Beijing and a flood of ethnic Chinese into their region, many Uighurs look to the U.S. for help. Calls for outright independence from China have faded but anger at police heavy-handedness and restrictions on religious worship have triggered sporadic bouts of unrest.

Mr. Qassim says that before leaving China in 2000 he used to listen to U.S.-funded Radio Free Asia, which broadcasts news in Uighur and other Asian languages. "It was very sad and disappointing to have a country we respect treat us in the way we've been treated," he says.

A native of Yining, a town near China's border with Kazakhstan, he used to work in a state leather factory and as a small-time trader. He ran into trouble after anti-Chinese riots in his hometown in 1997. Mr. Qassim says he didn't take part in the turmoil, which left at least nine dead, but he began to speak out against Chinese rule. Mr. Qassim says he also grew more interested in Islam, and was jailed for seven months on suspicion of anti-Chinese activities.

In 2000 he moved to neighboring Kyrgyzstan, hustling for work in a big bazaar. There he met a fellow Uighur from Yining, Adel Abdu Al-Hakim, now with him in Albania. The two later decided to move to Turkey, hoping to work at a leather-jacket factory run by a ethnic Uighur living there.

With no money for air tickets, they headed overland for Pakistan, where they say they intended to get visas for Iran. Discovering this would take months -- and fearful of staying on in Chinese ally Pakistan -- they opted to wait in Afghanistan.

The two men say they left Pakistan in the summer of 2001 to join some 30 anti-Chinese Uighurs living near the Afghan city of Jalalabad. The U.S. would subsequently describe their settlement as a "training camp."

The Uighurs in Guantanamo strongly denied that description in their tribunals. According to transcripts, each insisted the place was just a cluster of ramshackle buildings. Mr. Qassim says he studied the Quran and occasionally took pot shots with a Kalashnikov rifle, but received no "terrorist" training. Both he and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim say they had never heard of the Afghan-based Osama bin Laden and had no intention of joining him.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim heard reports of a likely U.S. attack on Afghanistan from a Uighur who listened to Radio Free Asia. He says he didn't expect any trouble, as the Uighurs had no quarrel with America.

Late at night a few days later, U.S. planes bombed their settlement. Ayup Hajimemet, now 23 and the youngest of the five Uighurs in Albania, says he arrived at the village just as the bombing started. He joined a group of fleeing residents, including Mr. Qassim, and headed for the mountains. They later discovered their destination was called Tora Bora, the focus of a failed U.S. hunt for Mr. bin Laden.

Hungry and frightened, they say they sought shelter in a cave, only to be driven out by wild monkeys throwing stones. "We don't fit in anywhere in the world. Even monkeys don't want us," says Mr. Qassim.

Betrayed by Locals

After some two months of foraging and begging for food, Mr. Qassim and other Uighurs decided to get out of Afghanistan. They made a three-day trek across snow-covered peaks into Pakistan. Upon arriving, they say, local tribesmen gave them a warm welcome -- and then betrayed them.

After a lamb feast, the 18 Uighurs were taken to a mosque, herded into vehicles, driven to a jail and handed over to U.S. forces, who flew them to an American prison in Afghanistan. Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim says the 18 were captured by Pakistani bounty hunters. He overheard people saying the hunters received $5,000 each for the captives from the U.S. A Pentagon spokesman said he couldn't discuss "tactics, techniques and procedures" used to combat terrorism.

After some six months of interrogation in Afghanistan, the 18 Uighurs captured in Pakistan were put on a plane to Guantanamo, their heads hooded, their arms and legs tethered. Upon arrival in Cuba, they say they were each given an orange jumpsuit, a copy of the Quran and an "internment serial number." Mr. Qassim became ISN #283.

China cheered the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, linking it to its own crackdown in Xinjiang. Beijing soon issued a report claiming the Uighur activists were "supported and directed by Osama bin Laden." It named as an al Qaeda affiliate a small Uighur group called the East Turkistan Islamic Movement.

At Guantanamo, much of the interrogation of the Uighurs focused on the movement, which the U.S. in late 2002 declared a terrorist organization. The Uighurs in Guantanamo denied any involvement with the group.

The U.S. let Chinese interrogators interview Mr. Qassim and other Chinese nationals at Guantanamo, according to the men and court documents. Most refused to talk, but they were rattled: Mr. Qassim says the Chinese made veiled threats against their families back in Xinjiang and appeared to have had access to information the Uighurs had given U.S. interrogators. A Pentagon spokesman said the U.S. "works with a variety of nations to try and determine the status of detainees."

Out of 22 Uighurs with Chinese nationality sent to Guantanamo, U.S. officials concluded early on that Mr. Qassim and the four now with him in Albania weren't terrorists. But for reasons that remain unclear, U.S. authorities failed to inform the five Uighurs of that. In early 2004, the Pentagon asked the State Department to start looking for a possible home for them abroad.

Later that year, the Uighurs and hundreds of others got their first chance to formally contest their status as "enemy combatants." This followed a 2004 Supreme Court decision that prompted the Pentagon to set up so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals. Detainees appeared before the secret panels shackled and without lawyers, but were allowed to defend themselves. Remarks in declassified transcripts suggest the Uighurs' hearings took place in late 2004.

"Treating a person like me this way is not fair," Mr. Qassim told the tribunal, claiming that he opposed China, not America. The U.S., he complained, "was to help young Uighur people, and now they are saying we are the enemy.... We Uighurs have more than one billion enemies and that is enough for us."

Mr. Hajimemet, the young man who reached Afghanistan just as bombs were falling, was the only one of the five Uighurs to learn much English. While in prison, he says, he sometimes lashed out in response to taunts from American guards and to the daily humiliations of "being treated like an animal." He spat at a guard. "Even a donkey kicks back," he says. He wasn't tortured, he says, but on one occasion was thrown against a metal bed, leaving him with a lingering back injury.

The review tribunals set up in 2004 examined 558 cases in all and ruled that 38 detainees should be reclassified as "no longer enemy combatants." Among them were the five Uighurs now in Albania. The 13 other Uighurs who had been seized with them in Pakistan are all still "enemy combatants" and remain in Guantanamo.

In March 2005, Mr. Willett, the Boston lawyer, filed a petition in the U.S. to force the government to bring Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim to court. U.S. officials declined to inform him that his clients already had been cleared. "The whole approach has been to keep Guantanamo a great big secret," says Mr. Willett, a partner at Bingham McCutchen LLP. "In the fog of war, mistakes are made," he adds. "The dishonor comes of hiding them."

Four months later, in July, Mr. Willett got permission to visit Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim in Cuba. The two men were chained to the floor in a tiny plywood hut, the lawyer says. Only at this meeting was he finally told they had been exonerated. Mr. Willett returned to the U.S. and filed an emergency motion demanding their immediate release.

About a month later, Mr. Qassim and the other exonerated Uighurs were moved to less-severe quarters in nearby Camp Iguana. They could walk around without chains and were allowed to watch nature videos. News broadcasts were banned. Mr. Willett requested permission to send a Uighur-English dictionary and other language materials but was told this was forbidden. Defense Department rules bar inmates from developing any skill, even English, that might be used against the U.S.

At a U.S. court hearing last August on Mr. Willett's call for the prisoners' release, a federal judge denounced the term "no longer enemy combatant" as "Kafkaesque." When assured by a government lawyer that the case would be resolved "soon," the judge snapped, "Define soon." In a December ruling, he declared the continued detention of Mr. Qassim and Mr. Abdu Al-Hakim was "unlawful" but said he couldn't order the release of the innocent men because this would involve immigration issues outside of his purview.

Mr. Willett appealed, and a hearing was set for May 8. With the legal pressure mounting, the government stepped up previously fruitless efforts to find the Uighurs a home. U.S. officials at one time considered letting the Uighurs into America, but that option was rejected "at a senior policy level" out of concerns over possible litigation and security, says a senior State Department official.

Sending the Uighurs back to China was never an option, say U.S. officials. The State Department's annual report on global human rights, released in March, concluded that China had "used counter-terrorism as an excuse for religious repression of Uighur Muslims." It also reported that a Uighur sent back to China from Nepal against his will had been executed. The State Department's latest report on global terrorism, issued in April, now lists the East Turkistan Islamic Movement as a group of "concern."

Albania was first approached about taking the Uighurs late last year, and initially balked. In April, the U.S. ambassador to Tirana went to see Prime Minister Berisha. Mr. Berisha had assisted the U.S. in the 1990s, helping the Central Intelligence Agency hunt down alleged Islamic militants in Albania. The militants were later expelled to Egypt and, in two cases, hanged. Albania was also seeking U.S. backing to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Berisha says he told the ambassador that Albania would take the Uighurs as a "favor to a friend," so long as America was sure they weren't terrorists. The U.S. agreed to cover the costs of their resettlement. Albania, he says, owes a lot to America, most recently for its 1999 military intervention in Kosovo, populated largely by ethnic Albanians.

China, which under Mao Zedong was a close ally of Albania, heard of the plan and was livid. A scheduled visit in May to Beijing by Albania's foreign minister was called off.

Three days before the May 8 U.S. court hearing on the Uighurs, Mr. Qassim and the four others were bundled onto the transport plane. Though told they were going to Albania, they were terrified the flight might end in China. Mr. Qassim says he calmed down only when the door of the plane opened and he saw European faces.

'Pay Any Price'

Local newspapers splashed their arrival across the front pages. The opposition blasted the government for upsetting China. Two days after the Uighurs landed, Prime Minister Berisha met with Vice President Dick Cheney in Croatia at a gathering of three countries hoping to join NATO. The prime minister said Albania was ready to "pay any price" to join the alliance. Mr. Cheney said he endorsed the entry of Albania, Croatia and Macedonia.

In Tirana last week, Mr. Berisha said he was baffled that so many major nations declined to take the Uighurs, including the U.S. itself and the European countries that call for Guantanamo's closure. "Big countries don't like to deal with small problems," he said.

Mr. Qassim and his companions, meanwhile, have shaved off the long beards they had grown in jail to fit in with zealously devout Arab inmates. They now have a driver to take them around Tirana, and have found a Turkish restaurant where Turkish-speaking waiters can just about make out their orders. China's official news agency, Xinhua, says the five men are "faring poorer than rats crossing the street."

On a visit last week to an Internet cafe, the five men searched for news about their case in their native tongue. Then they watched footage from the 9/11 attacks in New York. They'd never seen the images of hijacked planes flying into the World Trade Center before, and they wanted to know what got America so angry.

Mr. Qassim groaned as he saw the jets slam into the towers. "This is awful, really awful," he said. "If this hadn't happened, we would never have gone to Guantanamo."

89 Gitmo Detainees On Hunger Strike (AP)

By Andrew Selsky

AP, June 1, 2006

More Guantanamo Bay detainees have joined a hunger strike, raising the total to 89, and six of them were being force-fed, the U.S. military said Thursday.

The strike — which last weekend jumped from three participants to 75 — is now the biggest of the year at the U.S. prison on Cuba, where about 460 men are being held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

The U.S. military said the detainees were trying to pressure the United States to release them, but a human rights attorney described the strike as a desperate appeal for justice.

Six hunger strikers were being force-fed, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand — two more than last weekend.

"All are being closely monitored by the ... medical staff and being counseled on the health effects of long-term hunger striking," Durand said in a statement from Guantanamo Bay.

Military officials said the hunger strikers are an attempt to gain public sympathy to pressure the United States to release them.

Ben Wizner, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney who has been to Guantanamo Bay, said the growing hunger strike appears more like a call for help by detainees.

"The vast majority have never been charged with any crime, and have been prevented from communicating directly with the outside world," Wizner said in a telephone interview from New York. "So it may well be their attempt to ensure that the world is reminded of their unlawful detention."

A U.N. panel said May 19 that holding detainees indefinitely at Guantanamo Bay violates the world's ban on torture. The panel said the United States should close the detention center.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen and British Attorney General Lord Goldsmith are among those who also recently have called on the United States to close Guantanamo.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington cannot turn loose "people who have vowed to kill more Americans if they're released."

Only 10 Guantanamo detainees have been charged with crimes. The Supreme Court is expected to rule in June whether President Bush overstepped his authority in ordering the detainees to be tried by U.S. military tribunals.

The hunger strike comes amid increasing displays of defiance from the prisoners, who have been held for up to 4 1/2 years, with many claiming their innocence.

On May 18, a detainee staged a suicide attempt to lure guards into a cellblock where they were attacked by prisoners armed with makeshift weapons, the military said. Earlier that day, two detainees overdosed on antidepressants they collected from other detainees and hoarded in their cells. The men have since regained consciousness.

The hunger strike began in August and peaked at 131 last fall, according to the military's count, before declining to three earlier this year as the military used more aggressive force-feeding methods, including a restraint chair. Force-feeding is done through tubes inserted into the nose.

Physicians for Human Rights has called on the United States to halt the "brutal and inhumane force-feeding tactics."

"The commanders of Guantanamo are not tolerating people on hunger strike," said Leonard Rubenstein, executive director of the doctors' group, adding that detainees were apparently being force fed before their lives are at risk.

"These are policy decisions made by commanders, not by physicians," Rubenstein said from Washington in a telephone interview.

U.S. officials said the measures are "safe and humane" and have been used in American civilian prisons.

German Spy Agency Admits Mishandling Abduction Case (NYT)

By Souad Mekhennet, Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

Germany's external intelligence service, the BND, said yesterday that it knew about the American seizure and detention of a German citizen 16 months before the country was officially informed of his mistaken arrest. It was unclear whether that information had been passed on to senior officials.

Germany had previously maintained that it did not learn of the abduction of its citizen, Khaled el-Masri, until he returned to Germany in May 2004.

The disclosure on Thursday, made as a parliamentary inquiry into the case reconvened in Berlin, adds to suspicions that European governments, or at least their intelligence services, have abetted the American practice of "extraordinary rendition." The phrase refers to the kidnapping of terrorism suspects by American agents who then secretly transport the suspects to third countries for interrogation, beyond the jurisdiction of American laws.

Any European participation in the extrajudicial seizures and detentions, not to mention the torture that is said to be involved, would constitute a breach of the European Convention on Human Rights. The Council of Europe, which enforces the convention, is investigating the allegations of European participation in the American rendition program.

Mr. Masri's ordeal, first reported by The New York Times in January 2005, is one of the best-documented cases of extraordinary rendition. The case ignited outrage in Germany, and the government has publicly criticized the Bush administration.

Mr. Masri said he was detained in Macedonia in December 2003. His name is similar to that of a man wanted in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks.

He said the Macedonian authorities held him for 23 days before turning him over the Central Intelligence Agency, which flew him to Afghanistan, where he was held for five months. He said he was flown to Albania and released after his captors determined that he was not the man they were seeking.

The American ambassador to Germany, Daniel R. Coats, officially informed Berlin of Mr. Masri's mistaken arrest shortly after his release.

Although the United States has acknowledged that Mr. Masri was detained as part of the rendition program, neither American nor Macedonian authorities have officially confirmed that he was seized in Macedonia. But a Macedonian official who was directly involved in the case acknowledged Macedonia's role in the abduction after being promised anonymity.

"This declaration from the BND makes it clear that everything started in Macedonia and that he was handed over to the Americans there," said Manfred Gnjidic, Mr. Masri's lawyer in Ulm, Germany. Mr. Gnjidic maintains that the German government knew about Mr. Masri's abduction and did nothing.

In a statement on Thursday, the BND said it had interviewed all of the employees of the Germany Embassy in Macedonia this year after a Times article reported that Macedonia had informed Germany of Mr. Masri's case within days of his transfer to American custody.

The intelligence service said no one reported knowing anything. But now, with a parliamentary commission preparing to call witnesses in its investigation, one midlevel BND official at the embassy has come forward to say that he was told of Mr. Masri's arrest in early January 2004.

According to the statement, the unidentified BND employee said that while eating in a Macedonian government canteen, someone he did not know told him that a German citizen named el-Masri had been arrested in Skopje, Macedonia's capital, and handed over to the Americans.

Because the matter was unrelated to the BND employee's job, the statement said, he did not do anything. It also said there was a "high possibility" that the employee did not tell anyone else. The BND said the information should have been forwarded to its headquarters in Berlin.

"I asked during my time in Macedonia to talk to someone from the German Embassy, and one of the Macedonians told me, 'But the Germans don't want to talk to you,' " Mr. Masri said on Thursday.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

N.Y. Steamed Over Terror Fund Cutbacks (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE

The AP, June 2, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- From Times Square and the Empire State Building to the Brooklyn Bridge and the Statue of Liberty, New York is a city of spectacular landmarks. Ask any of the 41 million tourists who visited last year.

But according to the Homeland Security Department, New York has no national monuments or icons - a determination that led to a 40 percent cut in anti-terrorism funding.

New Yorkers are seething over the news, and some are demanding the firing of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., charged that the Bush administration had "declared war on New York" with its decision to reduce anti-terrorism funding by $83 million while increases went to cities like Jacksonville, Fla., Louisville, Ky., and Omaha, Neb.

"I'm not begrudging any other city, but why would you cut the No. 1 target in the country by 40 percent?" said King, who demanded an investigation. "How can you possibly justify that?"

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on Thursday said President Bush "should not come back to New York and stand with us" until his administration comes up with more money to keep New York safe.

"This is wrong and unfair, but also outrageous," Schumer said. "The bottom line is this is abandoning New York."

The cutback comes nearly five years after the terrorist attack that killed 2,749 people at the World Trade Center, and a week after a Pakistani immigrant was convicted of conspiring to blow up the subway station at Herald Square, the site of Macy's flagship store, one of the world's most popular shopping destinations.

In Washington, Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman said his agency would review its finding that New York City has no national monuments or icons that would be at risk of terrorist attack.

"We're going to go back and look at it," said Foresman, who said that the decision was made partly on attendance figures. A federal worksheet based on a variety of data was used to determine the "icon" status and the funding.

Chertoff defended the cut on Thursday, while acknowledging that New York City was still at the top of the U.S. threat list. He said the nearly $125 million in grants for New York were in line with the average amounts the city has gotten in the years since Sept. 11. He added that New York has gotten more than $500 million in all, and that is more than twice the total received by the next-highest-risk city, Los Angeles.

"When actual decisions get made it tends to rub people who came out on the short end the wrong way. We are always willing to listen to criticism," he said in a speech at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank.

The local tabloids have savaged Chertoff, with an editorial cartoon in the Daily News comparing him to Benedict Arnold. "Terror? What Terror?" asked a mocking front-page headline in the New York Post. "Shove off, Chertoff!" read page one of the Daily News.

Rep. John Sweeney, R-N.Y., called for Chertoff's resignation. Mayor Michael Bloomberg was less militant, although he questioned what was happening in Washington.

"I don't have to list the Brooklyn Bridge, the United Nations and Rockefeller Center and the Statue of Liberty and Empire State Building and the Stock Exchange," Bloomberg said. "So you really wonder what was going through somebody's mind."

Assorted terror plots targeting the subways and other city landmarks have come to light since the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center. Schemes have mentioned the United Nations, the Holland and Lincoln Tunnels, and the federal building housing local FBI offices.

DOJ_NMG_0031419

NYPD officials said the drastic cut in funding ignored the city's uncomfortable position as the top target for terrorists to strike. The department was depending on the federal money to:

- Finance an $81.5 million proposal to safeguard Lower Manhattan and parts of midtown with a surveillance "ring of steel" modeled after security measures in London's financial district.

- Pay half of the $200 million annual cost of heavily armored patrols - called Operation Atlas - and other current security measures, including protection for the nation's largest mass transit system.

- Provide $38 million for counterterrorism training and equipment, such as biological and radioactive detection devices.

One out-of-towner visiting the Empire State Building on Thursday had no problem with the federal cutbacks.

"At some point, you have to stop pouring in money," said George Kent, 77, of Reno, Nev. "I think the national treasury needs the money."

City Has Itself To Blame For Terror Cuts, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Al Baker And Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The federal agency distributing $711 million in antiterrorism money to cities around the nation found numerous flaws in New York City's application and gave poor grades to many of its proposals.

Its criticism extended to some of the city's most highly publicized counterterrorism measures.

In a report that outlines why it cut back New York City's share of antiterrorism funds by roughly 40 percent, the Department of Homeland Security was so critical of some highly viewed local measures — like Operation Atlas, in which hundreds of extra police officers carry out counterterrorism duties around the city each day — that the Police Department and other city agencies must now seek further federal approval before drawing on the money they were given to pay for those programs.

In a flurry of charges and countercharges, federal officials said yesterday that the city not only did a poor job of articulating its needs in its application, but it also mishandled the application itself, failing to file it electronically as required and instead faxing its request to Washington.

City and state officials insisted that they had made no mistakes. And a state official provided a written acknowledgement from the federal government saying that the city's application for grant money has been "successfully submitted" and said that the city could "log in" any time to view the application.

New York City received $124.5 million from the Department of Homeland Security, about 40 percent less than the $207.5 million it received the year before. Many smaller cities around the country, like Charlotte, N.C., saw their shares increase sharply.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg questioned yesterday whether old-fashioned pork barrel politics was at play in doling out the money in an election year. He was one of several elected officials who moved on different tracks to uncover how the decisions were made, with an eye toward revising that process.

"We tried to do an analysis of some of the moneys and whether or not they were given out for political reasons, and in fact in many of the places where they got money — but arguably there's no threat — there are close elections either at the Senate level or the House level," the mayor said. "Now, whether that was their motive I have no idea."

The White House tried to minimize the effect on New York. The grants will be reconsidered each year and could change if "some grand and unforeseen need arises," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. "The point of homeland security, as I said before, is to provide security for the entire homeland," he said. "And certainly no disrespect meant to New York with $124 million for this coming year."

The report, obtained yesterday, pointed out opposing views held by cities and the federal government over how antiterrorism money should be spent and, as an extension of those views, how terrorism should be fought.

City officials have used federal money to subsidize continuing costs, like paying overtime to officers. The federal government, on the other hand, wants the grants to pay for semipermanent safeguards that can increase security over the long term, like improvements in communications systems, better gas masks and increased training.

The report faulted the city for not adequately explaining why the money being requested could reduce risks.

Though the report said the city was in the top 25 percent of urban areas at risk, it rated the city in the bottom 25 percent in the quality of its application. It rated the Police Department's counterterrorism program and Operation Atlas as below average in sustainability, a criticism of the continuing overtime costs.

Eight of the city's programs including the counterterrorism division and Operation Atlas, as well as some health and training programs — fell in the bottom 15 percent, meaning any federal money used toward them will need to be specifically approved.

Elected city officials were especially stunned that the report said New York had no national monuments or icons. The city's application was evaluated by so-called peer-review panels of five to seven people with varying backgrounds from 47 states and affirmed by government analysts at the Department of Homeland Security.

Angry officials in New York zeroed in on the peer review process yesterday, trying to determine who evaluated the programs and whether their judgments were clouded by a desire to steer security money to their own areas. City officials questioned whether the reviewers had expertise in antiterrorism efforts.

Members of New York's Congressional delegation presented a united front in pledging action to change the allocations. Representative Peter T. King, a Republican and chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said he would hold hearings to investigate the process, while Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, both Democrats, wrote letters to Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, demanding a full explanation.

In Washington, Mayor Anthony A. Williams described the decision to cut his city's allocation by 40 percent as shortsighted.

A spokeswoman, Sharon Gang, said the Homeland Security Department did not give much of a rationale for the cuts and that their proposals rated average or above average on almost all counts.

"It sounds like they made a unilateral, gut decision not based on our application," Ms. Gang said. "And they scored other locations higher."

Officials in New York said the impact of the cash drain would be felt.

"We have a counterterrorism center that would deal with all of the potential scenarios that we have been studying that we have to be prepared for that could be dramatically affected by any cut in funding," said Fire Commissioner Nicholas A. Scoppetta. "It's as though Washington is not going to be convinced of the need until they have another terrible incident in a place like New York or Washington."

Paul J. Browne, a senior aide to Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly and the department's chief spokesman, said: "The N.Y.P.D. will continue to do what it needs to do to keep the city safe," he said. "We'll just be doing it without D.H.S. stepping up to the level expected of it."

He said the department's counterterrorism work had been essential in defending the city since 9/11 "What more evidence do they need?" he said.

Stephen C. King, a lawyer who specializes in emergency-response and domestic security issues at Hunton & Williams in New York, said he could not understand the 40 percent cut to the city. "I'll have to look at it closer," he said, "but I can't wrap my arms around that one."

Though the federal officials said the city did not file properly, the city said state officials filed its package, and a state official said its package of applications was filed electronically on March 2, the deadline.

In an interview, George W. Foresman, under secretary for preparedness as the Department of Homeland Security, applauded some of the security work being done by New York, while raising the question of just what is the proper use of the federal funds.

"Do you pay for what are viewed as basic capabilities; law enforcement, fire, E.M.S., public health, emergency management?" he asked. "Whose role is it to pay for that, versus whose role is it to pay for specialized training and equipment for fire, E.M.S. and law enforcement?"

Mr. Chertoff said yesterday: "There was no suggestion about anything we did that New York is not the No. 1 terror target. But I do think it's fair to ask this question: After a city gets $500 million, more than twice as much as the next-largest city, is it correct to assume they should continue to get the same amount of money year after year after year after year with everybody else dividing up what remains?"

Still, Mr. Schumer called the episode an "absurdity," saying the grading system did not make sense.

"It would be as if you got 800's on your boards and Stanford Law School rejected you because you put the stamp on upside down," he said.

Pork 1, Antiterrorism 0 (NYT)

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

If Al Qaeda is planning on following up its 2001 attacks on New York and Washington with an assault on Nebraska, the Department of Homeland Security's new urban areas security grants are brilliant. But, of course, the White House, Wall Street and densely populated urban areas are the most likely terrorist targets, and these are precisely the places the department dangerously shortchanged this week. The new grants, which slash spending for New York and Washington by 40 percent — and shower money on Omaha and Louisville — are more about pork barrel politics than security. Given how important the stakes are in protecting the nation against terrorism, they are also a disgrace.

Scarce antiterrorism money should be rigorously aimed at the places most at risk of attack, but the Bush administration and Congress have consistently refused to do so. While efforts to protect subway riders in New York City and federal workers in downtown Washington are badly underfinanced, places that would be bizarre targets have been swimming in federal funds. The Northwest Arctic Borough, an Alaskan area of 7,300 people, spent $233,000 a while back to buy decontamination tents, night vision goggles and other equipment.

This week, the Department of Homeland Security has skewed things even further against Americans who live in the places that are most likely to be attacked. New York's share of the urban areas security program falls to $124 million from $207 million last year, and Washington's falls to $46 million from $77 million.

There appear to be serious problems with the department's evaluation process. Rather than having impartial antiterrorism experts make recommendations, it relied on anonymous "peer reviewers" recommended by governors, mayors and local homeland security departments. The panels appear to have been too focused on politics, and not enough on safety. The resistance to financing operating costs, like police overtime, ignores the fact that day-to-day groundwork does the most to combat terrorism.

Some of the specifics of the decision process are downright bizarre. New York City's evaluation found that it had no "national monuments or icons." The department concedes that omitting the Statute of Liberty was an "oversight," but it still seems unaware that to many would-be terrorists, the biggest American icon of all is simply — New York.

The responsibility for the bad allocations lies with President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. But Congress also has a poor record in this area. Representatives of high-population states like New York, California and Texas have continually lost out in their efforts to enact a more risk-based formula. Congressmen from the areas that have been shortchanged this week are vowing to fight. Representative Peter King, a New York Republican who is chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, says he wants New York to be "made whole," either by adjusting the most recent grants or finding money from other budgetary sources.

When President Bush and the Republican Party were looking for a backdrop for their 2004 national convention that symbolized America's war on terror, they came to New York City, not Omaha. Mr. Bush and Mr. Chertoff owe the American people a system that recognizes the vulnerability of places like New York and Washington not just when the television cameras are rolling, but when the money is being handed out.

Flash: DHS Disputes Al-Qaeda's 5-Star Rating Of Two U.S. Cities (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Homeland Security Undersecretary George Foresman was leaving the Chamber of Commerce on H Street yesterday morning when he met one of his subordinates, Tracy Henke, arriving to deliver a speech.

"It's gonna get better," Foresman told Henke, consolingly.

Henke shrugged. "You just roll with it," she said.

Or, more likely, get rolled. Henke, who is in charge of Homeland Security's grant-making, has become a target of ridicule since she announced plans Wednesday to cut counterterrorism money for New York City and the Washington area -- which together have been the targets of 100 percent of al-Qaeda's terrorist attacks on American soil -- by 40 percent each.

Adding insult to this injury, Henke's department judged that the nation's capital is a "low-risk" city and that the Statue of Liberty, Brooklyn Bridge and Empire State Building are not worthy of "national icon" status. By contrast, those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis -- both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri -- received boosts in funds. Other winners: the horses of Louisville, the cattle of Omaha and five cities in Jeb Bush's Florida.

Sounds dubious? Sorry, you can't see the data Henke used. Classified.

To nobody's surprise, the actions at DHS have brought furious condemnations, most notably from Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, who wrote in Thursday's New York Post: "As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City."

Henke seems rattled. Arriving for her speech yesterday to a DHS-backed group called the Citizen Corps, she was a bit out of breath and hurried to the stage, saying "I'm up again." She immediately brought up the controversial grant announcement and appealed to her audience for some love.

"Needless to say, not everybody has nice things to say about me," she said, so "anybody who wants to say something nice, please feel free to do so. You know, it's one of those things where it's occasionally important to have a little bit of that positive affirmation. If nothing else, then I'll have to call my parents, and the reality is they don't give it to me either."

In this time of torment over big-city terrorism funding, Henke opted to recall her small-town upbringing. "People come to Washington and they forget where they came from and they think all knowledge, all information, all good ideas generate in the marble buildings of Washington, D.C.," she argued. "Guess what? Not true. Not true at all. I'm very fortunate, I come from a very small town in Missouri." She said she keeps a sign in her desk that says "Remember where you came from."

Henke has. St. Louis, not far from her hometown of Moscow Mills, gets a 31 percent boost in counterterrorism money under the new formula.

The new DHS plan is advertised as a "risk-based" model, but it came up with almost the opposite conclusions to a Rand Corp. study last year that calculated terrorism risk to 47 cities. Seven of the 10 highest-risk cities in the Rand study will lose funding under the DHS plan; six of the 10 lowest-risk cities in the Rand study will see increases in funds, including such hot spots as Milwaukee and Tampa.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff tried to tamp down the controversy in a speech later at the Brookings Institution, arguing that "it's only a reduction if you choose to look at the highest year of funding" -- which happens to be last year. This explanation didn't satisfy, and Chertoff, barraged by questions on the subject, became petulant, saying that "threatening the secretary is not a way to drive funding decisions," and "there's a little bit of the quality of what-have-you-done-for-me-yesterday about some of the criticism."

Foresman, the undersecretary for preparedness and Henke's boss, avoided the controversy as he spoke to the Citizen Corps yesterday. "We have a moment in time where we've got sustained federal funding to states and communities," he told the group.

Sustained? The urban terrorism funds are to be cut 14 percent overall.

Approached by reporters after his speech, Foresman allowed that the new formula isn't just about a city's risk; he said there's also an "effectiveness" score, rating each city on "how well are they able to articulate the application of resources." Washington and New York were, evidently, not as "articulate" as DHS desired. Never mind that the urban grants were supposed to balance out other counterterrorism programs that, under a formula imposed by Congress, give disproportionate money to such strategic hubs as Vermont, North Dakota and Wyoming.

A reporter asked Foresman how he can be sure the new criteria are valid. "Good question," he allowed.

The lady from Missouri entertained no such uncertainty. "I'm happy to defend it," Henke said before her speech, in which she boasted that "we have accomplished a tremendous amount."

Asked later if she expected the uproar, she replied: "There's no getting around the outburst coming. Risk exists elsewhere in the nation and we have done a much better job at identifying, calculating and analyzing that risk."

And besides, she added, "you have sites in Wyoming that have risks associated with them."

It's true: The bison of Grand Teton have lived in fear of al-Qaeda long enough.

Is D.C. Ready For Terrorist Attack? (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

Two unrelated traffic accidents within an hour of each other yesterday in Northeast shut down two major highways during the busy morning commute, causing massive gridlock and seemingly endless delays -- but also providing an ominous warning: What if it had been a terrorist attack?

The Bush administration has spent $2 billion to protect the city since the September 11 attacks -- assigning law-enforcement personnel, rerouting traffic and erecting barriers -- and countless millions have been disbursed by state and local governments to avoid a gridlock catastrophe in the event of another attack.

But the prospect of being able to get either in or out of the city without being caught in a massive traffic jam remains in doubt in the event of an incident or the evacuation of government buildings.

Even the agencies assigned the task of responding to a terrorist attack could contribute to the problem: A Code Red declaration by the Department of Homeland Security -- meaning that an attack was imminent or had taken place -- could result in an immediate lockdown of public and government facilities and restrictions on public travel.

Under the direction of Homeland Security, emergency personnel and equipment would need to be directed to the area, transportation systems would be "redirected or constrained," and public and government facilities could be closed.

Although the department's definition of Code Red and what protective measures would be required if it were instituted are vague, redirected or constrained means roads, bridges and tunnels could be closed, and airports and train stations could be shut down or limited.

"No plan is perfect and responding to these kinds of situations is a work in progress," said Natalie Jones Best, emergency preparedness and risk manager for the D.C. Department of Transportation. "But we have developed multiple response plans, identified emergency routes and come up with contingency plans to manage traffic in the event of an emergency.

"An incident like the one that occurred this morning, although unfortunate, gives us the opportunity to take a look at those plans and go back and make changes if necessary," Ms. Jones Best said. "It puts us in a position of being able to better manage our resources and strengthen our response."

Homeland Security officials did not return calls yesterday for comment.

Lon Anderson, spokesman for AAA Mid-Atlantic, said the main commuter routes in the Washington area operate at maximum capacity, leaving almost no alternative if one becomes blocked because of an accident.

"Add a major incident that takes away a major commuter route and it doesn't mean that everything slows down. It means that everything stops," Mr. Anderson said.

Gridlock is not uncommon in the D.C. area because of incidents involving national security or other law-enforcement concerns, dating to at least 1998, when an Alexandria man threatened to jump off the Woodrow Wilson Bridge and stopped traffic for more than five hours. D.C. police shot him in the leg with a beanbag bullet and he jumped into the water. The man survived, but the incident backed up Beltway traffic for more than 20 miles.

In March 2003, Dwight Ware Watson, dubbed the "Tractor Man," brought much of Washington to a standstill when he decided to protest tobacco-subsidy cuts by driving a tractor into a Constitution Gardens pond on the Mall. U.S. Park Police cordoned off the area from the Washington Monument to the Lincoln Memorial. The federal government emptied several nearby offices and closed off major traffic arteries. Over the two days of the siege, four consecutive D.C. rush hours saw massive traffic jams.

Major evacuations of federal buildings in the District also have been prompted by suspicious events, forcing an exodus out of the city. In 2005, a pilot's errant flight into restricted D.C. airspace May 11 prompted evacuation of the White House, the U.S. Capitol and the Senate and House office buildings, but also exposed a breakdown in communications between federal agencies and city officials, who did not know about the evacuation because they had disconnected a communications line between the Federal Aviation Administration and the Metropolitan Police Department.

After 24,000 military personnel and civilians who work at the Pentagon were evacuated on September 11, along with much of official Washington, highway gridlock took over in the nation's capital. Police also cleared the Capitol and all House and Senate office buildings, and the drive out of the city took hours.

Ms. Jones Best said she was "caught" in yesterday's traffic jam but managed to find a detour by listening to the radio -- saying the ability of government to get timely information to the public was "key" in being able to manage any crisis situation. She said that safety is "always our top concern" and that law-enforcement personnel and other first responders can determine "hot spots" and divert traffic to other areas.

Randall J. Larsen, director of the Virginia-based Institute for Homeland Security, a nonpartisan, not-for-profit research organization, yesterday questioned the rush by federal, state and local governments to evacuate the city in a terrorist attack. He said that there may not be any reason to leave and that finding "shelter in place" -- a small, interior room with no or few windows -- could be a better option.

"Other than a hurricane, why would you need an evacuation plan?" asked Mr. Larsen, a retired Air Force colonel and originator of the first graduate course on homeland security at the National War College. "If it's a nuclear attack, forget it. A chemical attack, you don't have to go that far. I see no need to have all these evacuation plans."

Mr. Larsen also said federal, state and local governments have to first decide when an evacuation is actually necessary and then be able to coordinate that effort with each other and with hundreds of responding law-enforcement officers. He called it a difficult task, noting that 20 local governments make up the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments alone, along with "a lot" of federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies.

"One of the major problems for the D.C. region and the Department of Homeland Security in general has always been, 'Who's in charge?' " he said. "Just who orders an evacuation, when and why? They are all difficult questions."

Ms. Jones Best said the question of who's in charge depends on where an incident occurs.

"Locals are always the first responders and are in charge until the situation dictates otherwise," she said. "We've held a number of exercises and met the people we need to talk with. A process is in place, and it establishes a clear liaison to FEMA."

Can the Federal Emergency Management Agency do the job in the wake of criticism for its handling of Hurricane Katrina?

"I think FEMA recognizes that it has gaps and is working to improve," she said.

Chertoff: FEMA Is Hurricane-ready (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And Nick Martin

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal disaster agency criticized for bungling last year's response to Hurricane Katrina stands ready for this year's hurricane season with a more experienced leader, a bigger cache of supplies and new high-tech systems to figure out how bad a disaster is and get help there faster, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff says.

At the start of the 2006 hurricane season, which began Thursday, the Federal Emergency Management Agency is “much more prepared than we were last year or any previous year,” says Chertoff, whose department includes FEMA.

But some disaster-response experts, members of Congress and FEMA employees are skeptical. “The proof will be in the pudding,” says James Lee Witt, FEMA chief from 1993 to 2001. “I just hope and pray it won't be such a bad season.”

Leo Bosner, head of the FEMA headquarters employees' union, says many experienced employees have quit since Katrina hit last August. “I'll cross my fingers” that newly hired staff have enough training to respond, Bosner says. “But I really don't know what kind of shape we're in.”

FEMA officials insist the agency is ready for the new season with:

·New Director R. David Paulison. Acting director since Michael Brown resigned Sept. 12, Paulison is a former Miami-Dade fire chief.

·Up to five times as much supplies as last year, from truckloads of water and ice to laptop computers.

·New high-tech systems, such as satellites that can send real-time video to FEMA headquarters to show officials what's happening and GPS tracking for equipment.

In the states that tend to be hit hardest, emergency-response officials say they're cautiously optimistic about FEMA's ability to respond. They're also reminding people that it may be up to 72 hours after a storm before help arrives.

In Charleston County, S.C., emergency preparedness director Cathy Haynes is holding community meetings. One slide in her show puts it bluntly: “Why do you need to be prepared? … Emergency agencies will be OVERWHELMED!”

And Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the top Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, isn't convinced that FEMA's ready. “We still have people who are living in tents,” he says. “There's still suspicion in the Gulf Coast region.”

Army Builders Accept Blame Over Flooding (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

In a sweeping new study of the causes of the disaster in New Orleans last year, the Army Corps of Engineers concludes that the levees it built in the city were an incomplete patchwork of protection, containing flaws in design and construction and not built to handle a storm anywhere near the strength of Hurricane Katrina.

"The hurricane protection system in New Orleans and southeast Louisiana was a system in name only," said the draft of the nine-volume report, released yesterday in New Orleans.

Several outside engineering panels that have been critical of the corps have come to similar conclusions, and have found a more extensive chain of flaws in the design, construction and maintenance of the 350-mile levee system.

But the 6,113-page report is remarkable for being a product of the corps' own official investigation, which brought together 150 experts from government, academia and business to study what went wrong and how to build better systems for the future.

The region's network of levees, floodwalls, pumps and gates lacked any built-in resilience that would have allowed the system to remain standing and provide protection even if water flowed over the tops of levees and floodwalls, the report's investigators found. Flaws in the levee design that allowed breaches in the city's drainage canals were not foreseen, and those floodwalls failed even though the storm waters did not rise above the level that the walls were designed to hold.

But the system was also overwhelmed in significant ways by Hurricane Katrina, and some degree of flooding would have happened even if the floodwalls had not been breached by the surging waters, the report stated.

"Regardless of breaching or no breaching, there would have been massive flooding and losses" from the hurricane, Lewis E. Link, the director of the study and a senior research engineer at the University of Maryland, said in an interview. "The losses were increased because of the breaching that occurred."

The investigators found no evidence of negligence or malfeasance by the corps or its contractors, but said the corps had failed to take into account the tendency of the local soil to sink over time, leaving some sections of levee lower than they should have been. The corps did not re-examine the heights of levees even after it had been warned about the degree of subsidence, the report said.

Similarly, the corps designed the system to protect New Orleans against a relatively low-strength hurricane, the report found, and did not respond to warnings over the years from the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration that a stronger hurricane should have been the standard.

The report suggested the corps has had trouble keeping up with the fast-changing world of geotechnical engineering, and does not share critical information among its many parts. Although the corps had indications that the floodwalls might fail under intense storm conditions, "the pieces were not put together to solve the puzzle," the report said. More must be done, it concluded, to share information among those who do research and those who design and build systems.

The report, which is already being used in the repair and improvement of New Orleans's flood protection, warned that the area "remains vulnerable" to any storm with surge and wave conditions like Hurricane Katrina's.

DOJ_NMG_0031425

The chief engineer of the corps, Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, said in an interview that the report showed that "we missed something in the design," particularly in the construction of the drainage canal floodwalls that caused so much of the flooding.

According to the report, the corps designers did not anticipate the way the floodwalls would fail as water climbed high against them: in several breaches, including the one at the 17th Street Canal, the force of the water pushed the floodwall back slightly, opening a gap deep into the earthen levee below that allowed water to course down under high pressure and push the wall aside.

General Strock did not go so far, however, as to apologize on behalf of the corps for the decades of decisions that went into the system.

"It is what it is," he said. "Call it a mea culpa, or call it a dry recognition, or admission, or whatever — but we're not ducking our accountability and responsibility in this."

Nonetheless, he made it clear that he believed outside influences had played a role in the problems of the flood protection system, though he said that did not absolve the corps. As one example, he cited plans by the corps in the 1970's to put large barriers at the narrow openings between Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico.

The corps backed off from that plan after a court challenge from environmental groups and then proposed floodgates at the city's drainage canals. But local officials of the levee boards and sewerage and water boards blocked that plan, as well. So the corps went with the next fallback plan of building floodwalls in the canals.

"Each time, we backed off," General Strock said. "Each time we did that, we assumed an increment of risk. I don't think anybody looked back and said, 'Risk, risk and risk adds up to unacceptable levels.' "

He said this was not an effort to lay blame at the feet of others, because ultimately the corps had responsibility for what it built.

"At the end of the day, we have to stand by the decisions," he said. If the corps builds floodwalls, he said, those floodwalls have to stand up to the test and the system has offer the intended level of protection. "And we didn't get there," he said.

The corps announced this week that it had substantially met its goal of repairing the city's hurricane protection system by June 1, the beginning of hurricane season, though there was significant work still to be done, including on two of the three enormous gates at the mouths of the city's major drainage canals.

If an unseasonably early hurricane approaches with threats of a storm surge, corps officials say, they will drive sheets of steel across the mouths of the canals and remove the rainwater with portable pumps. That could lead to street flooding, but should prevent the catastrophic breaches that allowed Lake Pontchartrain to pour billions of gallons into the center of the city.

A setback was announced this week as a 400-foot section of levee in Plaquemines Parish, south of New Orleans, shifted as it neared completion. The marshy soil of the area could not support the weight of the earthen levee structure, which slumped and bulged. It is being repaired.

Robert G. Bea, an engineering expert at the University of California, Berkeley, who has been critical of the corps, said he was impressed by the level of criticism in the report.

"This report has got a tone in it that is not like anything we have seen before," Dr. Bea said. "They're coming forward now."

But he said he wished that the corps had admitted other failures and gone further in delving into the internal reasons for those failures. A report by Dr. Bea and colleagues, released last month, said organizational dysfunctions within the corps had created an environment with little responsibility or accountability, and within which safety concerns could be easily played down.

Yesterday's report did not address that question in depth, but General Strock said it would be dealt with in a subsequent study.

Corps: Levees' Design Caused Deadly Failure (USAT)

By Alan Levin

USA Today, June 2, 2006

New Orleans' levees failed during Hurricane Katrina because federal engineers for decades did not anticipate the potential height of storm waters and underestimated the strength required to hold them back, the Army Corps of Engineers concluded Thursday.

“That is a very sobering thing for us,” said Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, the corps chief. “This is the first instance of a failure of a corps design of any significance.”

A well-designed levee system might not have held back the high waves and storm surge that swamped nearly 80% of New Orleans and vast areas nearby, but it would have minimized damage and allowed a swifter recovery, the corps said in a 6,000-page report.

DOJ_NMG_0031426

The design of critical levee walls that failed near Lake Pontchartrain on New Orleans' north side was “marginal,” the report said. Tests conducted by the corps in the 1980s showed that the levees could crumble under pressure from high water — as they did after the storm hit on Aug. 29 — but those findings were not used in the design.

The corps oversees construction of flood controls in the nation's waterways. Katrina damaged 169 miles of the 350-mile levee system that protects the New Orleans area and caused more than 1,570 deaths in Louisiana alone. The corps, Strock said, is “deeply saddened and enormously troubled by the suffering of so many.”

The report, prepared with the help of outside engineers and scientists, offers the most complete account yet of why the levees failed. Some engineers said the report did not go far enough in identifying failures within the corps. A report last month by engineers at the University of California-Berkeley urged that the corps be made more efficient and less vulnerable to political pressure.

“If you cannot fix the organizational problems, the flood control problems will never be fixed,” said Robert Bea, a Berkeley professor who helped prepare last month's analysis.

The corps' report estimated what would have happened if the levees had held. Katrina's storm surge still would have flooded large areas, but the central neighborhoods of New Orleans and nearby St. Bernard Parish would have been flooded only one-third as badly.

This finding underlies the importance of building levees that will not crumble even if water flows over them, said Ed Link, a University of Maryland engineering professor who oversaw the task force that prepared the report.

“You could dramatically reduce the catastrophic losses and flooding,” Link said.

Army Corps Of Engineers Admits Levee Defects Caused Flooding (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — The Army Corps of Engineers acknowledged today that design defects in the levees protecting New Orleans caused the majority of flooding during Hurricane Katrina and that the disaster will almost certainly trigger reforms in how the federal government protects the American public.

The corps said that its 40-year effort to construct a hurricane protection system for the region of southern Louisiana had resulted in a set of piecemeal projects that "was a system in name only," a recognition that a wide range of errors, weak links and incomplete construction was at the heart of the massive damage that occurred on Aug. 29.

The corps released a 7,000-page investigation that is carefully worded and written in the language of government engineers, but delivers a stunning set of findings about errors made in the design of storm walls and earthen levees that failed during Katrina.

The report found that four major breaches of I-walls, a type of concrete storm wall that sits on top of an earthen levee, caused 65% of the flooding in the greater New Orleans area.

Although the report's executive summary never uses the words "design defect," corps officials said they now accept that their work had shortcomings and errors were largely responsible for the disaster.

"We do take accountability," Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, commander and chief engineer of the corps, said at a news conference in a downtown hotel, attended by five Army generals, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast reconstruction and an assistant Army secretary.

The corps, Strock said, "is deeply saddened and enormously troubled" by the finding.

Strock said every section of I-walls will eventually have to be replaced because they proved ineffective during Katrina. The four breaches occurred when storm waters were several feet below the tops of the walls, meaning they had failed well below the maximum forces they had been designed to withstand.

The report also puts in the historical record a formal acknowledgment of the scope of the disaster, which killed 1,293 people.

"The flooding caused a breakdown in New Orleans' social structure, a loss of cultural heritage and dramatically altered the physical, economic, political, social and psychological character of the area," it said. "These impacts are unprecedented in their social consequence and unparalleled in the modern era of the United States."

Although many of the detailed technical findings had been released earlier in preliminary reports by the corps, the report contained a large amount of new information:

· Southern Louisiana is sinking much faster than generally recognized and levees were at substantially lower elevations relative to sea level than they were designed to be. In some cases, levees were 2 feet below their designed elevations. Moreover, the corps deliberately decided not to reexamine the problem, even as other federal agencies were recognizing the problem.

· The city's pumping system, which provides the only way to remove water from a city below sea level, wasn't designed to operate during a major storm and that the impact of the flooding could have been reduced if the city had not lost its ability to pump water after Katrina. Because most of the region's pumps were inundated by the flood, it took 53 days to pump out the city, allowing the floodwaters to saturate and destroy structures.

· 25% of all the housing units in southern Louisiana were destroyed by Katrina. In New Orleans, the proportion is believed to be higher.

Strock said the repaired sections of levees are now the strongest parts of the system. The repairs were supposed to be completed by today, but are behind schedule by about two months. The enormous undertaking required heavy construction work on 169 miles of damaged or destroyed levees.

Although the breaches caused most of the flooding, a significant part of the Katrina damage occurred because the storm was larger than the system was designed to resist.

While wind speeds had dropped sharply by the time the hurricane hit New Orleans, its power over the Gulf of Mexico had created the largest ocean surge to ever hit the North American continent, the report said.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Promises To Disclose Haditha Findings (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

The White House said Thursday that it took nearly a month for President Bush to learn that the military was investigating reports that Marines murdered unarmed civilians in Iraq.

On Tuesday, the White House said Bush was briefed "soon after" the opening of the probe, which was prompted by inquiries about the Nov. 19 incident from Time magazine.

A reporter from the magazine asked U.S. military officials on Feb. 10 about the circumstances surrounding the alleged massacre, in which 24 people in Haditha, an insurgent stronghold in western Iraq, were killed following a bomb attack on a military convoy in which a Marine died. Four days later, on Feb. 14, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, commander of Multinational Corps Iraq, ordered an investigation into the incident, White House press secretary Tony Snow said Thursday.

But, Snow said, Bush was not informed about the existence of the investigation until March 11, when he was briefed by national security adviser Stephen Hadley.

A preliminary report on March 3 recommended additional inquiry. Chiarelli received initial findings from that on March 9 and asked for the further review, which still is ongoing, Snow said. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were informed the next day and Bush the day after, on a Saturday.

Time reported the investigation on March 19.

Bush pledged Thursday that the results of the inquiry will be made public.

"The world will see the full and complete investigation," he said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House. "If there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account."

A senior defense official said last week that military investigators have evidence that points toward unprovoked murders by Marines.

The Iraqi government is conducting its own investigation.

Based on the timeline given by Snow, the U.S. military appears to be conducting four investigations into different aspects of the incident, including into why the American military's initial statement about the incident described it as an ambush on a joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol, with a roadside bombing and subsequent firefight killing 15 civilians, eight insurgents and a Marine. The statement, which said the 15 civilians were killed by the blast, has led some to allege a coverup.

The president said the ethical training ordered for U.S. troops in Iraq came as a result of the Haditha investigation.

"This is just a reminder — for troops in Iraq or throughout our military — that there are high standards expected of them and that there are strong rules of engagement," said Bush, who said he has spoken to Pace about the matter several times.

"At the same time what you're seeing is the Marine Corps reminding our troops about what it means to be a Marine — what it means to uphold the honor of that corps, and what it means to adhere to the rules of engagement that we expect our soldiers to adhere to."

Investigators Of Haditha Shootings Look To Exhume Bodies (WP)

By Josh White And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031428

Criminal investigators are hoping to exhume the bodies of several Iraqi civilians allegedly gunned down by a group of U.S. Marines last year in the city of Haditha, aiming to recover potentially important forensic evidence, according to defense officials familiar with the investigation.

A source close to the inquiry said Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have interviewed families of the dead several times and have visited the homes where the shootings allegedly occurred to collect as much evidence as possible. Exhuming the bodies could help investigators determine the distance at which shots were fired, the caliber of the bullets and the angles of the shots, possibly crucial details in determining how events unfolded and who might have been involved.

The possible evidence was disregarded at first because the slayings originally were not treated as crimes.

NCIS officials said the Nov. 19 incident was not reported to them as a criminal case until nearly four months later -- on March 12 -- and the failure of the Marine Corps to request assistance from investigators sooner could create legal complexities.

The delay already has presented many hurdles for investigators, who have had to rely on dated information, witnesses and suspects who had months to tailor their stories, and a lack of fairly routine forensic evidence that should have been collected at the time the civilians were killed, according to Defense Department officials, defense attorneys and sources close to the criminal probe.

"We are definitely starting with a full count," said one official close to the investigation, who spoke anonymously because he was not authorized to discuss the case. "There's plenty of shoulda, woulda, coulda to go around in this case. We have lots of disadvantages going in, but we will re-create the incident as best we can."

The NCIS is an independent criminal investigative agency that is not in the military chain of command. Its probe has included as many as 50 special agents, forensics investigators and support personnel operating in Iraq and in the United States, the largest homicide investigation of its type since the war in Iraq began in 2003, according to Navy officials.

Ed Buice, a spokesman for the NCIS at the Washington Navy Yard, said yesterday that criminal investigators learned of the Haditha incident on March 12 -- nearly 16 weeks after it occurred -- when the Marine Corps officially requested an investigation. The probe began immediately, and three NCIS agents based in Iraq went to Haditha within 24 hours, Buice said.

"The investigation is labor-intensive, complex and time-consuming," Buice said. "NCIS is committed to following up on any and all tangible leads and evidence."

Buice said the investigation is ongoing and "will remain open until after the findings are adjudicated." While Defense Department officials anticipate potential charges of murder, dereliction of duty and obstruction of justice, the NCIS has not yet reported its findings, and military commanders ultimately will decide what, if any, judicial procedures to initiate.

The NCIS will be looking at the days leading up to the roadside bombing that killed a member of the Kilo Company Marines and allegedly set off an emotion-laced spree of shootings in a series of homes near the explosion. The gruesome death of Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, 20, of El Paso, Tex., occurred shortly before Marines allegedly shot and killed a number of civilians, including women and children.

Now, officials close to the case said, investigators are starting with the men who allegedly were in the houses when shots were fired and working their way out from there.

Sources close to the case said the military is assembling a team of experienced prosecutors for the Haditha shootings case. Defense officials said the Pentagon and the Marine Corps are taking the investigation very seriously.

"I think it's going to be a very difficult case for them to prove," said Vaughan Taylor, a former military prosecutor and instructor in criminal law at the Army's Judge Advocate General's Legal Center and School. On balance, he said, he would rather be a defense counsel in the case than prosecute for the government.

"I think there's plenty of avenues for defense in this case -- the fact that it wasn't initially investigated, the fact that there's been plenty of time for witnesses to play with stories. There's a lot of wiggle room in there."

The gap between the incident and the beginning of the NCIS investigation is going to cause major problems in prosecuting any charges, a Marine officer familiar with the case agreed. "They have huge proof problems," he said, citing the lack of identified bodies.

"The long and the short of it is, until they prove the cause of death," they don't have anything, said one civilian defense lawyer representing a Kilo Company Marine. "Photographs won't be enough to do it. Good luck with that."

Marine spokesmen at the Pentagon and at Marine Corps Forces Central Command have declined to comment, citing the investigation.

A separate investigation has found several failures in the aftermath of the shootings, according to top officials familiar with the probe. These include Marines giving false statements and officers in the chain of command not providing proper oversight in the weeks and months that followed. That probe, by Army Maj. Gen. Eldon A. Bargewell, is expected to be finished this week.

DOJ_NMG_0031429

Yesterday, the military announced that Marines and soldiers stationed in Iraq will undergo core values training to reinforce how troops should act on the battlefield. The move is a sign that commanders and leaders in Washington are concerned about the ramifications of the Haditha shootings in Iraq and at home.

Aine Donovan, director of the Ethics Institute at Dartmouth College and a former Naval Academy professor, said Marines have more ethics training than most troops and that there is no excuse for what happened.

"If you look at what happened in Haditha, you had soldiers stressed to the point of no return, and they snapped," Donovan said. "This will be remembered as the worst episode of this war. This will damage the entire profession. You're never going to restore peace by killing civilians."

President Bush said yesterday that the training "is just a reminder for troops either in Iraq or throughout our military that there are high standards expected of them, and that there are strong rules of engagement."

Bush added that "if there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account," and said the nation has "a willingness to deal with issues like this in an upfront way and an open way and correct problems."

Marine Brass Seem Exonerated (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

U.S. Marine Corps headquarters in Washington did not learn of the killing of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha until early March, a timeline that appears to exonerate the highest ranks of the Marine Corps from any cover-up or failure to act.

The U.S. military command in Baghdad learned of the civilian killings in February and began two investigations: one criminal and one administrative.

The administrative probe by Army Brig. Gen. Eldon Bargewell is focusing on whether any information was covered up along the Marine Corps chain of command. This is because the 2nd Marine Division issued a press release Nov. 20 saying Iraqi civilians had been killed in Haditha the previous day by an improvised explosive device (IED) and in a firefight with insurgents.

Officials now acknowledge that the statement was inaccurate. Evidence shows the civilians were killed deliberately by Marines' gunfire during sweeps after an IED killed one of their battlemates.

One key question is: Did senior Marine Corps officers hear of the accusations and fail to act between the time of the Nov. 19 incident and February, when a Time magazine reporter brought the charges to the attention of the Baghdad command?

A timeline that the Marines provided yesterday to The Washington Times would appear to exonerate Gen. Michael W. Hagee, the Marine Corps commandant, and his staff.

Col. David Lapan, a Marine Corps headquarters spokesman, said the commandant and his staff were apprised in early March by Marine commanders in Iraq. He said Gen. Hagee subsequently received briefings on the criminal probe and then dedicated a tour of Iraq to telling Marines the importance of ethical conduct and the rules of war.

Gen. Hagee yesterday returned from that tour, which began Friday. Col. Lapan said Gen. Bargewell has not interviewed Gen. Hagee.

Col. Lapan, who was in Iraq at the time of the incident as spokesman for the 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force, said the press release was issued by the division in Ramadi, not by MEF headquarters at Camp Fallujah, where he worked. He said such press statements typically are based on combat reports filed by those who conducted and led the missions.

Col. Lapan said he did not hear of the Haditha accusations until after he left Iraq and returned to the United States.

Gen. Bargewell's administrative report is expected to reveal who filed, or knew about, the false report that led to the press release.

The U.S. military in Baghdad yesterday offered its condolences to the families of civilians purportedly killed by Marines, the closest the command has come to admitting that the deaths were unwarranted.

Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the coalition force in Iraq, issued the "heartfelt condolences" as the new Iraqi government said it would conduct its own investigation. Some local politicians want the Marines charged and tried in Iraq.

Gen. Caldwell announced that Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the top tactical commander, has ordered troops to undergo renewed values training over the next 30 days to make sure that all forces understand the rules of war.

"It's to reinforce and sustain training that all the troops of the coalition forces received before they go here," Gen. Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad. "It's values-based. And, obviously, his intent is to make sure that it adheres to legal, moral and ethical standards that every military member should be adhering to on the battlefield."

Marine sources said yesterday that it is not clear when Gen. Bargewell will file his report. It is also not clear when the Naval Criminal Investigative Service will conclude its probe into whether the Marines should be charged with crimes, including murder.

The House and Senate Armed Services committees plan to hold hearings into Haditha once Gen. Bargewell completes his investigation. Plans call for decisions on charging the Marines, who belong to the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment, at Camp

Pendleton, Calif., to fall to Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler. He is the top Marine in U.S. Central Command, which oversees operations in Iraq.

U.N. Fails To Pass On Haditha Reports (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

U.N. FAILED in January to pass on initial reports of Haditha massacre.

An international official blames "disorganization" for lapse by U.N.'s Iraq mission, which should have informed U.S. ambassador of sketchy allegations. White House says Bush didn't hear about November killings until March, a month after press inquiries prompted commanders' investigation.

Iraqi government will also investigate, while U.S. forces get refresher training on battlefield conduct. Fallout may crimp soldiers' ability to act in Ramadi, an insurgent stronghold.

Shaky Iraqi regime couldn't easily stomach a major new U.S. crackdown, an observer notes.

ROBERTS COURT LOOMS as factor in 2006 elections.

Justices prepare to rule on series of controversial issues at close of first session under Bush's new chief justice. Each side hopes that decisions, to be issued at 10 a.m. each Monday this month, will fire up ideological base as Republican and Democratic candidates square off for control of Congress.

Rulings are expected on military trials for Guantanamo detainees, Texas redistricting driven by DeLay, Vermont's campaign-finance laws, and application of Clean Air Act. With O'Connor gone, close cases may turn on maverick Justice Kennedy, who has infuriated conservatives by citing international law and opposing a voter initiative challenging gay rights.

WHITE HOUSE WOOS Europe but tensions remain over human rights.

After turnabout on direct talks with Iran, Bush will seek trans-Atlantic agreement on reining in Tehran's nuclear program at European Union summit in Vienna. But push is strained by divide over Guantanamo; while European nations want detention camp shuttered and Bush has signaled support, U.S. officials say there are no plans to do so.

Bush weighs human-rights digs of his own at Russia's Putin, who has turned increasingly autocratic. The president plans one-day stopover in Ukraine, Russia's adversary. Before July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg, U.S. officials may attend a gathering of democracy advocates organized by chess champion Garry Kasparov.

One wild card: maintaining Western access to Russia's oil and gas fields, which Putin is making more difficult.

PROPONENTS FRET about prospects for civilian nuclear deal with India.

Pact opening up sale of U.S. technology is top Bush priority, and backers say it has majority support in Congress. But opponents could add "poison pill" amendments that might force New Delhi to scotch agreement to separate civilian and military nuclear programs.

Administration still hopes to win approval before the August recess, despite tight legislative calendar. One new asset: next Treasury chief Henry Paulson, who worked India market as Goldman Sachs CEO.

"I wouldn't throw up the white flag," says Stephen Biegun of Ford Motor, a big corporate backer.

DEFECTION: Some neoconservatives who backed Iraq war slam Bush's outreach to Iran, arguing U.S. policy could be held hostage by Chinese and Russians. "Rice has perfected the primacy of short-term solutions regardless of long-term ill," says former Pentagon official Michael Rubin, now at American Enterprise Institute.

DEFLATION: Greenspan's retirement disappoints A-list journalists and politicians in a way unrelated to economic performance. It ends the Fourth of July fireworks party that the erstwhile Federal Reserve chairman and wife Andrea Mitchell threw annually atop Fed building, overlooking Washington Monument.

DECIDED: Bush's statement that new Treasury chief will advise on "broad" range of issues reflected outcome of Paulson's negotiations over his role. Blogger Robert Waldmann cracks that selection of Goldman Sachs executive means White House was "scraping the top of the barrel."

DOUBTS: Executive branch might be unable to implement Senate immigration bill even if Congress enacts it. Bill would require immigration service to handle 12 million illegals according to length of U.S. residence, processing some within 90 days. Current capacity "is not there," says agency director Emilio Gonzalez, noting the government's 4,000 "adjudicators" already have "day jobs" processing seven million legal immigrants yearly.

MINOR MEMOS: Census predicts senior citizens will cast 41% of votes in 2040 presidential election. ... Population of centenarians is expected to increase sevenfold, to 580,605, by then. ... National Archives hosts a June 19 tribute to ex-President Ford, 92.

Troops Will Get "values" Training (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — All 150,000 coalition troops in Iraq will undergo refresher training in "core warrior values" over the next month as top military commanders deal with the fallout from allegations of a Marine massacre last November.

Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli ordered commanders Thursday to show troops in Iraq — more than 130,000 of them Americans — slides that depict professional military values and the importance of disciplined conduct in combat.

As many as 24 Iraqi civilians died in Haditha after a bomb killed a Marine on Nov. 19. The incident has spawned two investigations: one to determine whether the Marines committed crimes and another to see whether there was an attempted coverup. Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman, said the allegations against the Marines prompted the training.

It's important that troops "take time to reflect on the values that separate us from our enemies," said Chiarelli, the No. 2 U.S. general in Iraq.

Also Thursday, President Bush promised to disclose the results of the Haditha investigations. Iraq, meanwhile, launched its own investigations of the deaths, the Associated Press reported. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called the killings "a horrible crime."

The incident at Haditha and the investigations may lead to a wider examination of how U.S. troops are fighting the war in Iraq, said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst at the Brookings Institution.

"Some people in the U.S. military have not been discriminating enough in the use of firepower," O'Hanlon said. "This may be the spark for that debate."

David Segal, a military sociologist at the University of Maryland, said the incident in Haditha will change the way troops are trained. "We're going to spend more time talking about how Iraq is different from the kind of wars we fought in the past," Segal said. "We're dealing with an insurgency, not a conventional war."

In Iraq, Lance Cpl. Justin White, 20, of Lexington Ky., said Marines already receive adequate training. He said they have pre-deployment briefings and read policies every 15 days. Squad leaders also go over rules on escalation of force before every patrol.

"It's put in our heads over and over," White said.

After a Cabinet meeting Thursday, Bush said the allegations against the Marines show "that there are high standards expected of (troops) and that there are strong rules of engagement."

Ey said rules require troops to fight only enemy combatants and to treat civilians humanely.

U.S. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who has called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces, said no training can prepare troops for the stress created by the constant threat of a roadside bomb or attack.

"It's the kind of war that's almost impossible to train for," said Murtha, a 38-year veteran of the Marines who served in combat in Vietnam.

U.S. Troops To Review Ethics While Iraq Investigates Haditha (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, June 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A top U.S. commander in Iraq on Thursday instructed all coalition forces to undergo a special training course in "moral and ethical" values following allegations that U.S. Marines shot dead 24 Iraqi civilians in the western town of Haditha last fall.

The move came as Iraq's new government called for U.S. forces operating in Iraq to be subjected to greater accountability and ordered its own investigation into the events of last Nov. 19, when a group of Marines allegedly went on a shooting rampage after one of their members was killed by a roadside bomb and then purportedly sought to cover up the deaths

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki condemned what he called a "terrible crime in which women and children were eliminated" and vowed to establish procedures to monitor and restrain the behavior of coalition forces in Iraq.

"These forces do not respect the citizens, some of whom are crushed by tanks, others shot," he said at a news conference after heading a meeting of his still incomplete Cabinet. "We must speak with them and fix a definition of the obligations of foreign forces."

Al-Maliki said he would establish a special committee to investigate the Haditha incident and would demand an apology from the United States for the killings, something the U.S. military has consistently refused to do when confronted with instances in which civilians are killed.

The disclosures, first reported by Time magazine in March, have been slow to register with a cynical Iraqi public inured to such allegations by repeated reports of U.S. abuses, some but not all of them founded.

But at a time when al-Maliki's 11-day-old government is struggling to assert his authority over an increasingly lawless country, another scandal involving U.S. forces risks damaging the credibility of his efforts in the eyes of many Iraqis, in the way that the Abu Ghraib disclosures tainted the U.S. image.

In Washington, President Bush reiterated promises that investigation results into the deaths of the civilians would be made public.

"The world will see the full and complete investigation," he said after meeting with his Cabinet at the White House. "If there is wrongdoing, people will be held to account."

The training effort marks the first attempt by the U.S. military to limit the fallout of the brewing scandal and the first implicit acknowledgement that the current training effort may fall short of what is required for American soldiers operating in the Iraqi environment.

In a statement, the military said that multinational force commander, Lt. Gen Peter W. Chiarelli, had instructed all his subordinate commanders to conduct training for their troops in "core warrior values … highlighting the importance of adhering to legal, moral and ethical standards on the battlefield."

The training will include a slide show and training "vignettes" and will focus on three main areas: "professional military values," Iraqi cultural expectations and the impact of actions that are "contrary to professional military values," the statement said. All soldiers will be required to undergo the training in the next 30 days, at sessions to be held in the locations where they are based, U.S. military officials said.

The statement did not mention the Haditha incident and said that the overwhelming majority of the 150,000 or so coalition forces currently based in Iraq "perform their jobs magnificently every day."

However, it added, "Unfortunately, there are a few individuals who sometimes choose the wrong path."

The U.S. military has launched two investigations into the incident, one by the multinational force in Iraq, which will address questions of policy, procedures and training arising out of the incident, U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said at a briefing in Baghdad.

The second is being conducted by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which is focusing on allegations of criminal misconduct. The findings of that investigation will be reported to the commanding general of the Marines for appropriate action, he said.

"This tragic incident is in no way representative of how coalition forces treat Iraqi civilians," he said.

The allegations, if substantiated, are likely to reinforce Iraqi perceptions that U.S. forces regularly and randomly shoot civilians. Though the U.S. military says it routinely investigates all allegations involving American forces, it has consistently refused to release figures concerning the number of civilians killed or injured by U.S. forces, saying that such figures are not kept.

"About three or four, at least" investigations into shooting incidents involving U.S. forces are currently under way, Caldwell said, without giving details.

Most allegations surround incidents at checkpoints in which U.S. forces open fire on civilians who fail to respond to signals to stop or who approach too fast, such as the one earlier this week in which two women, one of them pregnant, were shot dead as they approached a hospital in the northern town of Samarra.

In the United States, military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi man in April near Baghdad, a defense lawyer told The Associated Press on Thursday. The eight men are being held at Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base north of San Diego, said Jeremiah Sullivan III, who represents one of the men.

Caldwell said the military is also re-examining the U.S. rules of engagement in Iraq to find ways to restrict what the U.S. military calls "escalation of force."

"Gen. Chiarelli in the last several months has made a very concerted effort to reduce the possibility of having to move to escalation of force and he's taken some real, deliberate steps and guidance in that respect," he said.

The Haditha incident is different, however, in that the Marines involved appear to have gone into homes and deliberately shot civilians in an act of revenge for the death of a Marine in a roadside bombing. Witness accounts given to reporters have described how the Marines barged into four houses near the site of the explosion, shooting wildly at the families inside.

According to The Washington Post, investigators have subsequently discovered an attempt to cover up the killings by explaining them away as the result of the roadside bomb. Death certificates show that victims the Marines claimed were killed in the explosion were in fact shot, the newspaper said.

DOJ_NMG_0031433

A brief statement by the Marines on Nov. 20 said that a "U.S. Marine and 15 civilians were killed yesterday from the blast of a roadside bomb in Haditha."

An additional eight "gunmen" were killed after they opened fire on the Marines, who returned fire, the statement said.

But according to Time, witnesses say the Marines acted that day as if they were intent on taking revenge.

"You could tell they were enraged," Taher Thabet, a local trainee journalist who first informed Time about the killings, told the magazine. "They did not only kill people, they smashed furniture, tore down wall hangings and when they took prisoners, they treated them very roughly. This was not a precise military operation."

The Indictment Of U.S. Troops Was Inevitable (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

You knew it had to happen. Haditha, an "incident" involving American troops in Iraq, is now part of the erosion of support for the war in Iraq. The Iraq Syndrome has finally arrived. * * *

This past Monday, Memorial Day, a driver down Manhattan's fast West Side Highway would have slowed at 46th Street to allow the crossing of a constant stream of visitors heading to the USS Intrepid, the aircraft-carrier museum on the Hudson River. It was a beautiful day but a hot day to stand on long lines in the open sun. A small squadron of planes flew up the Hudson in the solemn missing-man formation, with one plane trailing. Amid the sunshine, the chairman of the Intrepid museum, Arnold Fisher, said something to the gathered crowd no one could have expected to hear.

Mr. Fisher, whose family runs the Fisher House Foundation for the military, suggested that the men and women at arms were being forgotten. And he apologized to them. "I apologize to you for carrying the burden of this nation's commitment to freedom and liberty alone." Mr. Fisher's bitterness over the troops is a Cassandra cry, a portent. But why now?

Opinion polls put support for the war below 40%. Still, it has become obligatory now as a nod across the political spectrum to the corrosive Vietnam Syndrome, to reassure that one's opposition is only to the war, not to the men fighting it.

Really? How does that work?

Arnold Fisher said the troops were forgotten, but they are very much on the minds of the news cycle just now. This Memorial Day week the news is preoccupied with stories of the Marine squad that allegedly killed civilians at Haditha, a town in Iraq. The narrative of this story has pretty much set in already: It's another My Lai, we all know they did it, the brass covered it up, and prison sentences for homicide are merely a formality.

Haditha is indeed the new Abu Ghraib. What this most importantly means is that any U.S. military action overseas now, no matter its level of justification, can be taken down by the significance assigned to events by the modern machinery of publicity. This explains why the U.S. commanders in Iraq announced yesterday that all soldiers in the next 30 days would take what the headlines are calling "ethics training." Of the some 150,000 U.S.-led troops there, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the U.S. combat commander in Iraq, said "99.9% of them perform their jobs magnificently." Yes, and 99.9% of them, after all they've been through, will deeply resent the clear inference they lack "core values." Is that different than standard "Corps values"?

Stories of apparently malfeasant U.S. troop behavior are arriving daily now. A military truck whose brakes failed from overheating crashed and killed Afghan civilians. Press reports are now fly-specking whether the troops shot over or at the rock-throwing mob of more than 300 that surrounded them. Every one of these troops surely knows the story of Mogadishu. Been there, never again. But there will be investigations of their behavior.

Finally came the even more lurid pregnant-woman shooting. As transmitted around the world by the BBC: "A pregnant Iraqi woman in labor and her cousin were shot dead by U.S. forces as they rushed to a hospital along a closed road, police and relatives say." The BBC's next four sentences neatly sum up the common story line now in play around U.S. troops: The soldiers said the car failed to heed a stop warning in a prohibited area; the driver said he heard no warning; U.S. troops will be "trained in moral and ethical conduct" and this "comes in the wake" of the Haditha allegations.

In El Paso, Texas, the father of Marine Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas, whose death from a roadside bomb is the event said to have precipitated the Marine shootings at Haditha, said simply: "I don't even listen to the news." This may be the widespread reaction as the Haditha story overwhelms all else -- enough, I don't want to hear about it.

And there begins the Iraq Syndrome.

Some elements of the newly ascendant Democratic left may welcome it, but no serious person in American politics should.

The Vietnam Syndrome, a loss of confidence in the efficacy of American military engagement, was mainly a failure of U.S. elites. But it's different this time. This presidency has been steadfast in war. No matter. In a piece this week on the White House's efforts to rally the nation to the idea of defeating terrorism abroad to thwart another attack on the U.S., the AP's Nedra Pickler wrote: "But that hasn't kept the violence and unrest out of the headlines every day." This time the despondency looks to be penetrating the general population. And the issue isn't just body counts; it's more than that.

The missions in Iraq and Afghanistan grew from the moral outrage of September 11. U.S. troops, the best this country has yet produced, went overseas to defend us against repeating that day. Now it isn't just that the war on terror has proven hard; the men and women fighting for us, the magnificent 99%, are being soiled in a repetitive, public way that is unbearable.

The greatest danger at this moment is that the American public will decide it wants to pull back because it has concluded that when the U.S. goes in, it always gets hung out to dry.

Two major military reports will come out soon on the Haditha incident, and no one will gainsay justice if that is required. But the atmosphere around this event is going to get uncontrollably manic, and that will feed the dark, inward-turning sentiments already poisoning the country's mood over issues like the immigration debate.

Good for Democrats? Don't count on it. After this, the public appetite for a Democratic president's "humanitarian" military intervention in a Darfur or East Timor will be close to zero.

One suspects that U.S. troops were party to some awful events in the Pacific and European theaters of World War II, all gone in the mists of history and the enemy's defeat. Not now. Gen. Chiarelli's magnificent "99.9%" notwithstanding, it's the phenomenon of the so-very-public 0.01% -- at Abu Ghraib, on an Afghan street, at Haditha -- that is breaking America's will this time.

Iraqi Accuses U.S. Of 'Daily' Attacks Against Civilians (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 1 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki lashed out at the American military on Thursday, denouncing what he characterized as habitual attacks by troops against Iraqi civilians.

As outrage over reports that American marines killed 24 Iraqis in the town of Haditha last year continued to shake the new government, the country's senior leaders said that they would demand that American officials turn over their investigative files on the killings and that the Iraqi government would conduct its own inquiry.

In his comments, Mr. Maliki said violence against civilians had become a "daily phenomenon" by many troops in the American-led coalition who "do not respect the Iraqi people."

"They crush them with their vehicles and kill them just on suspicion," he said. "This is completely unacceptable." Attacks on civilians will play a role in future decisions on how long to ask American forces to remain in Iraq, the prime minister added.

The denunciation was an unusual declaration for a government that remains desperately dependent on American forces to keep some form of order in the country amid a resilient Sunni Arab insurgency in the west, widespread sectarian violence in Baghdad, and deadly feuding among Shiite militias that increasingly control the south.

It was also a sign of the growing pressure on Mr. Maliki, whose governing coalition includes Sunni Arabs who were enraged by news of the killings in Haditha, a city deep in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province. At the same time, he is being pushed by the Americans to resolve the quarreling within his fragile coalition that has left him unable to fill cabinet posts for the Ministries of Defense and the Interior, the two top security jobs in the country.

Military and Congressional officials have said they believe that an investigation into the deaths of two dozen Iraqis in Haditha on Nov. 19 will show that a group of marines shot and killed civilians without justification or provocation. Survivors in Haditha say the troops shot men, women and children in the head and chest at close range.

For the second day in a row, President Bush spoke directly about the furor surrounding the case. "Obviously, the allegations are very troubling for me and equally troubling for our military, especially the Marine Corps," President Bush said Thursday, in response to a question from a reporter after a meeting of his cabinet. Referring to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, he added, "I've spoken to General Pace about this issue quite a few times."

Investigators are examining the role of senior commanders in the aftermath of the Haditha killings, and trying to determine how high up the chain of command culpability may rest.

Marine officials said Thursday that Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, who was the top Marine Corps commander in Iraq during the Haditha killings, had been set to be promoted to become the service's senior officer in charge of personnel, a three-star position.

General Johnson is widely respected by the Marine Corps' senior leadership, yet officials said it was unlikely that the Pentagon would put him up for promotion until the Haditha investigations were concluded.

The Washington Post reported Thursday that a parallel investigation into whether the killings were covered up has concluded that some officers reported false information and that superiors failed to adequately scrutinize the reports about the two dozen deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0031435

The newspaper said that the inquiry had determined that Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, a squad leader present at Haditha, made a false statement when he reported that a roadside bombing had killed 15 civilians. The inquiry also said that an intelligence unit that later visited the site failed to highlight that civilians had gunshot wounds.

In Baghdad, senior Iraqi officials demanded an apology and explanation about Haditha from the United States and vowed their own inquiry.

"We in the ministers' cabinet condemned this crime and demanded that coalition forces show the reasons behind this massacre," Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zubaie, one of the most powerful Sunni Arabs in the new government, said in an interview.

"As you know, this is not the only massacre, and there are a lot," he said. "The coalition forces must change their behavior. Human blood should be sacred regardless of religion, party and nationality."

Mr. Zubaie, also the acting defense minister, acknowledged that Iraqi officials would probably not be able to force the extradition of any troops suspected of culpability in the Haditha killings. But he said a committee of five ministers, including defense, interior and finance, would investigate the killings with the expectation that American officials would turn over their files. "We do not have the security file because it is in the hands of the coalition forces," he said. "We hope there will not be obstacles ahead."

The crisis over Haditha and other disputed killings in Sunni areas comes just as it appears that military operations may be needed to retake some Sunni areas at risk of falling to the insurgency.

This week American forces ordered 1,500 troops from Kuwait into Anbar Province, a stronghold of the Sunni insurgency, in the latest sign that insurgents and terrorist groups including those led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi control much of the sprawling desert region.

In interviews on Thursday, two senior Republicans — Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Senator John McCain of Arizona, who is next in line to be committee chairman — both said it was too soon to tell whether the episode would undermine support for the war. Still, both expressed concern.

Senator Warner, who has promised to hold hearings as soon as the military completes its investigation, said he had been urging Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to wrap up the inquiry as swiftly as possible.

"In the interim, frankly, the public opinion on this matter is being influenced by misinformation, leaks and undocumented and uncorroborated facts," he said.

Mr. McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam for more than five years, said the incident harked back to the My Lai massacre during the war in Vietnam. He added, "It certainly is harmful, but I can't assess the extent of the damage."

Neither he nor Mr. McCain would say whether Mr. Rumsfeld should be called as a witness.

"I think it depends on what we find out," Mr. McCain said. "I can't say until we really know what happened. There are allegations, and I emphasize allegations, that there was a cover-up. If so, then obviously more senior people would have to be the subject of hearings."

On Wednesday, American troops near the restive city of Samarra shot and killed two Iraqi women, including one who might have been pregnant and on her way to a hospital, after their car did not heed what the American military command said were repeated warnings to stop.

At a news conference in Baghdad, a senior American military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, said that "about three or four, at least," allegations of wrongdoing by American troops were being investigated and that anyone found guilty of offenses in those incidents or in the Haditha case would be punished. "This tragic incident is in no way representative of how coalition forces treat Iraqi civilians," he said.

In Baghdad, the top American ground commander in Iraq ordered that all 150,000 American and allied troops in the country receive mandatory refresher training on "legal, moral and ethical standards on the battlefield."

In a statement, the officer, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, did not specifically cite the civilian deaths in Haditha as the reason for the unusual order.

But he said commanders would be provided with training materials and sample vignettes to use to instruct on professional military values and conduct in combat, as well as Iraqi cultural sensitivities.

Baghdad To Investigate Haditha Killings (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann In Baghdad

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Iraq's new government on Thursday launched an investigation into the alleged killing of up to 24 civilians in the town of Haditha by US marines last year.

DOJ_NMG_0031436

The Pentagon has already launched its own inquiry, but the government probe will also look into other allegations of misconduct by the US-led forces in Iraq and at the way troops behave toward the civilian population after they have come under attack.

The inquiry comes as prime minister Nuri al-Maliki attempts to assert his government's authority over security issues in the country. On Wednesday he announced a state of emergency in the southern city of Basra.

On Friday he signalled his concern over the events in Haditha, a town in a predominantly Sunni Muslim area north-west of Baghdad, saying: "We cannot forgive violations of the dignity of the Iraqi people."

In the wake of the Haditha incident, the US generals in charge of the multinational forces in Iraq (MNFI) yesterday ordered all troops to review their training on core ethical and moral values for the battlefield. The spokesman for the MNFI, Maj Gen Bill Caldwell, said in Baghdad that all personnel would look again at training that they had already received before coming to Iraq.

The Iraqi government investigation will be carried out jointly by the ministries of justice and human rights along with security officials, said one of the prime minister's advisers.

He said a mechanism should be devised for American and Iraqi troops' response in case they come under attack.

The Haditha incident happened in November last year after an American convoy was ambushed near the town in the Anbar region and one marine was killed. After the attack, marines allegedly went on a rampage, going into houses and killing unarmed civilians, including women and babies. There are also allegations that the events were subsequently covered up.

The MNFI spokesman defended the record of the US-led troops in Iraq, saying that "99.9 per cent of all men and women" in the forces adhere to the highest standards and any violations will be punished. He said that apart from Haditha, there were several investigations taking place into alleged misconduct, but did not specify them.

Maj Gen Caldwell praised the new government's firm stance and said that he had noticed a "shift" in the last two weeks, with the Iraqi army and security forces taking "greater control".

Al-Maliki Vows To Fill Defense, Interior Posts (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced yesterday he would fill vacancies at the crucial defense and interior ministries over the weekend, despite failing to reach an agreement on candidates with Iraq's fractious ethnic and sectarian parties.

The appointments, which must be approved by parliament, are the keystone of Mr. al-Maliki's plan to take complete control of security around Iraq from U.S.-led forces within the next 18 months.

In violence yesterday, a mortar barrage struck a number of houses in Baghdad's southern Dora district. A first barrage of seven mortar rounds killed nine and wounded 40, while another five rounds killed four and wounded 29. Mortar attacks are usually carried out by insurgent groups.

Earlier, a bomb struck a group of construction workers seeking jobs in central Baghdad, killing at least two and wounding 18, police said.

Mr. al-Maliki apparently decided to go ahead with the appointment of ministers for defense, interior and national security -- a lesser post -- to end two weeks of uncertainty. The two key posts were temporarily being held by Mr. al-Maliki and one of his deputy prime ministers since the Cabinet was sworn in on May 20.

Mr. al-Maliki said disagreements among the political blocs proved insurmountable so he decided to "present the names that we believe in to parliament to let it ... decide the issue, because total agreement by all the blocs is almost impossible."

Leaving a Cabinet meeting, the Shi'ite prime minister said "the names of the interior and defense ministers will be announced at parliament's next session" on Sunday, ending protracted negotiations with Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

He did not divulge the names of the candidates, who must be approved by an overwhelming majority in the 275-member parliament.

Mr. al-Maliki reportedly has three candidates for each of the posts, just in case parliament rejects his first choice. The candidates come from a pool that has been discussed at length by negotiators in recent weeks.

The posts, especially defense and interior, are considered an integral part of Mr. al-Maliki's plan to take control of security over Iraq's 18 provinces from U.S.-led forces. The transfer is key to an overall American exit strategy that would allow the eventual withdrawal of its 130,000 troops.

It has been agreed that the defense ministry post will go to a Sunni Arab. But some candidates were rejected by Shi'ites who claimed they had ties to the former regime of Saddam Hussein, or by Kurds who said they were connected to a campaign against their community.

The interior ministry post will go to a Shi'ite. But Sunni Arabs complained that many Shi'ite candidates had ties to militias.

A U.S. military spokesman, meanwhile, said American forces are "very concerned" about the situation in Ramadi in the volatile Anbar province because al Qaeda in Iraq is taking advantage of sectarian differences to make inroads in the city.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell confirmed that about 1,500 combat troops have been moved from a reserve force in Kuwait into Anbar province, which surrounds Ramadi, to help authorities establish order.

New 'Iraq Massacre' Tape Emerges (BBC)

BBC News, June 2, 2006

New footage The BBC has uncovered new video evidence that US forces may have been responsible for the deliberate killing of 11 innocent Iraqi civilians.

The video appears to challenge the US military's account of events that took place in the town of Ishaqi in March.

The US said at the time four people died during a military operation, but Iraqi police claimed that US troops had deliberately shot the 11 people.

A spokesman for US forces in Iraq told the BBC an inquiry was under way.

The new evidence comes in the wake of the alleged massacre in Haditha, where US marines are suspected of killing up to 24 Iraqi civilians in November 2005 and covering up the deaths.

The incident is being investigated by the Pentagon.

The US military has announced that coalition troops in Iraq are to have ethical training following the furore surrounding the alleged killings.

For the next 30 days, they would receive lessons in "core warrior values", a military statement said.

The news of ethical training for US-led troops is likely to be greeted with cynicism by many Iraqis, the BBC's Ian Pannell in Baghdad says, as the troops have long been accused of deliberately targeting civilians.

Cross-checked

The video pictures obtained by the BBC appear to contradict the US account of the events in Ishaqi, about 100km (60 miles) north of Baghdad, on 15 March 2006.

The US authorities said they were involved in a firefight after a tip-off that an al-Qaeda supporter was visiting the house.

According to the Americans, the building collapsed under heavy fire killing four people - a suspect, two women and a child.

But a report filed by Iraqi police accused US troops of rounding up and deliberately shooting 11 people in the house, including five children and four women, before blowing up the building.

The video tape obtained by the BBC shows a number of dead adults and children at the site with what our world affairs editor John Simpson says were clearly gunshot wounds.

The pictures came from a hardline Sunni group opposed to coalition forces.

It has been cross-checked with other images taken at the time of events and is believed to be genuine, the BBC's Ian Pannell in Baghdad says.

Marines To Face Charges In Iraqi's Death (AP)

By Seth Hettena

AP, June 1, 2006

Military prosecutors plan to file murder, kidnapping and conspiracy charges against seven Marines and a Navy corpsman in the shooting death of an Iraqi civilian in April, a defense lawyer said Thursday.

The eight men are being held in the brig at Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base north of San Diego, said Jeremiah Sullivan III, who represents one of the men.

The men served in Iraq with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, and are members of the battalion's Kilo Company. The highest-ranking serviceman is a staff sergeant.

Sullivan said he learned from Marine Corps attorneys that the charges have been drafted and official charging documents could be given to the men as early as Friday.

The Iraqi man was killed west of Baghdad on April 26. His death was unrelated to the shootings of as many as two dozen civilians in the western Iraqi city of Haditha. The Pentagon is investigating troops from the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment in that case.

The Marine Corps and Pentagon spokesmen have refused to comment on any aspect of the Iraqi man's death since an investigation was announced May 24.

However, a Pentagon official said Thursday that charges are expected to be brought "very soon." The official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss charges before they are filed, could not confirm the specific counts.

Sullivan said the eight men are being held in solitary confinement.

"There's concern about the publicity of Haditha having a detrimental impact on the case," he said. "My concern is that the whole politics of this. There's an assumption that these guys are guilty before there's been an opportunity for a thorough, impartial investigation."

Murder Charges Likely For Marines In Iraq Death (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The Marine Corps will file criminal charges, including some murder counts, against several enlisted Marines and a Navy corpsman in the fatal shooting of an Iraqi civilian in April, officials close to the investigation said Thursday.

The Marines and the corpsman were brought back to Camp Pendleton in recent weeks as the Naval Criminal Investigative Service looked into the April 26 shooting of a man in Hamandiya.

The troops, with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, may also have attempted a cover-up by planting evidence near the body to suggest that the man was an armed insurgent digging a hole to plant a roadside bomb.

The decision to file charges comes amid two investigations of allegations in a separate case that Marines killed at least 24 Iraqi civilians, including women and children, Nov. 19 in Haditha, west of Baghdad.

An administrative investigation headed by a two-star Army general has concluded in the Haditha case that the Marines killed the civilians without provocation, some execution- style, and then lied to cover up their conduct. A separate investigation of the incident could lead to criminal charges, including murder and dereliction of duty counts.

Murder charges in the Hamandiya case would be the first brought against Marines based at Camp Pendleton in the death of an Iraqi.

Commenting on the case this week on ABC television, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a retired Marine colonel and decorated Vietnam veteran, said that "some Marines pulled somebody out of a house, put them next to an [improvised explosive device], fired some [AK-47s] so they'd have cartridges there. And then tried to cover that up."

Besides the murder counts, the charges are expected to include conspiracy. Under the military system, the charges will go to a proceeding called an Article 32, akin to a preliminary hearing.

A hearing officer will then recommend to the commanding general whether the case should go to a court-martial. The commanding general can reject the recommendation.

When the Hamandiya charges will be filed is unclear. A spokesman at Camp Pendleton would say only that "the investigation is still ongoing and no charges have been preferred."

The officials who spoke about the case asked for anonymity because they had not been authorized to speak publicly.

More than a dozen Marines are in the brig or restricted to the base as part of the Hamandiya investigation, although only eight are expected to be charged.

Keeping Marines who are under investigation in the brig is unusual, suggesting that the Corps is concerned the suspects may try to flee. Marines involved in the Haditha case are at Camp Pendleton but are not in the brig.

Marine brass have been briefing key members of Congress on the investigations in the Haditha and Hamandiya incidents.

Both involve Camp Pendleton Marines, but those in Haditha were with the 3rd Battalion, 1st Regiment, 1st Marine Division. The battalion was on its third deployment to Iraq when the killings occurred.

Although no Marines have been charged with murdering an Iraqi, a major and a sergeant were convicted in 2004 of lesser charges stemming from the June 2003 death of an Iraqi prisoner at a detention camp near Nasiriya. The prisoner was reputed to have ties to Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and was suspected of complicity in the ambush of a U.S. convoy.

The major was convicted of maltreatment of prisoners and dereliction of duty; the sergeant was convicted of assault and dereliction. Neither was sentenced to the brig.

Army personnel in Iraq have been embroiled in similar investigations, some involving murder charges, but none of the cases has received as much notoriety as Haditha. One reason may be the presence of incriminating photos and videos of the Haditha victims, taken by Iraqis and Marines. Also, that case appears to involve at least a low-level cover-up.

One of the main objects of the administrative Army investigation is to determine whether the cover-up extends beyond the Marines on the scene to high-ranking officers who knew, or should have known, that the troops' original report that the Iraqis were killed in crossfire or by an insurgent bomb was false.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael Hagee went to Iraq last week to lecture troops on the need to follow the Geneva Convention and other rules of warfare concerning noncombatants.

Hagee praised the "99.9%" of Marines who follow their training not to fire on civilians. He plans similar visits to Camp Pendleton and other stateside bases.

DOJ_NMG_0031439

The Haditha investigation focused on a dozen Marines.

Three or four are considered to have fired the fatal shots and may be charged with murder. A similar number may have failed to stop the shootings or helped file a false report to superiors. The others may have been too far away to be involved, officials familiar with the inquiry said.

Three officers with the Haditha battalion were relieved of duty in April by Maj. Gen. Richard Natonski, commanding general of the 1st Marine Division. Natonski said only that he had "lost confidence" in their leadership.

Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, the battalion commander of the three-five, and Capt. Luke McConnell, commander of Kilo Company, are being scrutinized under the military doctrine of "command responsibility," in which a commander can be held accountable for the actions of subordinates even if he knew nothing about those actions.

Capt. James Kimber, commander of India Company, was relieved because of disputes unrelated to Haditha, according to his attorney and officials close to the investigation. Kimber and his family are reacting angrily to his name being mentioned in connection with the killings.

"He was caught up in this, and he was thrown in [by the commanding general] because they needed another head," said Kimber's father, Richard, of Gaithersburg, Md. "This has ruined his Marine career, and it's very unfair."

Although the Haditha and Hamandiya incidents appear to involve similar accusations, the cases have been treated differently.

Only after Time magazine began investigating the Haditha case in January and February did the Marine Corps back off from its assertion that the Iraqis had been killed in crossfire or by an insurgent bomb.

But in the Hamandiya case, an investigation was begun more promptly. Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, the top Marine in Iraq, took the unusual step last month of issuing a statement that "sufficient information existed to recommend a criminal investigation."

Marine brass are worried that the incidents could harm the Corps' reputation and further erode public support for the U.S. mission in Iraq. With that in mind, the Marine Corps has promised to make the Army's administrative investigation of the Haditha killings public as soon as possible.

"This is bad," said one senior officer. "We've got to keep it from being worse."

In another allegation of misconduct by U.S. forces, the BBC on Thursday aired videotape that it said supported the Iraqi version of disputed killings near the city of Balad in March.

The U.S. account says troops seeking a suspected insurgent attacked a house, killing the man as well as two women and a child who were inside.

But Iraqi witnesses, including police officers, told The Times the day of the incident that troops had entered the house, hog-tied 11 residents and shot them through the head.

The BBC did not air most of the videotape, saying the images were too grisly to be shown.

U.S. officials told the BBC that the incident was under investigation.

Army Dog Handler Convicted Of Abuse (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

FORT MEADE, Md. -- A military jury yesterday convicted an Army dog handler of abusing an Abu Ghraib detainee in a trial that produced evidence of high-level pressure and ground-level confusion regarding interrogations at the prison in Iraq.

Sgt. Santos A. Cardona is the 11th soldier convicted of crimes stemming from the abuse of detainees at the prison in late 2003 and early 2004.

Sgt. Cardona, 32, of Fullerton, Calif., was convicted of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault for unlawfully threatening a detainee with his dog.

But the panel of four officers and three enlisted soldiers acquitted Sgt. Cardona of some of the most serious charges he faced, including unlawfully having his dog bite a detainee and conspiring with another dog handler to frighten detainees into soiling themselves.

He faces maximum imprisonment of 31/2 years.

Sgt. Cardona, a 121/2-year veteran, stood at attention in his green dress uniform as the verdict was read in court.

He was convicted of allowing his dog to bark within inches of the face of detainee Kamel Miza'l Nayil in December 2003.

Prosecutors had portrayed Sgt. Cardona as part of a small group of corrupt soldiers who enjoyed tormenting prisoners -- even competing with another dog handler to frighten detainees into soiling themselves.

"This is all for their amusement," Maj. Christopher Graveline said Tuesday in his closing argument.

DOJ_NMG_0031440

Sgt. Cardona's civilian defense attorney, Harvey J. Volzer, said the military policeman had done what his training and senior officers demanded: Protect fellow soldiers and scare detainees.

Sgt. Cardona released his dog to bite detainee Mohammed Bollendia after Mr. Bollendia ran at and struck another military policeman, Cpl. Charles A. Graner Jr., witnesses for both sides testified.

The prosecution said the MPs provoked the attack and could easily have restrained Mr. Bollendia.

Mr. Volzer said Sgt. Cardona's dog, Duco, barked at prisoners because he was supposed to.

None of the offenses was said to have occurred during interrogations.

However, Sgt. Cardona's defense team focused on interrogation policies -- in particular, the changes in rules and command that followed Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller's visit to Abu Ghraib in late August and early September 2003, when Gen. Miller was commander of the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Gen. Miller wrote in a subsequent report that the military police who guarded detainees at Abu Ghraib should become "actively engaged in setting the conditions" for interrogations.

Marines humiliated

The Marine Corps is livid over the mistreatment of three Marines at the hands of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in Philadelphia last month.

According to a Marine Corps memo we obtained, three Marines were "humiliated" by TSA security guards while escorting the body of Marine Sgt. Lea R. Mills, 21, who was killed April 28 along with two others in Al Anbar province, Iraq, by an improvised explosive device.

Sgt. Mills' body was being moved from Dover Air Force Base through Philadelphia International Airport en route to her final resting place in Gulfport, Miss., on May 3. The three Marines who were accompanying the casket, Sgt. John C. Stock, Cpl. Aaron J. Bigalk and Cpl. Jason A. Schadeburg, were forced to remove their dress blue uniforms, belts and shoes, which were then scanned. They were then "patted down" by TSA inspectors.

One of the Marines had his shoes taken away for scanning, but they were never returned and he was forced to retrieve them.

"All the Marines said they felt humiliated by this treatment," the report said. "The Marines had orders in hand that tasked them to serve as official casualty escorts. Sgt. Stock was carrying Sgt. Mills' personal effects and Cpl. Schadeburg was carrying the flag from Sgt. Mills' casket. These items were in hand in plain view."

One Marine called the TSA "morons" for mistreating the casualty escorts, and said, "This is enough to make one's blood boil."

A TSA spokesman said the three Marines did not know the right procedures for escorting a fallen soldier, and could have avoided the search by passing through an official screening area. The TSA officers did not know the Marines were escorting a fallen comrade, and the agency "regrets" the miscommunication, the spokesman said.

Armitage on Iraq

Former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage is adding his voice to critics of Pentagon civilian and military war planners who said there were not enough troops to produce a successful outcome in Operation Iraqi Freedom.

"I think there were some clear misjudgments, including the number of troops that would be required to secure the peace after combat," Mr. Armitage told the Georgetown Journal of International Affairs.

Asked what was most surprising about the Iraq war, Mr. Armitage stated: "The most surprising thing is that we failed yet again to realize a basic historical lesson: Only a soldier with a bayonet can take and hold ground. Only a soldier with a bayonet can bend an enemy to our will."

The failure to understand that was the United States' "biggest mistake," and the biggest lesson to be learned, he said.

"Clearly we had enough troops to win a great victory, a speedy victory and a very humane victory," Mr. Armitage said. "We didn't have enough troops to secure the peace. That is self-evident."

Beijing lobbying

The Chinese Embassy continues to lobby Congress with impunity on the issue of Taiwan. The latest effort was a recent letter to members of the House Armed Services Committee aimed at China-related provisions of the fiscal 2007 defense authorization bill.

Chinese Ambassador Zhou Wenzhong warned that provisions increasing military ties between the Pentagon and Taiwan and improving Taiwan's defenses against a Chinese attack "will do serious harm to China-U.S. relations" if enacted into law. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0031441

Zhou said the new provisions would create a military alliance between the United States and Taiwan and violate diplomatic communiques governing U.S.-China ties.

He also warned that the bill's provisions on selling submarines to Taiwan are boosting Taiwan's forces for independence and are going in a "dangerous direction."

The letter asked the congressmen to "use your important influence" to block the pro-Taiwan provisions.

The letter has angered several lawmakers who view it as foreign government interference in the congressional legislative process.

The main lobbying firm representing the embassy is Jones Day, which is registered with the Justice Department as a foreign agent for China.

The Chinese government has stepped up its lobbying of Congress in the past several years, yet similar activities by Taiwan have been viewed in the past as illegal influence activities and have prompted FBI investigations.

Militia madness

Iraq's hodgepodge of Shi'ite militias is becoming just as troublesome as the Sunni insurgents who regularly attack American forces and assassinate Iraqi government leaders.

A Pentagon report sent to Congress this week blames Shi'ite militias, especially the one controlled by firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, for kidnappings, death squads and kangaroo courts. In the south, they also are infiltrating local police forces to exercise control.

More troubling, Iran is supporting the private armies by, among other favors, providing weapons, says the Pentagon's "Measuring Stability and Security in Iraq" report, "reinforcing Sunni fears of Iranian domination and further elevating ethno-sectarian violence."

The Shi'ite militias not only attack rival Sunni Muslims, they also attack coalition troops. "Because of Iranian-sponsored training and technological support, these operations are among the most lethal and effective conducted against coalition forces."

Meanwhile, violence is going up, not down, as American troops enter their fourth year in Iraq. The number of weekly attacks averaged more than 600 between February and May, compared with 450 during roughly the same period last year.

"Reasons for the high level of attacks may include terrorist and insurgent attempts to exploit a perceived inability of the Iraqi government to constitute itself effectively, the rise of ethno-sectarian attacks follow the Golden Mosque bombing and enemy efforts to derail the political process leading to a new government," the Pentagon report said.

Pacific defense

The Air Force sent a message to troops this week explaining the redeployment of forces in the Pacific. The message left no gray area on what the mission is of U.S. Forces, Japan, as 8,000 Marines move from Okinawa to Guam. The shift puts more emphasis on air power to deter aggression.

"Should deterrence fail," the message states, "USFJ conducts and supports combat operations in the region to defend Japan."

Insurgency Out, Anarchy In (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

President Bush has told us that the question of whether to withdraw from Iraq is one that his successor will have to deal with — not him. I don't think so. Mr. Bush is not going to have that luxury of passing Iraq along. You see, the insurgency in Iraq is in its "last throes" — just like Dick Cheney said. Unfortunately, it's being replaced by anarchy in many neighborhoods — not democracy. And I don't believe the American people will put up with two and half more years of babysitting anarchy instead of midwifing democracy.

The report that U.S. marines were involved in a massacre of Iraqis in Haditha — which the Pentagon needs to clarify fast — is a tragic reminder that a foreign occupation by U.S. forces can't go on for years. Most U.S. soldiers in Iraq have done heroic work, but occupations that drag on inevitably lead to Hadithas.

Right now we are paying for all the Bush team's missteps in Iraq: allowing looting after the fall of Baghdad, disbanding the Iraqi Army without an alternative security force or enough U.S. troops in place, fostering a culture of torture at Abu Ghraib and then letting the politics in Iraq drift for months without any outcome.

All of this created a security vacuum that has allowed a rogue's gallery of sectarian militias, death squads, gangs and Al Qaeda operatives to mushroom in Basra, Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle. The end result: while the mainstream Iraqi Sunnis have now joined the government, in a major way, this has not brought more stability. Because between the sectarian militias now murdering each other's civilians, tit for tat, and Al Qaeda just blowing up Iraqi civilians randomly, the new government can't get going. Too many Iraqis are paralyzed by fear.

Indeed, there has been a subtle but important change in the violence in Iraq. The main enemy in many places is no longer the Sunni insurgency. It is anarchy. Mini-wars of all against all. As the BBC reported Wednesday from Basra: Prime Minister Nuri Maliki "has declared a monthlong state of emergency in Basra, which has been plagued by sectarian clashes, anarchy and factional rivalry." That's what happens in a security vacuum.

Once this kind of militia madness takes root, it's very hard to uproot. U.S. troops can't do it, because it would require searching homes, neighborhood by neighborhood. Only a cohesive Iraqi national army could do that. And that can only be the product of a real national unity government, in which all parties feel they have a fair share of the pie and are committed to investing in an Iraqi army — not their own militia.

And such a national unity government can only be the product of Iraq's leaders deciding whether they love their kids more than they hate each other. That is the most important question Iraqis must answer. It can't be avoided any longer. That being the case, it is time for America to starting talking "deadlines." Too many Iraqi factions think they can just keep wrestling each other for small advantage while the country burns, but the U.S. Army provides a floor of security that prevents total chaos. The Iraqi parties need to know that we are not going to be played this way forever. Only an Iraq that can come together and make a fist can crush this militia culture.

Salvaging Iraq is still hugely important — for itself and for the region, which is facing two big trends. One is a population explosion, producing millions of young people looking for work. And the other is a huge explosion of windfall oil profits. Today, many autocratic Arab regimes are using these oil profits just to buy off their population explosions — in the form of government jobs and subsidized food and fuel — not to educate and empower their youth for the 21st century. But when the price of oil falls, and it will eventually, and these populations continue to rise, we will see destabilizing social explosions throughout the Arab world. It would be very helpful to have a different model in place in Iraq before that happens.

But the hour is late and the enemy is unique. We are not losing Iraq to the Iraqi Vietcong — traditional nationalists. Iraq has a freely elected nationalist government. No, we are losing in Iraq to sectarian theocrats, Islamo-fascists and local and regional tyrants, who have only one thing in common: the belief that America and its Iraqi allies must fail, that neither modernity nor democracy must be allowed to take root in Iraq.

It will be a global tragedy if they succeed, but it is hard to fight an enemy whose only concern is that you lose, not what happens after. It is impossible, though, without Iraqi leaders who can make a fist. We can't keep asking Americans to sacrifice their children for people who hate each other more than they love their own children.

Delegation Divided On Progress In Iraq (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

Members of a congressional delegation to Iraq will return home from the Middle East this weekend with differing opinions about progress in the region.

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican and one of several lawmakers touring the region, predicted yesterday that within a year, the United States and its partners will transition to providing more logistical support and medical assistance, allowing some troops to return home.

"As Iraqis lead, the U.S. role will be reduced. Iraqis are going to have to use their hands rather than rely on the hands of Americans to do things," Mr. Allen said on a call from Kuwait City.

If trends continue, the troop presence in Iraq will be "purely minimal" within five years, he said.

By contrast, Rep. James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, said he was "highly disappointed and quite frankly shocked" at the lack of success of reconstruction efforts and domestic peacekeeping.

"You don't have good success in community building unless you involve the indigenous people in the effort," he said. "They have to feel ownership, and with that comes a certain amount of pride and propriety -- important ingredients if you are going to try to do something that is sustaining."

He noted corruption within the Iraqi police force and the lack of electricity for many citizens but said he was impressed by the effectiveness and efficiency of the military effort.

"Next year this time, I don't think we can get the military out of there," Mr. Clyburn said.

The troubled areas, he said, "are having success now, but we're talking about 14 provinces ... [most] not anywhere near where they need to be."

The lawmakers agreed that Kurdistan is enjoying prosperity. Mr. Allen described the region as a "boomtown," with new hotels and homes under construction.

Also on the trip were House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and Republican Reps. Rodney Frelinghuysen of New Jersey and Sam Graves of Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0031443

Mr. Hoyer said it was crucial for lawmakers to see the events on the ground in Iraq to help Congress determine "the right policies moving forward."

Mr. Allen, who has been mentioned as a presidential candidate in 2008, first faces a re-election challenge this fall.

Democrats Harris Miller and Jim Webb will meet in a primary match June 13. Statewide polls favor Mr. Allen by double digits but show he is more vulnerable than he was last year because of sinking Republican ratings and an aggressive campaign from both Democrats hoping to topple him.

When asked whether his hawkish stance would affect his race when support for the war is slipping in Virginia, Mr. Allen praised the troops and replied: "The troops don't care about political sniping or grandstanding. Those who take the big picture rather than the partisan political picture realize this is history being made."

Iraq Veteran Sues Moore Over 9/11 Film (WP/AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 1, 2006

BOSTON -- A veteran who lost both arms in the war in Iraq is suing filmmaker Michael Moore for $85 million, alleging that Moore used snippets of a television interview without his permission to falsely portray him as anti-war in "Fahrenheit 9/11."

Sgt. Peter Damon, a National Guardsman from Middleborough, is asking for damages because of "loss of reputation, emotional distress, embarrassment, and personal humiliation," according to the lawsuit filed in Suffolk Superior Court last week.

Damon, 33, claims that Moore never asked for his consent to use a clip from an interview Damon did with NBC's "Nightly News."

He lost his arms when a tire on a Black Hawk helicopter exploded while he and another reservist were servicing the aircraft on the ground. Another reservist was killed in the explosion.

In his interview with NBC, Damon was asked about a new painkiller the military was using on wounded veterans. He claims in his lawsuit that the way Moore used the film clip in "Fahrenheit 9/11" _ Moore's scathing 2004 documentary criticizing the Bush administration and the war in Iraq _ makes him appear to "voice a complaint about the war effort" when he was actually complaining about "the excruciating type of pain" that comes with the injury he suffered.

In the movie, Damon is shown lying on a gurney, with his wounds bandaged. He says he feels likes he's "being crushed in a vise."

"But they (the painkillers) do a lot to help it," he says. "And they take a lot of the edge off of it."

Damon is shown shortly after U.S. Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., is speaking about the Bush administration and says, "You know, they say they're not leaving any veterans behind, but they're leaving all kinds of veterans behind."

Damon contends that Moore's positioning of the clip just after the congressman's comments makes him appear as if he feels like he was "left behind" by the Bush administration and the military.

In his lawsuit, Damon says he "agrees with and supports the President and the United States' war effort, and he was not left behind."

He said that, while at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center recovering from his wounds, he had surgery and physical therapy, learned to use prosthetics and live independently. He also said that Homes For Our Troops, a not-for-profit group, built him a house with handicapped accessibility.

"The work creates a substantially fictionalized and falsified implication as a wounded serviceman who was left behind when Plaintiff was not left behind but supported, financially and emotionally, by the active assistance of the President, the United States and his family, friends, acquaintances and community," Damon says in his lawsuit.

Moore did not immediately return calls seeking comment Wednesday. A message was left for Moore at a personal number in New York and with HarperCollins, publisher of Moore's 2002 book, "Stupid White Men...And Other Sorry Excuses for the State of the Nation!"

A spokesman for Miramax Film Corp., also named as a defendant, did not immediately return a call.

Damon did not immediately respond to a request for an interview.

"It's upsetting to him because he's lived his life supportive of his government, he's been a patriot, he's been a soldier, and he's now being portrayed in a movie that is the antithesis of all of that," Damon's lawyer, Dennis Lynch, said.

Damon is seeking $75 million in damages for emotional distress and loss of reputation. His wife is suing for an additional $10 million in damages because of the mental distress caused to her husband, Lynch said.

War Protest Intensifies, But Navy Ship Sails On Time (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031444

SEATTLE, June 1 — After nearly a week of protests intended to delay a large Navy cargo ship from sailing to the war in Iraq, the vessel sailed out of Olympia on time Wednesday, port officials said. But the protests, which were raucous at times, could portend a summer of escalating tensions in the port.

The police said 20 protesters, most from Evergreen State College here, were arrested earlier in the week on misdemeanor charges of attempted trespass and were then released. Two others were charged with a separate offense stemming from a clash with the police.

About 70 police officers in riot gear were deployed at the port, where the Pomeroy, a 950-foot cargo ship, was being loaded with material from nearby Army units bound for Iraq.

In the past week, the ship was greeted by 150 to 200 protesters who shouted at crew members and soldiers, and staged a so-called die-in to protest the war.

At one point, the police used pepper spray to move back a group that had breached a gate, sheriff's deputies said. The deputies also said a stone and two plastic bottles were thrown at officers.

The protests, based at the college, have been going on for about two years, organizers said. But this week signaled a change in tactics.

Dan Kimball, chief criminal deputy for the Thurston County Sheriff's Department, said Thursday, "The people who've been protesting have been mostly peaceful and quiet, but it definitely changed this week into some more aggressive civil disobedience."

A protest leader, Larry Mosqueda, said the demonstrations were intended to call attention to the "illegal and immoral" war in Iraq and the role of the port, which is publicly owned.

"If you raise the stakes, the costs of the war go higher," said Mr. Mosqueda, a professor of political economy at Evergreen State.

Port officials said they had "overwhelming support" from the public in allowing the Navy to use the harbor. The protests had no effect on port operations, they said.

Afghan Leader Condemns U.S. Gunfire After Crash (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, June 2, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — Afghan President Hamid Karzai denounced U.S. soldiers on Thursday for having fired their weapons to escape a mob in Kabul. A member of his Cabinet, meanwhile, said the Afghan government has launched its own investigation into how a traffic crash Monday spiraled into the worst violence in the capital since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

“The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that,” Karzai said in a radio address to the nation in Pashto, his native language. However, he left unclear whether he was accusing the American soldiers of firing into the crowd.

Karzai spoke a day after Afghanistan's parliament passed a non-binding resolution that called for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann said in an interview broadcast Thursday by National Public Radio that U.S. troops here couldn't be punished under local law. “But should the investigation reveal some wrongdoing, I'm sure the military would follow up on its own,” he said.

Karzai's government, backed by a 23,000-strong U.S.-led coalition and 9,000 NATO troops, already is fighting an intensifying Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern Afghanistan.

Kabul, however, has been relatively free of violence.

Monday's violence appears to have been unrelated to the Taliban rebellion. It started when a U.S. military truck careened downhill into a crowded intersection on the outskirts of downtown Kabul. The truck hit as many as 12 vehicles and killed five people.

The U.S. military said the truck's brakes had gone out. But bystanders reacted with fury to what many here saw as a deliberate act of aggression by U.S. soldiers.

“It's an accident if it involves one car, but not when it involves several cars,” Kabul bookseller Mohammed Daoud, 36, said Thursday.

As hundreds of Afghans rushed at the stalled American convoy, U.S. troops opened fire — but only over the heads of the crowd, according to the U.S. military.

After the convoy fled, rioters trashed the offices of the U.S. aid group CARE and looted shops for hours. U.S. military spokesman Col. Tom Collins said Wednesday he had been informed by the Afghan Ministry of Health that the toll from the unrest had risen to 20 dead and more than 160 wounded

By Thursday, Kabul's streets had mostly returned to their typical chaos: moneychangers shuffling thick decks of afghanis, the local currency; teenage boys peddling cellphone cards; merchants pushing carts filled with mangos.

One thing had changed: Hundreds of Afghan soldiers, police and plainclothes security personnel patrolled the streets and bazaars, overseeing the activity in an obvious show of force.

Karzai's government is trying to figure out what prompted the violent outburst after the crash.

“An investigation is going on to find out why a traffic accident became the cause of a violent demonstration,” Masauda Jalal, a women's rights official and member of Karzai's Cabinet, said Thursday. She said the government knows the “U.S. military would not deliberately hurt Afghan civilians,” but “the public's awareness is lower.”

“There was some anti-American element,” Neumann told NPR. “But actually, from my own observation, it was less focused anti-American than I think is being portrayed. ”

A common theory is that the crowd's spontaneous protest “was hijacked by criminals and armed men,” said Nader Naderi, spokesman for the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission.

Many here worry that the speed with which anarchy engulfed Kabul on Monday exposed the government's weakness. “Karzai has no power,” said driver Malik Jan, 46. “His police couldn't stop the demonstrations.”

Karzai Condemns Gunfire By U.S. Troops (AP)

By Edward Harris

AP, June 1, 2006

President Hamid Karzai on Thursday condemned the use of gunfire by U.S. troops to suppress Afghans angered by a traffic accident involving a military truck that sparked the worst riots in the capital since the fall of the Taliban.

Speaking in his native Pashto language, Karzai used phrases that left open whether the U.S. troops had fired into a crowd that had gathered at the scene of Monday's accident, or only over their heads. But he was strongly critical.

"The coalition opened fire, and we strongly condemn that," Karzai said in a national radio address. "I have to say, all the time we tell them to be careful because we have one joint aim, which is the struggle against terrorism."

A U.S. military spokeswoman had no immediate comment on Karzai's brief address, which is likely to cause some friction between his U.S.-backed government and Washington amid growing disenchantment among Afghans over America's powerful presence in the country.

Afghan authorities and the U.S. military are investigating the crash in which a U.S. truck that the military says suffered brake failure rammed into cars at an intersection, killing up to five people.

Investigators are also looking at whether U.S. troops fired on Afghans angered by the accident, which sparked citywide rioting, the worst since the 2001 ouster of the Taliban. Hundreds rampaged through Kabul, shouting "Death to America!" In all, about 20 people died, mostly from gunshot wounds, Afghan authorities said.

AP Television News video from Monday shows the mounted machine gun of a U.S. Humvee firing over the heads of Afghans shortly after the accident. Many Afghans at the scene and some officials say the U.S. troops also fired into the crowd. The U.S. military has only confirmed that its soldiers used their weapons in self-defense.

On Thursday, a top judge said foreigners could be tried for crimes committed in Afghanistan, after lawmakers passed a nonbinding resolution calling for local prosecution of U.S. troops responsible for the crash.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann, however, said that American troops in Afghanistan couldn't be punished under local law.

"But should the investigation reveal some wrongdoing, I'm sure the military would follow up on its own," he told National Public Radio in an interview broadcast Thursday.

He said the U.S. military hadn't signed any pact with Afghanistan that would allow local prosecutors to try U.S. forces in an Afghan court.

"I don't want to turn lawyer without being absolutely sure of my grounds, but you really can't fight a war that way," he said.

The deputy chief justice of Afghanistan's Supreme Court, Abdul Malik Kamawi, said his interpretation of the law is that foreigners who commit a crime in the country are subject to trial there.

The lawmakers' motion can't compel the judiciary to pursue any charges against U.S. troops, and no senior Afghan executive official has indicated they want to.

There also is outrage in Afghanistan over civilian deaths caused by coalition military action against Taliban guerrillas. The latest incident occurred last week, when a U.S. airstrike killed at least 16 civilians in a southern village. A rights group said as many as 34 civilians died.

Neumann said it didn't add up to rising hatred against Americans — or a push to get U.S troops to leave Afghanistan.

"I do not see any groundswell of anti-Americanism or any desire that we leave," he told NPR.

Where Does Karzai Go From Here? (CSM)

By Rachel Morarjee

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Mustafa surveys the broken shelves and shattered glass of his jewelry shop in Kabul, and breathes a sigh of relief when he sees soldiers from the Afghan National Army on the streets.

"Bringing the Army out is the only decent thing [President] Karzai has done in four years. Now the soldiers are here, the police can't steal and hassle people and we feel safe," he says, as a crowd of shopkeepers nod in agreement.

Their shops were at the heart of the worst street violence to hit the Afghan capital since 2001, after a US military traffic accident triggered a riot that engulfed the city leaving 14 dead and over 100 injured.

Haji Mohammed Akram, a shop owner who watched police flee their posts as guards from the Kabul bank opposite his shop fired on armed looters, says he can feel his hopes of peace ebbing. "If this is what happens when we have a traffic accident, can you imagine how quickly the city would fall if the enemy attacked?" he asks.

Four days later the streets are quiet, but confidence in President Hamid Karzai's government is at an all-time low. Residents and observers say that the government needs to restore credibility by reforming the Afghan police and insisting on better conduct for foreign troops.

"Clearly the government was totally unable to respond to the crisis. If this is the state of our police force then we are in serious trouble," says a Western diplomat, noting the violence unmasked weaknesses within the government. As the riots raged on Monday, Interior Ministry officials in charge of the police took their phones off the hook, while Karzai failed to make a public statement on TV until the riots - lasting some eight hours - had run their course.

"It was a wake-up call.... It underlined how badly things have gone and how we are nowhere near where we need to be," the diplomat adds.

After electing a Parliament and a president, Afghanistan has been hailed as a success story and frequently compared favorably with Iraq, where security is much worse. However, some of the initial accomplishments here are being overshadowed. Militias run riot, the police force barely functions, and most Afghans have seen little change in their lives, making it easier for a resurgent Taliban to recruit.

To halt the downward slide Karzai must look squarely at the reasons which fueled the riots, diplomats and businessmen say.

"The situation is not of his own making, but Karzai is locked in a palace and surrounded by people who tell him everything is hunky-dory. He needs to reach out," says Daud Sultanzoi, an MP for Ghazni Province where the Taliban insurgency has worsened. Palace officials could not be reached.

At the root of the problem is a corrupt, badly paid, and poorly organized police force with low morale. The force is chronically undersupplied, in some places lacking the basics of vehicles and weapons to do more than limited foot patrols. The Taliban often overrun poorly defended police stations in the south, sapping morale. Some police terrorize the general populace - and they are the only face of the government most Afghans see on a daily basis.

Monday's rioting in the capital demonstrated that for many police, concerns for personal safety and sympathy for those in the streets weighed more heavily than their duty to protect property and life. "The police took off their uniforms and joined the looters, so I am worried about the future," says Qasim, a security guard from Badakhshan who works in Kabul.

Lack of nonlethal weapons made crowd-control difficult.

"Why were the police so weak, why didn't they respond? We need special guns, water cannon, rubber bullets. There was no way to deal with unrest in the city," says Shukria Barekzai a legislator in Kabul.

Lack of jobs and a growing despair about the future further fueled the riot. Five years after the fall of the Taliban many parts of Kabul still have no sanitation, intermittent electricity, and open sewers running beside streets clogged with Land cruisers packed with foreigners and the new narco-elite. Reconstruction has come to Afghanistan - including schools, roads, and plans for pipelines - but many residents say it's too little and too slow.

Lastly, resentment against the foreign military presence is growing. US and NATO convoys drive around aggressively, frequently pushing Afghans off the road in their haste to reach destinations safely.

A week before the Kabul crash some 30 civilians had been killed by a US airstrike near Kandahar. Karzai paid a rare visit to the injured survivors and summoned the commander of coalition forces to a meeting over the incident. Such moves can deflect some of the anger - temporarily.

"This wasn't the first accident the Americans had and it won't be the last. They came to bring peace, but if they keep killing Afghans we will riot again," says a shopkeeper at the crash site in northern Kabul who asked not to be identified.

Ambassador Predicts Taliban Ferocity (WT)

By Jason Motlagh

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The Taliban will wage its fiercest campaign of attacks in the coming months in an attempt to hamper the transfer of security duties in Afghanistan from the U.S. military to NATO, Kabul's ambassador in Washington says.

"During the upcoming months, the Taliban will resort to the utmost violence to prevent reconstruction and discourage NATO countries from further deployment," Said Jawad told The Washington Times.

More than 300 people have been killed and thousands displaced in the past two weeks as Taliban insurgents, with the help of al Qaeda allies, stepped up the frequency and sophistication of attacks for a summer fighting season.

Mr. Jawad estimates that 20 to 25 heavily armed militias are operating in five southern provinces with 3,000 to 5,000 men bent on testing the resolve of Western forces.

A continued "spike in terrorist activity" is likely, "especially where NATO troops are scheduled to be deployed," he said.

The swell of Taliban activity coincides with a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from militant strongholds in the south, where NATO forces have begun assuming security operations.

The multinational force, led by Britain and Canada, will boost troop strength to about 21,000 from 9,000 by July, while the United States plans to draw down its 23,000-strong presence by 6,500.

Afghans living in distant provinces where infrastructure and economic opportunities have been slow to improve have "some concerns at the local level about the commitment and capability of NATO," Mr. Jawad said. "They will have to see that NATO is as committed as the United States."

The Bush administration and military commanders are confident the situation will improve.

Half of the 141 American servicemen killed in action in Afghanistan since the 2001 invasion died last year.

"We are winning, but the war is not yet won," Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, head of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said at a Pentagon press briefing last month.

He said the Taliban resurgence in the southern provinces is primarily a result of the fledgling Afghan government's inability to combat them, not a testament to the movement's strength.

The Taliban also has been emboldened by more advanced weaponry and greater mobility within the country and across the porous border to terrorist safe havens in Pakistan, Mr. Jawad said. "This is something even the government of Pakistan does not dispute."

Pakistan-based foreign militants with links to al Qaeda and experience in Iraq have been offering large bounties to Afghans to kill U.S. soldiers and have encouraged the wider use of suicide bombings and kidnappings, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported recently.

Mr. Jawad said the Taliban relies on "intimidation tactics" such as hiding in villages, burning down schools and medical clinics, and killing moderate tribal leaders and clergy to create a climate of fear.

He said it was critical that the international community help reinforce the capacity of the cash-strapped Afghan government to deliver services "so the presence of the state will be felt in areas experiencing attacks."

Don't Undercut The Afghan Army (WP)

By Vance Serchuk

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Four years ago this spring the United States began building an Afghan National Army, which has since emerged as arguably the least ambiguous success story of the postwar reconstruction here. While military power in Afghanistan was once synonymous with partisan, warlord-run militias, the new army is a multiethnic, battle-hardened and increasingly professional force -- tangible proof of how nation-building can work in even the unlikeliest of places.

Unfortunately, this accomplishment is under threat, not just from a resurgent Taliban but from the Bush administration itself, which is keen to trim its contributions to the Afghan army. Against Kabul's objections, the U.S. military hopes to cut the planned end-strength of the Afghan defense sector by more than 25 percent; rather than building the 70,000-man force previously agreed upon, the goal is now 50,000.

The Pentagon defends this downsizing with rhetoric about "sustainability." As one of the world's poorest countries, Afghanistan needs an army it can afford, commanders here argue, and a 70,000-man force is simply too expensive.

The problem with this is that Afghanistan has struggled throughout its history to generate the resources needed for its security, and the Pentagon's proposed cuts do little to resolve this. In fact, the U.S. military's own number crunchers predict the Afghans won't be able to pay for even a 50,000-man force until 2063. And that's under a best-case scenario -- assuming robust, unbroken economic growth for the next 50 years, and that the equipment we are buying the Afghans today doesn't wear out in the interim. (The World Bank's less rosy estimates put affordability somewhere in the early 26th century!)

But if talk about affordability is rooted in futuristic fantasy, the U.S. military's emphasis on it has a host of pernicious, real-world consequences in the here and now. For starters, it infuriates our allies in Kabul, who argue, rightly, that 70,000 is already a minuscule force given the size of their country and the manpower-intensive nature of counterinsurgency.

U.S. military commanders here acknowledge that a smaller army will mean that Kabul must accept a higher degree of "risk," but they defend their approach, citing current intelligence about the size of the Taliban and other potential threats.

But this intelligence assumes that Afghanistan's security situation is relatively static; it fails to take into account the probability of strategic surprise. With Pakistan to the south, Iran to the west, and Russia and China in Central Asia, who can say with any confidence what Afghanistan's neighborhood will look like in four or five years? Even inside the country, U.S. predictions about the insurgency have boomeranged over the past 18 months, from confident predictions of an imminent Taliban collapse to confident predictions of a long, hard slog.

What makes the Pentagon's approach all the more shortsighted is the genuine desire of many Afghans -- this week's rioting notwithstanding -- for a strong, long-term alliance with Washington. To the extent the Pentagon goes cheap on the Afghan army now, it will not only alienate our friends but also constrain their ability to stand with us in the future. Kabul's solidarity in a confrontation with Tehran, for example, will be affected by whether it has enough troops to defend its western border with Iran and at the same time hold the line against the Taliban in the south. A smaller army will make this much harder.

Given how little sense it makes, what is driving the Pentagon's new fixation on affordability? Part of the explanation lies with a shift in authority over the United States' Afghan policy. A year ago, the power was squarely in Kabul, in the hands of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Lt. Gen. David Barno, who were both committed to a strategic partnership.

With their departure, authority has now shifted to the U.S. Central Command and the Pentagon, which have decidedly different priorities. Asked about the guidance they receive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on building the Afghan army, officers here often cite the same three questions: Why is it taking so long, why do you need so many people, and when can we leave?

It's hard to imagine a worse trifecta. Rather than viewing the Afghan army as a short-term, stopgap expenditure that should go away over time, the Bush administration needs to start treating military assistance to Kabul as a guaranteed, stable commitment -- much like U.S. aid to front-line states during the Cold War.

At some point, one hopes, Afghanistan will be able to shoulder more of its own defense costs. For now, though, the emphasis shouldn't be on the army Afghanistan can afford but on the one it needs: a force that can defeat the Taliban and become a long-term partner in the war on terrorism.

SUV Imperialism (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

WHEN A U.S. MILITARY TRUCK plowed into a dozen civilian vehicles near Kabul on Monday, killing at least five people, the response was in-theroad rage: fierce rioting in Afghanistan's capital that left up to 20 dead and scores wounded. On Thursday, Afghan President Hamid Karzai condemned the U.S. military for using gunfire to quell the rioters. An investigation is underway to determine whether U.S. troops fired into or over the crowd.

Most Afghans want foreign help, but they do not want to become "collateral damage" of foreign occupiers — whether from the United States, the United Nations or even relief agencies. As Washington struggles with how best to support Karzai, the U.S. and NATO need to redouble their efforts to defeat the resurgent Taliban while also protecting the civilian population. And to do that, they must improve living standards — ultimately the only way to end 25 years of bloodshed, violence and chaos in Afghanistan.

Anti-Americanism was by no means the only cause of the Kabul rioting. It may have been instigated or encouraged by Karzai's political opponents from the Northern Alliance, whose remaining militias were told three weeks ago that they had to disband by Tuesday, or by Taliban sympathizers. There also is an inevitable gap between Afghans' expectations of help from the international community and the lagging relief effort. Angry, poor and unemployed Afghans need someone to blame.

But the deeper problem is that Afghanistan, like Iraq, cannot be rebuilt cheaply or quickly while an insurgency rages. The Taliban appears to be targeting aid and reconstruction workers; on Tuesday, terrorists on motorcycles attacked and killed four humanitarian workers driving in northern Afghanistan, which has generally been calmer than the Taliban strongholds along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Crushing the insurgency won't be easy. The international community must immediately focus on building roads and providing electricity to blacked-out Kabul, whose economy cannot grow without transportation and power. Arab and Persian Gulf states, flush with oil wealth, have made meager pledges to Afghanistan. They should give the $90 million that will be needed for diesel fuel to keep Kabul electrified for the next two years while transmission lines are being built to bring power from Central Asia.

The U.S. and NATO also will have to invest the military resources to crush the Taliban decisively — and insist that Pakistan do the same. Without security, aid and reconstruction cannot proceed in rural areas. President Pervez Musharraf's pleadings notwithstanding, Pakistan isn't doing all it can to stop Taliban infiltration across the Afghanistan border.

Finally, the United States must begin to treat Afghanistan as a sovereign state whose citizens' lives have to be protected. A start would be for Washington to sign a "status of forces agreement" to govern the behavior of U.S. military forces there. Lessons in driving and crowd control wouldn't hurt, either.

Justice Awards CSC $42 Million Litigation Case Management Contract (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department has awarded Computer Sciences Corp., a contract worth $42 million to build the department's new Litigation Case Management System (LCMS), which will give the various litigating divisions greater data sharing capabilities.

The system will include a centralized application and database with unique interfaces for various divisions of the agency. The interfaces will allow employees in the Antitrust, Civil Rights, Criminal, Environmental and Natural Resources and Tax divisions, as well as the 94 U.S. Attorney offices, to access data unique to the respective agencies.

At the same time, LCMS will be a single repository where Justice executives can access all litigation case management information and reporting. It will also improve the quality of data used for reporting to Congress, the Office of Management and Budget and other agencies, according to a department announcement.

Justice said the award utilized the National Institutes of Health, Chief Information Officers Solutions and Partners 2 contract, a governmentwide procurement vehicle that provides federal agencies with a streamlined method to acquire information technology services and solutions.

Justice plans to phase in the LCMS program by 2010. The first phase will assess the needs of attorney supervisors and Justice executives to manage caseloads and performances. This phase, to be completed during fiscal 2007 and 2008, will create a common access solution for the U.S. Attorneys' Offices, and includes data exchanges with external systems such as Sentinel, the Victim Notification System and the Consolidated Debt Collection System,

The remaining six litigating divisions will complete LCMS between fiscal 2008 and 2010.

Justice said the LCMS program is an important investment under the OMB Case Management Line of Business program. In support of the line of business program objectives, the LCMS program developed a target architecture and infrastructure for sharing case-related information within and among Justice components and partner agencies. The goal is to capture information once and make it available to all authorized users, according to the statement.

Justice Taps CSC For Bellwether Case Management System (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department this morning unveiled a new $42 million contract with Computer Sciences Corp. for the Litigation Case Management System, a standardized environment intended to improve management of legal resources and allow attorneys to share and manage trial information.

Justice now has dozens of litigation case management systems because each of the department's U.S. Attorney's offices nationwide has had the autonomy to tailor systems to its own needs. In addition, the department's six divisions that send platoons of trial attorneys into courtrooms have developed separate case management systems.

The Justice system forms an important part of the Office of Management and Budget's Case Management System Line of Business.

That line of business also includes the FBI's failed Virtual Case File and its successor, the fledgling Sentinel project. OMB also has directed Justice, leader of the case management line of business project, eventually to develop an administrative case management system.

LCMS is intended to serve as a template for other litigation case management systems used by attorneys across the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0031450

"The Department's Antitrust, Criminal, Civil Rights, Civil, Environment and Natural Resources, and Tax divisions, as well as the U.S. Attorney's offices, will use the LCMS to facilitate the transfer of information through the use of common solutions and data standards," Justice said in a statement.

Justice used the National Institutes of Health, Chief Information Officers Solutions and Partners 2 contract, a governmentwide procurement vehicle that provides federal agencies with a streamlined method for buying IT goods and services. The department valued the award at $42 million.

"I expect LCMS to provide a valuable service to the department's seven litigating divisions," said Justice CIO Vance Hitch in a statement. "LCMS will allow the department to reduce operational costs and act more like a unified law firm by effectively and appropriately sharing information between the litigating divisions and with the department's executive leadership."

LCMS will use a centralized but flexible application and database, with unique user interfaces for each of the litigating divisions to accommodate their respective needs, Justice said.

LCMS' architecture is designed allow Justice officials to have a single repository for all litigation case management information and reporting, the department said.

LCMS also is intended to improve the quality of the data the department reports to Congress, OMB and other partner agencies, Justice said.

The department said it plans a phased and incremental approach for reaching its long-term litigation case management goals.

The project's first phase will mainly serve the needs of attorney managers and senior leaders to manage attorneys' caseloads and performance, Justice said.

Under this phase, Justice expects to adopt a common LCMS for the 94 U.S. Attorney's Offices during the 2007 and 2008 fiscal years. The first phase includes data exchanges with external systems such as Sentinel as well as Justice's own Victim Notification and Consolidated Debt Collection systems.

Justice plans to roll out LCMS to its six other litigating divisions between 2008 and 2010.

LCMS is contributing to the development of the National Information Exchange Model to assist in the development of a true standard for information sharing across federal agencies, Justice said.

Justice and the Homeland Security Department established NIEM to develop the data and exchange standards for information sharing across federal, state and local law enforcement and homeland security agencies.

The LCMS target architecture and infrastructure is intended to help capture case-related information once and then promote effective data sharing within and between Justice's divisions as well with as partner agencies and other authorized users, the department said.

An Executive Steering Committee jointly led by Hitch and the acting deputy director of the Executive Office of the U.S. Attorneys, Steve Parent, is overseeing LCMS. The committee also includes members from each of the department's litigating divisions, Justice said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Regulators Drop Civil Case Against Frank Quattrone (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Wall Street regulators dropped civil charges against Frank Quattrone, giving the former investment-banking star his third win in three months in cases that arose from the Internet-stock bubble of 1999-2000.

He still faces a possible retrial on criminal obstruction-of-justice charges.

The National Association of Securities Dealers this week withdrew "spinning" charges first brought in March 2003 that Mr. Quattrone improperly used the lure of sought-after initial public offerings to win financing business as head of technology banking at the then-named Credit Suisse First Boston securities unit of Credit Suisse Group, now simply Credit Suisse. The NASD also dropped stock-research bias charges.

In a statement, Mr. Quattrone said he had "complied with the rules and regulations" throughout his 23-year career in banking and was "pleased that justice has been done." The NASD asked to withdraw the charges because many potential witnesses weren't any longer under its jurisdiction as registered securities-industry employees, and thus couldn't be compelled to testify. Quattrone lawyer Kenneth Hausman also argued witnesses' memories might be impaired because the case was based on events that occurred between 1998 and 2001, five to eight years ago.

The NASD's case had been deferred pending the outcome of criminal obstruction charges against Mr. Quattrone in 2003. Those charges were based on his endorsing a colleague's email in 2000 urging his group members to "clean up" files in accordance with company policy during investigations of how the firm allocated hot IPOs. Mr. Quattrone denied any intent to obstruct the probes.

But the regulatory actions began toppling March 20, when a federal appeals court overturned the banker's May 2004 obstruction conviction, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors at his second trial, returning the case to prosecutors for a possible third trial. Although prosecutors and defense lawyers have since conferred, no retrial decision has been announced.

Four days later, Mr. Quattrone won his second victory when the Securities and Exchange Commission overturned an NASD order barring him for life from the securities industry for failing to provide some requested testimony in the civil "spinning" case. The SEC said the NASD should have considered his argument that he had the right to avoid self-incrimination in the criminal obstruction case.

The NASD's appetite for aggressive enforcement action may have been tempered by another high-profile defeat the agency suffered in March, some regulatory experts said. An NASD spokeswoman declined to comment. On March 3, a hearing panel rejected NASD charges that Invemed Associates Ltd., run by Wall Street power broker Ken Langone, improperly shared customer profits by receiving oversize commissions from clients who got hot IPOs. Invemed denied any agreement to share profits.

Mr. Quattrone's former employer, Credit Suisse First Boston, paid $200 million in 2003 to settle civil charges of "spinning" and fraudulent research based partly on actions by Mr. Quattrone's group. But Quattrone lawyers argued that the rules in effect at the time, since bolstered, didn't bar his actions.

NASD Ends Case Against Quattrone (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

Frank P. Quattrone, the most prominent banker in Silicon Valley during the 1990's technology boom, won a third major legal battle yesterday as securities industry regulators dropped all charges against him.

The decision comes just two months after a federal appeals court overturned his conviction on charges of obstruction of justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission reversed a decision to ban him for life from the securities industry.

If prosecutors decide against retrying Mr. Quattrone, speculation is already rife that he could return to deal making in the Valley, where he helped companies like Cisco Systems and Amazon.com go public.

Yesterday's decision by NASD, which polices the brokerage industry, to dismiss its own case is notable because it was the accusations in the case — that he illegally doled out hot initial public offerings to corporate clients in exchange for business — that prosecutors later cited in his criminal trial to suggest that he was trying to cover up that activity and obstruct justice.

The dismissal is also notable because Mr. Quattrone's former firm, Credit Suisse First Boston, now Credit Suisse, paid $100 million to settle similar charges against the firm with the NASD in 2002.

Still, Mr. Quattrone faces the possibility that prosecutors could bring the obstruction of justice case against him again. But some legal experts suggested that with the dismissal of the NASD's 2003 case, momentum might be building for the criminal case to be extinguished, too.

"It's very unusual for regulators to dismiss charges they brought themselves — I think it's telling," said John J. Fahy, a former federal prosecutor now at the law firm of Fahy Choi in Rutherford, N.J. "This was an iffy case from the beginning. Now you're left with a house of cards that has completely fallen apart."

Not all legal experts, however, are in agreement that prosecutors will not try to bring the case again.

"It cuts both ways," said Robert A. Mintz, a former prosecutor and now a partner at the law firm of McCarter & English. "On one hand, the underlying charges have been eroded. On the other, if the government doesn't pursue it, it represents a full-scale retreat on a case the government brought with considerable fanfare. It's safe to say that there will be some serious plea discussions."

Whether Mr. Quattrone will return to the finance world is a hot topic around Palo Alto and Menlo Park. In large part, he remains a beloved figure among many of the companies and colleagues that thrived with his help. And if prosecutors drop the charges against him, Mr. Mintz said, "in some quarters, he'd be viewed as a hero."

While he may never return to a major Wall Street firm, some in the Valley suggest he could start his own firm or try his hand at investing.

Still, Mr. Fahy said that even if Mr. Quattrone was not tried again, "There's the stigma."

"It's what Ray Donovan, the former secretary of labor said when he was acquitted: 'Where do I go to get my reputation back?' "

The obstruction of justice case centered on a single e-mail that Mr. Quattrone forwarded to his colleagues endorsing a colleague's message that urged his staff to "clean up those files" in December 2000.

The government contended that Mr. Quattrone was trying to destroy evidence that was part of an investigation into whether the firm was allocating stock offerings to clients in return for business.

Mr. Quattrone was tried twice. In the first case, in 2003, a mistrial was declared after the jury deadlocked; the next year, another jury convicted him, but an appeals court overturned that verdict, saying that the judge gave erroneous instructions to the jury.

Mr. Quattrone's lawyers argued that NASD did not adopt rules governing the practices in question until 2002.

"Frank Quattrone played by the rules, and the practices at issue were legal, common in the industry, and approved by C.S.F.B.'s senior management and legal counsel at the time," said one of Mr. Quattrone's lawyers, Kenneth G. Hausman, a partner at Howard Rice Nemerovski Canady Falk & Rabkin in San Francisco, in a statement yesterday.

In the statement, Mr. Quattrone said, "I am pleased that justice has been done, and truly grateful for the support of my family, friends, and clients who stood by me during these challenges, as well as for the expert work of my legal team."

Regulators Drop All Charges Vs. Quattrone (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Securities industry regulators have dropped all charges against former star technology banker Frank Quattrone over how his investment bank allocated shares of hot stocks during the late-1990s Internet boom.

The ruling Wednesday by a hearing officer of the National Association of Securities Dealers, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, was the third in a trio of legal victories for Quattrone. In March, the Securities and Exchange Commission overturned a lifetime ban from the industry against Quattrone, and his conviction on charges of obstructing justice was thrown out by a federal appeals court.

Quattrone was the king dealmaker of the Internet stock boom who made a fortune helping bring some of the hottest new Internet companies to the market at his Wall Street investment bank, Credit Suisse First Boston, which has since changed its name to Credit Suisse (USA) Inc. He was convicted in May 2004 on federal charges of obstruction of justice, after his first trial ended in a hung jury. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the conviction in March, granting Quattrone a third trial.

The NASD in March 2003 had charged Quattrone with "spinning" - giving corporate executive clients the chance to buy into coveted initial public offerings as a way to win their companies' investment-banking business - from July 1998 to December 2001. The hearing officer on Wednesday granted a motion by the organization's enforcement department to withdraw the charges.

Quattrone had asserted that he was not responsible for making or supervising IPO allocations at CSFB and that NASD rules did not prohibit the conduct in question.

"Throughout my 23-year career, I have upheld high standards of integrity and professional conduct in my work and complied with the rules and regulations," Quattrone said in a statement issued Thursday. "I am pleased that justice has been done, and truly grateful for the support of my family, friends and clients who stood by me during these challenges, as well as for the expert work of my legal team."

Enron's Quiet Outages (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Uncharged in the Fraud, Directors Settled, Resigned, Lay Low

A week after a Houston jury convicted former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay of fraud, one of the Houston oil company's onetime directors says he still can't believe Lay knew about accounting schemes that caused the firm's 2001 implosion.

"I'm convinced he didn't know what was going on. . . . I just can't bear the picture of him going off to jail," said Charls E. Walker, a Potomac-based economist and lobbyist who joined the Houston energy company's board before it was known as Enron.

As for his own role as a member of the board of directors from 1985 to 1999, Walker, 82, is regretful. "I was duped. Part of the problem was putting so much confidence in Ken's integrity and ability. . . . We were taken for a ride."

Walker is unusual among the 18 former Enron directors in that he is still willing to talk about the company and the role he played in it. All of the others either declined to comment or failed to return messages left at their homes and workplaces.

After enduring widespread public criticism and congressional scrutiny in 2001 and 2002 for failing to spot or stop Enron's mounting financial troubles, most of the board members have largely gone underground. Many of them resigned from -- or did not run again for seats on -- a number of corporate boards, and those who are still in the public eye have largely removed references to Enron from their biographies.

"They have experienced an extraordinarily difficult couple of years," said Charles Elson, director of the University of Delaware's Center for Corporate Governance. "They've become the poster children of failed directors."

Compared with Lay and other top Enron executives who face lengthy prison terms, the former Enron directors got off lightly. They have faced no government sanctions, and their personal financial costs have been relatively small. Yet outside directors are almost never held responsible for corporate malfeasance, and the fact the Enron's former directors paid any price at all is testament to the depth of public anger over the collapse of what was once ranked the nation's seventh-largest company.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has not taken any formal action against the former Enron directors, but Enron investors sued them, alleging that all 18 had engaged in insider trading by selling shares while they knew more than the public about Enron's complicated financial structures.

Last year, 10 directors agreed to pay a total of $13 million out of their own pockets to settle the shareholder lawsuit. Each director's contribution was based on 10 percent of the profit he or she realized from selling Enron stock. The largest share by far -- more than $5 million -- came from Rebecca Mark-Jusbasche, the former chairman and chief executive of Enron International.

The overall settlement, shared by investors and Enron's creditors' committee, also included a payment of $155 million from Enron's officers and directors insurance policy and covered the other eight directors -- including Walker -- who did not profit from personal stock sales during Enron's collapse and against whom claims were dismissed.

Personal payments by directors are extremely rare. The only other settlement of this size and type in recent history involved the WorldCom Inc. directors. William Lerach, the class-action attorney who represented investors, said the plaintiffs were trying to send a message to other boards. "For those directors who sit on the boards of big companies where there is an egregious failure, they better be prepared to have their own pocketbooks hit," Lerach said.

Many Enron board members were prominent people, including academics, former government officials and top corporate executives. Some of the best known were Wendy Gramm, a former Commodity Futures Trading Commission chairman and senior scholar at George Mason's Mercatus Center; Robert Jaedicke, former dean of the Stanford University business school; and the current and former M.D. Anderson Cancer Center presidents John Mendelsohn and Charles A. LeMaistre.

Enron directors were serving on the boards of nearly two dozen other public companies or mutual fund families at the time of Enron's collapse. Gramm resigned almost immediately from the Invesco Funds board, and Jaedicke stepped down from the California Water Service Board.

But efforts in 2002 by organized labor to get former Enron director Frank Savage, a professional money manager, booted off the boards of Lockheed Martin Corp. and Qualcomm Inc. did not immediately bear fruit. Only 28 percent of Lockheed Martin shareholders withheld their votes, and he remains on the board.

"He's a valuable board member and has a long and distinguished association with our company," said Lockheed spokesman Jeff Adams. Savage resigned from the board of Qualcomm in 2004.

Similarly, Enron board member Norman P. Blake Jr., the former chairman of Comdisco Inc., remains on the board of Owens Corning, where he has served as a director since 1992. Company spokesman Jason Saragian said: "Our board reviews our director's independence and effectiveness as a part of good governance practices. Mr. Blake has capably met the requirements."

The union campaigns fell short in part because Enron was the first spectacular corporate collapse and shareholder activists were still feeling their way, said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. "This was before the use of the withhold vote as a tactic had really been refined. Enron gave the boost to all the reforms that followed," he said.

Over time, many of the former Enron directors have dropped off other boards. Right now, though, six of them sit on the boards of at least eight companies or mutual funds.

Analysts and even one of the Enron board members agreed that the public scrutiny and vilification they endured had positive results. "What the whole episode has done is to bring out corporate policies for a badly needed ventilation for the American people," Walker said.

Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee went further. "Directors are doing better. . . . The audit committee is coming to learn a great deal more," he said. "There is now the fear waking up and finding yourself on the bridge of the Titanic and you've just hit the iceberg. The embarrassment cost has definitely gone up."

Lessons Of The Stock Options Scandal (FT)

By Harvey Pitt

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Executive compensation is handled badly by far too many publicly held companies. Contrary to some views, it is not the amount of compensation that is the problem. Rather, it is the methodology by which companies award compensation and then monitor whether they have received performance, or merely a pulse, for the pay they provide.

Issues of amount and methodology tend to be conflated and then confused as compensation continues to rise, often faster than many companies' profits. As if this were not bad enough, we now have an unfolding scandal over alleged backdating of option grants to senior executives. Even though it is unlikely we will find much of this misconduct occurring after Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted, this is more than of historical interest. There are important lessons to be learnt from this scandal.

For one thing, options backdating may be used by those who fear current efforts to repair what is wrong with SOX. Hastily and badly drafted, SOX suffers from multiple deficiencies. But, in the context of options backdating, one note-worthy provision is section 403, requiring options grants to be reported in two business days. This has diminished the apparently widespread practice of backdating options to take advantage of a low in the company's share price or an expected rise in price.

While there is a need to refine SOX – at a minimum, its one-size-fits-all philosophy should be changed – this scandal will be used by opponents of change to argue that any tinkering with the statute could undermine important benefits the statute provides.

Options backdating calls a company's internal controls into question. Many discussions of backdating options start with the observation that backdating is not, per se, illegal. That is wrong. Options backdating frequently involves falsification of records used to gain access to corporate assets. That conduct violates the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and its internal controls requirements. If corporate directors were complicit in these efforts, state law fiduciary obligations are violated. Backdating is not only illegal and unethical, it points to a lack of integrity in a company's internal controls.

With more and more companies being identified as having a backdating problem, the issue for regulators, prosecutors and plaintiffs' attorneys is who was at fault. Already, executives have resigned or been fired, with more casualties sure to follow. But from the company/shareholder perspective, the question is more properly one of how to move forward. For that, solutions must start with the board of directors and its compensation committee.

Compensation decisions should not be treated as if they were trivial. Boards and compensation committees must develop a sensible methodology for determining what they expect from senior managers and how to measure performance. The huge amount of unrealised gains amassed by some senior executives shows that we are talking about large amounts of money.

Among other things, compensation committees need to develop objective standards for each senior manager to achieve. They need to avoid reliance on subjective or easily manipulated criteria such as share price or earnings per share and decide what each standard is worth as a portion of total compensation. Measurements must be developed that are well understood by managers and those who monitor actual performance. A discussion of compensation should provide transparency into compensation standards and decisions, setting out what standards are applied, how well they are fulfilled and what consequences flow. Committees need to monitor the reporting of options and compare them with the dates on which grants were supposed to take place.

Larger public companies should also consider appointing an internal compensation officer. He or she could ensure that compensation decisions are handled appropriately, recorded and then carried out. Similarly, compensation consultants should be paid for meaningful analysis and advice, not for the rote ways in which so many of these consultants operate. Often, these consultants are hired for compensation committees by senior management. If this ever made sense, it no longer does. Consultants should be selected by compensation committees and be wholly independent of management.

The standard drill many compensation consultants follow is to identify five comparable companies, calculate the spread of compensation for each major management position, and tell compensation committees to pay their officers at least 75 per cent of the average. The fact that companies actually have paid, and sometimes extravagantly, for this kind of advice is a testament to the fact that you can sell almost anything. Nor should compensation lawyers be overlooked. They need to do a better job of explaining, and then monitoring, compensation requirements, processes and decisions.

In the light of the backdating scandal, it seems that more and more members of compensation committees, not to mention others, were unaware of the negative tax significance of getting options grant practices wrong. When the totals are tallied, we may well be talking more than $1bn (£532m) in lost tax deductions for those companies involved. This means that, at many companies, getting options grants wrong may result in significant restatements of financial results.

Finally, the accounting profession needs to reconsider its standards. At present, if companies are manipulating their documentation, it is unlikely that accountants will find it, no matter how bright or diligent. But the considerable breadth of this problem to date suggests that auditors need to spend more time with their audit clients identifying critical controls, and then evaluating how well those controls are applied and how easily they can be avoided.

When I was at the US Securities and Exchange Commission, we often remarked on the driverless car syndrome: when corporate fraud occurred, very often those who served in positions of responsibility would deny that they were driving at the time of the wreck. The only way to avoid a recurrence of this scandal is to make sure many different hands are at the wheel.

Poll: Americans Support Searches (ABC)

By Gary Langer

ABC News, June 2, 2006

June 1, 2006 -- In the rift between Congress and the Justice Department, Americans side overwhelmingly with law enforcement: Regardless of precedent and the separation of powers, 86 percent say the FBI should be allowed to search a Congress member's office if it has a warrant.

That view is broadly bipartisan, this ABC News poll finds, ranging from 78 percent among Democrats to 94 percent of Republicans.

The issue erupted last week, after the FBI searched the offices of Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., in a corruption investigation. Congress leaders objected, and George W. Bush put a 45-day hold on the seized documents to allow for negotiations.

The issue arises at a time of various investigations of alleged wrongdoing in Congress, including those focused on the activities of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Indeed this poll finds broad public skepticism about congressional ethics: Sixty-five percent of Americans give a negative rating to the ethics and honesty of members of Congress. More, 54 percent, rate their own member's ethics positively, but that's down from 69 percent in a 1989 poll.

Allow FBI to Search a Congress Member's Office?

Yes

No

Nonetheless, support for FBI searches is about equally high whether people see Congress as honest or not. That suggests that the interests of law enforcement to investigate wrongdoing simply prevails in the public's mind over concerns about separation of powers, precedent, and the possibility prosecutors could use such searches to try to intimidate lawmakers. The question in this poll described both sides of the argument.

Politically, the Democrats have a small edge in perceived honesty, but there's not much advantage for either party on this issue. Sixteen percent of Americans think Democrats are generally more ethical and honest than Republicans; nine percent think the opposite. But most by far — 72 percent — say there isn't much difference between them.

However slight, that seven-point Democratic edge is their best in occasional polls over the last 17 years.

This Is Not Your Forefathers' Jefferson (USAT)

By Chuck Raasch

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The case of William Jefferson would make the writers of the Constitution cringe.

Some 219 years after they met in Philadelphia to prescribe the duties of three branches of government, a big test of their separation-of-powers principle has arisen. But rather than being staked on issues or war or civil liberties, it is about alleged corruption of a member of Congress.

The FBI, part of the executive branch, raided the congressional office of Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat under investigation for allegations he accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0031456

There are serious constitutional issues at stake. But the way that leaders in the House of Representatives reacted looked on Main Street like yet another example of Washington politicians putting themselves above the law.

Leaders in both parties decried the FBI's May 20 raid as a violation of their separate power under the Constitution.

The key words are in Article 1, Section 6 of the Constitution. It prevents any member of Congress from being arrested while Congress is in session, except if they commit "Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace..." Section 6 later states that "for any Speech or Debate in the House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The FBI may have violated the latter clause by removing documents from Jefferson's office, some congressional leaders and constitutional scholars argue.

The problem for congressional leaders is that there are two separate spheres in this debate. One involves a constitutional test, the other a smell test. House members' knee-jerk defenses — calling hearings and news conferences to express outrage about the violation of their turf — overlooked the reality that most Americans are probably in the smell-test, corruption-is-bad sphere.

Two people have pleaded guilty for bribing Jefferson in exchange for his alleged help getting business for American companies in Africa. Jefferson maintains his innocence and has pledged to stay in office.

The FBI says it has Jefferson on tape accepting a $100,000 payment from a government informant, and $90,000 of it ended up wrapped in tin foil in a freezer in his Washington home. That bundle of cold cash is around $15,000 more than the average American family's yearly income.

Had the average American been suspected of doing what Jefferson is alleged to have done, no one in Congress would have protested when the FBI came knocking.

Critics depicted the raid as more power-grabbing by the Bush administration, which has sought to greatly expand its investigative powers in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Bush declared a 45-day cooling off period while the lawyers and politicians sort it out.

Bush was already under assault from political foes and constitutional scholars for establishing secret terrorist prisons overseas and authorizing wiretaps without a warrant. But when his FBI sent a few agents to search the papers of a politician being investigated for corruption, Congress bared teeth that it hadn't displayed over the other controversies.

This House has already seen former Republican Majority Leader Tom DeLay step down because of ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican, has been sentenced to prison for accepting bribes for steering defense contracts to constituents.

Until recently, this House mothballed its ethics committee amid political disputes and allegations that an ex-member, Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W. Va., steered federal contracts to non-profits run by ex-aides and business associates.

The Constitution's Article I, Section 2 says that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States..."

Your next chance to exercise that constitutional right comes Nov. 7 at a polling station near you.

Congress And Justice Dept. May Both Be Overreaching (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department is probably correct in saying that it was legally entitled to search a congressman's office last month. But in ignoring history and established conventions in that case, some legal scholars say, the Bush administration has again unsettled widely shared understandings of constitutional relationships and freedoms that have existed for generations.

As with the administration's assertions that it may ignore a law on domestic eavesdropping, reinterpret other laws through presidential signing statements and prosecute journalists under espionage laws, specialists in constitutional law and history said, the Justice Department's justification for the search is an aggressive use of executive power.

In the search case, there is broad academic consensus that the constitutional protection for Congressional speech and debate does not extend to evidence of criminal conduct, even if it is in a Congressional office.

That means the Justice Department was probably entitled to seek — and a federal judge probably correct in authorizing — a warrant to search the offices of Representative William J. Jefferson, Democrat of Louisiana, notwithstanding objections by leaders of Congress.

But having the legal power to conduct a search of another branch of government does not mean it is a wise or prudent thing to do. No other administration has ever done it. In ordering a 45-day cooling-off period, during which the solicitor general will hold the seized materials, President Bush seemed to allow time for reflection on the difference between what the executive branch may do and what it should do.

At the same time, Congressional leaders may have overreached in describing the search as a flagrant violation of the Constitution.

Indeed, the argument that Congressional offices are immune from law enforcement searches has something in common with the argument that the president has the authority to reinterpret the bills he signs into law, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University.

"They have no taproot in the constitutional document," Professor Kmiec said of arguments. "They're all sound and fury."

Several legal scholars went further, saying they found it hard to take at face value the objections of many legislators about the search of Mr. Jefferson's office.

"Like a lot of these issues where separation-of-powers rhetoric is deployed and where you see cross-party lines of agreement, there's often a competing story," said Daryl J. Levinson, a law professor at Harvard. "Here the story that leaps out at you is that the Republicans are worried that they're next."

The judge who authorized the warrant in Mr. Jefferson's case, Thomas F. Hogan of Federal District Court in Washington, will hear arguments on June 16 about whether to order the materials returned. Judge Hogan has in other contexts been unsympathetic to claims of privilege, having last year ordered the jailing of Judith Miller, then a reporter for The New York Times, for refusing to testify about a confidential source.

Mr. Jefferson and many of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle have said that the speech-and-debate clause in the Constitution should have barred the search. The clause says that members of Congress "shall not be questioned in any other place" about "any speech or debate in either house." The courts have interpreted the clause broadly. Information concerning almost all legislative activity, including stolen documents received from a tobacco whistle-blower, for instance, have been held to be protected. But materials concerning activities unrelated to the official legislative process are not subject to the privilege (bribery being an obvious example).

Mr. Jefferson's lawyers used sweeping language in their motion seeking the return of the seized materials, invoking, for instance, "the delicate balance of our democratic system." Justice Department lawyers countered that Mr. Jefferson's real goal was to frustrate the very possibility of the search of a Congressional office.

"Representative Jefferson's view of the privilege, taken to its logical conclusion," the Justice Department argued in a filing on Tuesday, "would allow a member of Congress to prevent law enforcement officers from ever obtaining evidence of a crime simply by putting the evidence in a filing cabinet in his office that might contain privileged documents."

At a hearing of the House Judiciary Committee on Tuesday, its chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin, said the committee intended to summon Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, to justify the search. He added that the committee was drafting legislation to prohibit such searches, modeled on a 1980 law that limits searches of newsrooms.

The clash between the two branches on this relatively minor point, at least as compared with the legal issues surrounding efforts to combat terrorism, raises questions about whether the Constitution's intricately constructed sets of institutional counterweights have fallen out of balance.

In other contexts, too, some scholars say, prudence and discretion have taken a back seat lately to uncompromising legal arguments. Phillip J. Cooper, a professor of public administration at Portland State University, for instance, faulted Mr. Bush for his enthusiastic use of signing statements.

"What we're seeing here," Professor Cooper said, "is a very consistent, systemic use of this little-known device to expand the authority of the president, constrain the authority of Congress and, in some cases, simply to supplant the authority of the judiciary."

What is missing nowadays, legal experts say, is the restraint and cooperation presupposed in the Constitution and noted by Justice Robert H. Jackson in his famous concurrence in the 1952 Supreme Court decision that turned back the Truman administration's attempt to seize the steel industry during the Korean War.

"While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government," Justice Jackson wrote. "It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity."

Brushback Hearing (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

In baseball, the hurler intimidates the batter with a brushback pitch. In soccer, the official warns an unruly player by pulling out a yellow card.

DOJ_NMG_0031458

Politicians in legal jeopardy thunder and moan, threatening prosecutors while cloaking their pressure tactics in the grand language of constitutional rights and democracy.

So don't be fooled by the hearing before the House Judiciary Committee on the Justice Department's supposed violation of congressional rights in an FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's office in a bribery investigation.

The hearing was dominated by talk of abuses of power by long-dead monarchs and the need of the people's representatives for untrammeled communication with their constituents.

But Rep. James Sensenbrenner's committee was really sending a message as the House confronts a far-reaching corruption investigation: Nice little Justice Department you have there, Mr. Attorney General. Too bad if anything were to happen to it. Stop messing with us before we mess with you.

How else to explain this from Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.): "We have the power to impeach the attorney general. Now, I'm not sure that articles of impeachment are going to come out today. I think we're a couple shakes short of a quorum for that purpose. Although I suspect members would quickly be here if it was brought by the chair."

Why would House Republicans be so concerned with Jefferson, a Democrat from Louisiana who, according to prosecutors, kept $90,000 in cash in his freezer?

One answer is high principle. The more plausible answer is that Republicans are worried that the next shoes to drop in the congressional probes will belong to Republican members. Using a Democrat's case now to protect Republican members in the future is not so much clever as transparent.

If Wisconsin's Sensenbrenner and his fellow Republicans had shown an exquisite concern with civil liberties and accountability in the past, their challenge to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales might be seen as part of a consistent libertarian sensibility.

One of the witnesses called to justify the Republicans' assault, maverick conservative legal theorist Bruce Fein, had the intellectual honesty to put the issue in a larger context. He charged that "the Bush administration has been bent on a scheme for years of reducing Congress . . . to an extra in a Cecil B. DeMille political extravaganza."

But Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) called the committee's bluff when he noted the "number of examples of overreaching by the executive branch where there's been a total lack of oversight by this Congress." He cited such issues as torture, the treatment of detainees and enemy combatants, and data-mining operations by the National Security Agency.

"Now you've got a stampede by some members of Congress to make Capitol Hill a safe haven for hiding evidence of criminal wrongdoing," Van Hollen said in an interview yesterday. "Issues important to the American people have been totally ignored. But as soon as they come knocking on the doors of Congress, [House members] scramble to protect themselves."

According to 2005 Census Bureau estimates, there are 296,410,404 people in the United States. The Judiciary Committee is clearly concerned with the rights of 435 House members and -- give them the benefit of the doubt -- 100 senators. Someday, the committee will get around to thinking about the rights of the remaining 296,409,869 of us.

Of course it's true that the Justice Department could have shown more regard for congressional prerogatives, perhaps by informing the speaker and the minority leader in advance of the search. And blanket sweeps of congressional offices by the executive would indeed be a clear violation of the Constitution's "speech and debate" clause protecting senators and representatives from executive intimidation.

But this was no politically motivated search. The evidence indicates it was a response to Jefferson's attempts to withhold evidence. Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) has rebuked leaders of both parties for their self-protective zeal. The speech-and-debate clause, he said, "should not be in any way interpreted as meaning that we as members of Congress have legal protections superior to those of the average citizen." Amen.

Here's the implication of the hearings: The current House leadership will permit the executive to claim broad privileges as long as Congress can also claim broad privileges. Such an interpretation of the "separation of powers" would bring an end to "checks and balances."

So keep an eye on the leadership of the Justice Department. Here's hoping that it resists political pressure -- whether from Congress or the White House -- and allows its prosecutors to proceed with legitimate investigations of corruption.

Poverty Marked 'Dollar Bill' (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons And Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Rep. William J. Jefferson was once famous in Louisiana circles as the sharecropper's son who made his way to Harvard, steered by parents who preached the value of education.

Today, Jefferson is infamous nationally as the Louisiana Democrat who stashed $90,000 of alleged bribe money in his kitchen freezer.

DOJ_NMG_0031459

Those who have watched his career's spectacular rise and potential fall believe the terrible poverty he escaped was ultimately his undoing. He rose to become his state's first African American congressman since Reconstruction, but people who know him say he still had a thirst for wealth.

"His perceived flaw among his peers has always been that, shaped by his humble beginnings, Bill loved money and desperately wanted to be a rich man," said Allan Katz, a New Orleans-based political consultant who has known Jefferson for more than 30 years. "It was the Deep South kind of hardship that shaped African American backgrounds."

One of 10 children, Jefferson, now 59, grew up in one of the poorest parts of Louisiana. He was good with a hunting rifle and told a story that showcased his dead aim: If his father needed three rabbits, he would give his son three bullets. But according to Katz, the family told the story another way.

"They had a gun and could only afford one bullet at a time…. If he missed, the family didn't eat," Katz said.

The lessons of poverty were apparently lasting. An accomplished attorney and aspiring politician, Jefferson became known early on for a pursuit of money that earned him the nickname "Dollar Bill."

As local legend goes, the name came from Jefferson's mentor — legendary New Orleans Mayor Ernest N. "Dutch" Morial. Morial had asked his protege for some legal work and was given it — along with a staggering bill. Outraged, Morial coined the moniker.

It followed Jefferson harmlessly enough until last month, when the FBI reported capturing the eight-term congressman on videotape accepting a leather briefcase with $100,000 in alleged bribe money from an undercover informant in front of a northern Virginia hotel. Of those marked bills, $90,000 wound up in Jefferson's freezer, the FBI said after a search of Jefferson's Washington home.

No charges have been filed against the congressman, and Jefferson has been forceful in his denial of wrongdoing. "There are two sides to every story," he recently said, adding that he could not answer specific questions on the advice of his lawyers.

But the clumsy bravado outlined in government documents has held Washington rapt. According to a 95-page affidavit filed by the FBI, Jefferson demanded bribes in exchange for helping iGate Inc., a Kentucky-based technology company, win Internet and telephone service contracts in Africa. The company's chief executive, Vernon L. Jackson, pleaded guilty last month to bribing Jefferson with more than $400,000 in cash and millions of shares of company stock.

In a related allegation, the FBI said Jefferson offered to help a Virginia businesswoman win similar contracts in exchange for a kickback, proposing she deliver a substantial amount of money to move the deal along. "Cash," he allegedly instructed in a note to her. She reportedly cooperated with investigators and taped the conversation.

Despite his reputation for wanting wealth, many who know Jefferson were shocked by the allegations because, by most measures, he has achieved success. Like many lawmakers, he keeps two homes, one in Washington and one in his district — a wood two-story house on Marengo Street in the racially diverse Uptown neighborhood. He drives a Lincoln Town Car.

The only clue to a motive came from the evidence against him: "I make a deal for my children," he allegedly said on tape, while demanding that his stake in a Nigerian venture be raised from 7% to 30%.

Already, the case has had a far-reaching impact in Washington. An FBI search of Jefferson's congressional office May 20 sparked a blustery showdown between the executive and legislative branches over separation of powers, causing President Bush to call a 45-day cooling-off period.

And it has upset the dynamic of the approaching November elections, when Democrats had hoped to make GOP corruption a cause for reclaiming control of Congress. Democrats have been highlighting the misdeeds of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), now in prison on bribery and tax evasion charges, and of GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, now cooperating in one of the largest corruption probes in recent memory. But the Jefferson case has made it harder for Democrats to grab the high moral ground.

Jefferson has resisted calls for his resignation, while his staff offers up an emotional defense.

"He puts his district's interest before anything, and more specifically before party interests," said his communications director, Melanie Roussell.

Gangly and impeccably dressed, Jefferson has a reputation for impressive lawmaking skills and a thirst for education that continued into adulthood.

Raised on a farm in rural Lake Providence to sharecropper parents who did not graduate from high school, he flourished at the East Carroll Training School for the Colored.

He went on to Southern University A&M College — considered a flagship of Louisiana's African American university system — and then to Harvard Law School.

He began as a lawyer, but his passion was politics. He made history with his 1991 election to Congress. Along the way, he married Andrea Green, a former vice chancellor of Southern University in New Orleans. They raised five daughters, three of whom followed their father to Harvard Law.

DOJ_NMG_0031460

A member of the influential Ways and Means Committee and an advocate of trade to alleviate poverty in Africa, Jefferson continued his education even while in Congress. He earned a master's degree in tax law from Georgetown University in 1996, and after Hurricane Katrina he helped pass tax-related legislation to benefit New Orleans.

Frustrated that he could not speak the local language on trade trips, he took up French and Spanish, according to Nicole Venable, a former senior policy advisor to Jefferson and until last November his chief of staff.

Until the scandal broke, Jefferson's seat was considered one of the safest in Congress. There was even talk of a budding Jefferson dynasty, with some political observers anticipating that one of his daughters would eventually take his seat.

"He could have stayed there until he retired, or died," said political consultant Katz.

Already, at least five still officially undeclared challengers are vying for his seat. But many constituents say they remain enamored of his rags-to-riches rise and his work on their behalf.

Still, there is a sense of damage in a place that, with another hurricane season just started, doesn't need one more burden.

"We are so traumatized," said Stephen Sabludowsky, a New Orleans-based attorney and publisher of BayouBuzz.com, a website about everything Louisianan. "We're going through so many things, we don't want the world's attention on us again."

Sabludowsky has urged Jefferson to resign rather than saddle the beleaguered city with a distracted congressman. He did so reluctantly, though, describing Jefferson this way: "Incredible … just in terms of his intelligence, his political acumen, the influence that he has….

"That's what makes this such a shame," Sabludowsky said.

Raid Controversy Has Roots In US Constitution (VOA)

By Jim Malone

Voice of America, June 2, 2006

A controversy over federal agents raiding the office of a congressman has its roots in the formation of the U.S. Constitution more than 200 years ago.

The controversy involves Congressman William Jefferson, a Democrat from Louisiana.

Jefferson is the subject of a federal bribery investigation that involves the promotion of business interests in West Africa. He denies any wrongdoing.

What has upset members of Congress from both parties is an FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's Washington office on May 20.

William JeffersonRepublican James Sensenbrenner chairs the House Judiciary Committee. He says the FBI raid on a congressman's office violates a central tenet of the U.S. Constitution known as the separation of powers.

"The separation of powers and the checks and balances were put into our Constitution by the framers to make sure that no person or no branch of government got too powerful," said Mr. Sensenbrenner.

In the early days of the American Republic, the revolutionaries who won independence from Britain were determined not to replace a powerful English monarch with an equally potent American president.

So the founders devised a system of separate powers whereby the Congress made the laws, the executive branch, led by the president, enforced the laws, and the judicial branch, led by the Supreme Court, interpreted the laws to make sure they conformed with powers set forth in the U.S. Constitution.

Lawmakers upset with the FBI raid on Congressman Jefferson's office are concerned with what they view as an attempt by the executive branch, in the form of the Justice Department, to intimidate a member of the legislative branch.

Charles Tiefer is a law professor at the University of Baltimore in Maryland. He testified at a recent hearing called by members of Congress angry about the search of Congressman Jefferson's office.

"Now this raid had all the elements of unconstitutional executive intimidation," he said.

Another witness, George Washington University law Professor Jonathan Turley, said the office search represented a break in tradition that goes back 219 years to the formation of the Constitution in 1787.

"But there has been a tradition of mutual respect and mutual restraint between the branches. What occurred on that Saturday night shattered that tradition," he noted.

But not everyone sees the Jefferson raid as a violation of the Constitution.

The Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, spoke on Fox television.

"If there are accusations of bribery, of having lost the trust, abused the trust of the American people, criminal activity, no House member, no senator, nobody in government should be above the law of the land, period," said Mr. Frist.

Some members of Congress have urged President Bush to order the Justice Department to return the documents seized from Congressman Jefferson's office.

DOJ_NMG_0031461

The Washington Post reported that some high level Justice Department officials signaled they might resign if the White House forced the return of documents.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says his department has the right to investigate allegations of corruption in Congress and is respectful of the separation of powers.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales"Personally, in the department collectively, we have a great deal of respect for the Congress as a co-equal branch of government, as a separate and independent branch of government," said Mr. Gonzales.

Congressman Sensenbrenner says he intends to call Attorney General Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller to testify about the Jefferson case before his committee.

In the meantime, President Bush has ordered the materials seized in the raid sealed for 45 days in hopes that the Justice Department and House leaders can work out their differences over the case.

Constitution Gives No Felon A Hidey-Hole (TAMPTRIB)

Tampa Tribune, June 2, 2006

Many members of Congress are outraged that the FBI raided the offices of Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson and took legislative files along with the evidence they sought for a bribery investigation. But accusations that the FBI trampled the doctrine of separation of powers are wildly overblown.

Still, President Bush was smart to seal for 45 days the papers and computer hard drive taken from Jefferson's office May 21. That gives time for all legal angles to be reviewed and for guidelines to be written on how the president's agents should handle suspected lawbreakers who serve in Congress.

The Constitution anticipated attempts to harass Congress. It says that senators and representatives "shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same." But the writers of the Constitution never envisioned an office hideout for elected felons.

The blustering about separation of powers on Capitol Hill suggests reasonable guidelines are overdue. Is a raid in the dead of night, as done to Jefferson, advisable? What safeguards should apply when agents seize lawmaking documents?

If rumors are true about the breadth of the improper generosity of certain lobbyists, those assigned to write the guidelines have no time to dally.

Dan K. Thomasson column: Congress Finally Losing Patience With FBI (SCRIPPS)

By DAN K. THOMASSON, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress' relationship with the FBI always has been Frankenstein-like with the father of the monster regarding his creation with cautious affection rooted in fear. The result has been fawning accommodation and unlimited tolerance for whatever the bureau demands, no matter how outrageous or unwarranted, a willingness to excuse what clearly was the inexcusable from Waco to Ruby Ridge to 9/11.

Long before agents stormed into the Capitol Hill office of Louisiana Democratic Rep. William Jefferson, setting off a minor constitutional crisis in their pursuit of evidence of criminal activity, there were allegations of the bureau's insensitivity to the separation of powers. But while some members of Congress complained about abuse of their rights _ Hale Boggs, Democratic majority leader, railed long and loud on the House floor about bureau encroachment _ most seemed unwilling to challenge the increasingly powerful national police force whose then-leader J. Edgar Hoover was said to have secret dossiers on nearly every official in Washington.

Whether Hoover's secret files ever really existed _ they have never surfaced _ didn't really matter. What was important was that everyone in Congress thought they did and acted accordingly. That included giving top priority to the bureau's often outlandish budget and increased manpower requests at the expense of other under funded, under staffed federal law enforcement agencies; treating every bureau mistake with kid gloves, looking the other way as the bureau gobbled up more and more turf from sister institutions, and generally ignoring their mandated congressional oversight responsibilities

Time and again, through one Hoover successor after another, the Congress not only tolerated bureau incompetence but also accepted the FBI's oft repeated excuse that whatever the failing, it had been the direct result of insufficient manpower. The message was clear: More troops would correct the problem.

That approach worked wonders, boosting the bureau to 12,000 agents, a huge budget, an army of support employees and a reach that went well beyond the nation's boundaries. The bureau led a charmed life on Capitol Hill. That is until Sept. 11, 2001, when forces led by Osama bin Laden revealed just how ineffective this bureaucratic giant was when it came to carrying out its responsibility for protecting the nation from just such incidents. The number one domestic defender against the kind of terrorism the rest of the world had long suffered was so incompetent that it had missed a series of opportunities to thwart the entire affair, at times ignoring the obvious signs and stifling the warnings of its own dismayed agents.

The bureau was for the first time since the days of John Dillinger under severe criticism from its former allies in the House and Senate as one commission after another found it wanting. There was even serious discussion about relieving it of its counter intelligence mission. The new director, Robert Mueller, met every challenge with the promise of reform, pledging to change the thrust from chasing bank robbers to stopping terrorists. But more than 80 years of culture built on after-the-fact investigating is difficult to change.

Now the bureau's woes have been exacerbated by the Jefferson affair resulting in outrage from the leaders of both parties in Congress and embarrassment to a president who badly needs a better relationship with the legislative branch. In an effort to cool down the rhetoric and avoid the growing constitutional brouhaha, President Bush ordered that whatever the bureau took from Jefferson's office be sealed for 45 days. It hasn't deterred a House committee from conducting hearings on possible constitutional violations. The committee's chairman, James Sensenbrenner, is contemplating legislation to prevent a recurrence.

While this encroachment can be expected to pass, it clearly is another blow to the FBI's reputation. A number of constitutional scholars believe the action leaps the barrier separating the branches of government. Clearly evidence gathered prior to the raid points to Jefferson's involvement in a bribery scandal. Why the bureau and its Justice Department bosses felt it necessary to step over a line it has come close to in the past but avoided crossing until now is anyone's guess. Perhaps it is best to chalk it up to continuing bad judgment.

Whatever the reason, the Prometheus that remained unchained so long faces a new challenge to stay that way and to prevent the growing number of lawmakers who would relieve it of its responsibilities from succeeding. Maybe more agents are needed.

Firms Wary About Holding Customer Records (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Top U.S. law enforcement officials have told Internet companies they must retain customer records longer to help in child pornography and terrorism investigations, and they are considering asking Congress to require preservation of records.

Industry representatives are expected to meet Friday with Justice Department officials, a week after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller first raised the issue with executives from several Internet service providers, including AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

The subject has prompted alarm from some executives and privacy advocates, especially after Gonzales' Justice Department took Google to court earlier this year to force it to turn over information on customer searches. Civil liberties groups also have sued Verizon and other telephone companies, alleging they are working with the government to provide information without search warrants on subscriber calling records.

Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who attended the first meeting, said Thursday that some executives raised privacy concerns at the meeting. But she said Gonzales has not made any decisions about how to proceed and that the department would be mindful of the privacy issue.

"We are looking at whether requiring longer data retention or asking ISPs to do it informally is something we want to pursue," Brand said.

Mueller suggested a period of two years and said terrorism investigations also would be helped by such a rule, several people who attended the meeting said. Gonzales was focused on child pornography cases, they said.

Any proposal would not call for the content of communications to be preserved, would keep the information in the companies' hands and could be obtained by the government through a subpoena or other lawful process, Brand said.

Still, one Internet executive familiar with the meeting said one worry is that once retained, the records could be made available for any criminal investigation or civil case, "down to a bad divorce, up to a music company asking for people who visited a file trading site."

The executive, who requested anonymity because it was private meeting and the talks were still continuing, said the industry was likely to oppose any legislation for financial, privacy and technical reasons. The department's recent clash with Google probably will make the companies more resolute in their opposition, the executive said.

Several companies said they work hard to protect children online and often work with law enforcement.

"But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety, and availability of low-cost or free Internet services," Microsoft said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0031463

In a statement, Google said, "Any proposals related to data require careful review and must balance the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

The meetings are an outgrowth of Gonzales' interest in beefing up child porn investigations, some of which he said have been hampered by Internet companies' failure to retain records long enough.

Gonzales, who first raised the issue in an April speech, did not name any companies or cases. But a Justice Department official said some of the information provided by Justin Berry, a child pornography victim who testified to Congress in April, did not lead to arrests because authorities who sought help from ISPs were told the records no longer existed.

Berry criticized the department for acting too slowly on information he provided on 1,500 pedophiles. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because investigators still are looking into Berry's case.

At the moment, there are no broad requirements for preservation of data, although federal authorities can request records be maintained for up to six months when they suspect a crime has been committed.

U.S. Wants Companies To Keep Web Usage Records (NYT)

By Saul Hansell And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department is asking Internet companies to keep records on the Web-surfing activities of their customers to aid law enforcement, and may propose legislation to force them to do so.

The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III, and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales held a meeting in Washington last Friday where they offered a general proposal on record-keeping to a group of senior executives from Internet companies, said Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the department. The meeting included representatives from America Online, Microsoft, Google, Verizon and Comcast.

The attorney general has appointed a task force of department officials to explore the issue, and that group is holding another meeting with a broader group of Internet executives today, Mr. Roehrkasse said. The department also met yesterday with a group of privacy experts.

The Justice Department is not asking the Internet companies to give it data about users, but rather to retain information that could be subpoenaed through existing laws and procedures, Mr. Roehrkasse said.

While initial proposals were vague, executives from companies that attended the meeting said they gathered that the department was interested in records that would allow them to identify which individuals visited certain Web sites and possibly conducted searches using certain terms.

It also wants the Internet companies to retain records about whom their users exchange e-mail with, but not the contents of e-mail messages, the executives said. The executives spoke on the condition that they not be identified because they did not want to offend the Justice Department.

The proposal and the initial meeting were first reported by USA Today and CNet News.com.

The department proposed that the records be retained for as long as two years. Most Internet companies discard such records after a few weeks or months.In its current proposal, the department appears to be trying to determine whether Internet companies will voluntarily agree to keep certain information or if it will need to seek legislation to require them to do so.

The request comes as the government has been trying to extend its power to review electronic communications in several ways. The New York Times reported in December that the National Security Agency had gained access to phone and e-mail traffic with the cooperation of telecommunications companies, and USA Today reported last month that the agency had collected telephone calling records. The Justice Department has subpoenaed information on Internet search patterns — but not the searches of individuals — as it tries to defend a law meant to protect children from pornography.

In a speech in April, Mr. Gonzales said that investigations into child pornography had been hampered because Internet companies had not always kept records that would help prosecutors identify people who traded in illegal images.

"The investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers," Mr. Gonzales said in remarks at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va. "This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031464

An executive of one Internet provider that was represented at the first meeting said Mr. Gonzales began the discussion by showing slides of child pornography from the Internet. But later, one participant asked Mr. Mueller why he was interested in the Internet records. The executive said Mr. Mueller's reply was, "We want this for terrorism."

At the meeting with privacy experts yesterday, Justice Department officials focused on wanting to retain the records for use in child pornography and terrorism investigations. But they also talked of their value in investigating other crimes like intellectual property theft and fraud, said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington, who attended the session.

"It was clear that they would go beyond kiddie porn and terrorism and use it for general law enforcement," Mr. Rotenberg said.

Kate Dean, the executive director of the United States Internet Service Provider Association, a trade group, said: "When they said they were talking about child pornography, we spent a lot of time developing proposals for what could be done. Now they are talking about a whole different ball of wax."

At the meeting with privacy groups, officials sought to assuage concerns that the retention of the records could compromise the privacy of Americans. But Mr. Rotenberg said he left with lingering concerns.

"This is a sharp departure from current practice," he said. "Data retention is an open-ended obligation to retain all information on all customers for all purposes, and from a traditional Fourth Amendment perspective, that really turns things upside down."

Executives of several Internet companies that participated in the first meeting said the department's initial proposals seemed expensive and unwieldy.

At the meeting scheduled for today with executives of Internet access companies, Justice Department officials plan to go into more detail about what types of records they would like to see retained and for how long, said a Justice Department official who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It will be much more nuts-and-bolts discussions," he said, adding that the department would stop short of offering formal proposals.

Online Privacy Again At Issue (LAT)

By Joseph Menn

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Big Internet and telephone companies are girding to fight an unprecedented call by the Bush administration for them to keep detailed records of customers' online activities for two years.

The request by Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III would dramatically expand the government's ability to track what people do online and with whom they communicate.

It follows disclosure this year that the Justice Department had solicited potentially billions of online search queries from some of the same companies and that the National Security Agency had requested calling records of virtually all U.S. customers.

Gonzales and Mueller asked Google Inc., Time Warner Inc.'s AOL and other companies to preserve the data at a May 26 meeting, citing their value to investigations into child-pornography distribution and terrorism. Internet companies typically keep customer histories for only a few days or weeks.

The Justice Department said Thursday that it was not seeking to have e-mail content archived, just information about the websites people visit and those with whom they correspond.

Beyond law enforcement, though, the trove also could be available to lawyers arguing civil lawsuits — including divorce cases and suits against people suspected of swapping copyrighted movie and music files online. Privacy advocates fear the user histories could be exploited by criminal investigators conducting inappropriate exploration or pursuing minor cases.

"This is not simply limited to kiddie porn or terrorism. It's a real break with precedent," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the nonprofit Electronic Privacy Information Center. "Data retention is open-ended. The government is saying, 'Keep everything about everyone and we'll sort it out later.' "

Individual legal battles increasingly include court-approved requests for records from Internet access providers who might have online evidence of criminal activity or an affair. Often those requests yield little because the target can no longer be linked to a specific computer's Internet address or because the e-mails and records of website visits have been deleted.

None of the Internet companies has publicly opposed the request. But they noted concerns over privacy in statements Thursday. People familiar with the company executives' reaction to the Justice Department's request described alarm — tempered mainly by assurances from Gonzales and Mueller that the discussions were preliminary.

Many of the companies appeared to be emboldened by recent precedents set by Google and Qwest Communications International Inc., both of which resisted broad requests for data from the Justice Department and the NSA, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0031465

Without addressing the substance of the meeting with Gonzales and Mueller, Verizon Communications Inc. spokesman David Fish said the company "has a strong history of protecting customer communications and related records." He noted that the Internet access provider battled requests for customer data from the Recording Industry Assn. of America.

Google said a solution "must balance the legitimate interests of individual users, law enforcement agencies and Internet companies."

If companies refuse to cooperate, the Justice Department said it might propose legislation to force the companies to keep records longer. Specifically, the Justice Department wants information linking those online to the Internet addresses assigned to personal computers. In addition, it wants data tying those Internet addresses to destinations on the Web and to e-mail sent and received.

Currently, court orders can force e-mail providers, Internet access providers and others to turn over records — when they have them. The speed with which online footprints fade has frustrated law enforcement. Police, for instance, have testified before Congress they often run into dead ends in child-sex cases.

In an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Va., Gonzales said the reluctance of service providers to keep records longer "has hampered our ability to conduct investigations in this area."

The Justice Department said Thursday that it was not interested in reading the e-mails of ordinary Americans.

"The attorney general made perfectly clear that if the Department of Justice decides to ask Congress for a data-retention requirement, the department would not propose that content be included in such a requirement," spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

Law enforcement officials would still need some legal instrument, such as a subpoena or search warrant, to look at the data. But FBI agents have the additional power to request information secretly, without a court order, through so-called national security letters.

Five companies and one trade group attended last week's meeting with Gonzales and Mueller, first reported by the online technology news website CNet. Besides Google, AOL and Verizon, executives were sent from Microsoft Corp. and Comcast Corp., according to several people briefed on the session.

Acknowledging the sensitivity of the project, the Justice Department on Thursday took the unusual step of discussing the plan with such likely critics as the Cato Institute, a public-policy research organization, and the Electronic Privacy Information Center. Further meetings with telephone and Internet companies are set for today.

"What's special here is the scale," said Ohio State University law professor Peter Swire, a privacy expert who attended Thursday's meeting at the Justice Department. "The Justice Department is discussing requiring records for chat, e-mail, and Web surfing — that's billions of encounters per day."

As things stand, a few industries are required to keep information on customers. A growing number of financial firms must know enough about their clients to be able to report activity that could involve hiding illicit profits. Phone companies must keep records on who called whom for 18 months, and Justice Department and Homeland Security officials in April told the Federal Communications Commission that period should be extended.

With Internet records, "you're in a different ballgame," said Jim Harper, an information policy specialist at the Cato Institute. "You're talking about a massive transfer of power."

Justice Department Asking Internet Companies To Save Data (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, June 2, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is considering asking Congress to rewrite the rules that govern how Internet companies cooperate with law enforcement agencies, despite objections raised by the tech industry and privacy experts.

During the last week, Gonzales has met with privacy experts and with major Internet companies to discuss a proposal that would require Internet companies like Google, Yahoo, AOL & Microsoft and Internet service providers like Verizon, AT&T and Comcast to retain records relating to their customers' online behavior for up to two years.

Current regulations require companies to preserve data that is the subject of specific criminal investigations while law enforcement collects evidence that could support a warrant.

``This is a radical departure from current practices," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, who meet with justice department officials Thursday. ``We've opposed it because we think it creates an unnecessary risk to privacy and security of Internet users."

Brian Roehrkasse, a department spokesman, said the purpose of the meetings with the Internet companies and others is ``to solicit their input and seek their assistance in formulating proposals and recommendations on the issue of data retention."

Internet companies retain vast databases containing the personal information of their customers for a variety of commercial reasons, but the information can also be useful to law enforcement pursuing criminal investigations.

At a speech on April 20 before the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Gonzales said ``the failure of some Internet service provides to keep records" has hampered the government's ability to conduct investigations into alleged child exploitation.

Roehrkasse said Gonzales had made clear that government employees would only have access to the information through ``appropriate legal processes," such as a subpoena, which is subject to judicial review, or in the course of investigations that were authorized by the department's criminal division, or undertaken in conjunction with investigations by any of the 94 U.S. Attorney's offices around the country.

Microsoft, AOL, Google Asked By U.S. To Keep Internet Records (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, June 2, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. is asking Internet companies including Microsoft Corp., Google Inc. and AOL to preserve records of customers' Web activity to aid terrorism and child pornography investigations.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller made the request last week at a meeting with industry executives, said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman. More talks are scheduled for today and tomorrow. Also included in the discussions are representatives from victims' rights groups, privacy advocates and law enforcement officials, he said.

``We have begun initial discussions with Internet service providers and others on this issue of data retention to help the department with bolstering its investigative efforts," said Roehrkasse.

Gonzales is pressing Internet companies for more cooperation as the Justice Department focuses on terrorism and child pornography cases. The move has prompted complaints from privacy advocates and led to a clash earlier this year with Google, the word's largest search engine.

The agency has asked Internet companies to retain records such as lists of e-mails sent and received or information on Web searches. Authorities wouldn't ask the companies to keep the content of e-mails and would use standard legal channels, such as seeking a subpoena, before obtaining information, Roehrkasse said.

The Justice Department has no legal authority to require companies to keep data on their customers and would need to ask Congress for that ability, Roehrkasse said. He said there has been no decision on how long companies would need to store the records.

Retaining Records

New York-based Verizon Communications Inc., the No. 2 U.S. telephone company, and Philadelphia-based Comcast Corp., the largest U.S. cable provider, were among the companies at last week's meeting, Roehrkasse said. AOL is the Internet unit of New York-based Time Warner Inc., the world's largest media company.

Gonzales said in April that Internet service providers had hurt child pornography probes by not keeping data long enough. He said he would personally reach out to chief executive officers of leading providers to resolve the problem.

``The investigation and prosecution of child predators depends critically on the availability of evidence that is often in the hands of Internet service providers," Gonzales said in a April 20 speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children in Alexandria, Virginia. ``This evidence will be available for us to use only if the providers retain the records for a reasonable amount of time."

Privacy Concerns

Earlier this year, the Justice Department sparred with Google over a request for information on its customer searches. In March, a federal judge ordered the Mountain View, California-based company to turn over some of the records demanded by the government.

Google initially had refused to give the government the information citing privacy concerns. Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft, AOL and Sunnyvale, California-based Yahoo! Inc. cooperated with the Justice Department. Yahoo is the most-visited U.S. Web site. Microsoft, the world's biggest software company, owns the MSN Internet service.

``We strongly support Attorney General Gonzales' interest in assuring that the Internet is safe for everyone, especially children and families," Phil Reitinger, senior security strategist for Microsoft, said in an e-mailed statement. ``But data retention is a complicated issue with implications not only for efforts to combat child pornography but also for security, privacy, safety, and availability of low-cost or free Internet services."

Muhammad Sentenced To Six Life Terms (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0031467

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

A Montgomery County judge yesterday sentenced sniper John Allen Muhammad to six consecutive life sentences for his role in the 2002 shootings that terrorized the D.C. metropolitan area.

"You came into this county and randomly murdered innocent and defenseless people. You would have murdered more people, but you got caught," Circuit Judge James L. Ryan said to Muhammad, the mastermind of the shootings.

"The citizens have, to the best of their ability, recovered and will continue to recover," he said. "But you, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope, no future." Muhammad, 45, said nothing but looked at the judge with his arms crossed.

As Muhammad was handcuffed and led out of the Rockville courtroom, family members of the sniper victims and onlookers broke into applause.

Muhammad and his accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, shot 13 persons in three weeks, killing 10 and wounding three. A jury Tuesday convicted Muhammad of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County.

In 2003, a Virginia Beach jury sentenced Muhammad to death for the slaying of Dean Harold Meyers.

State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said Muhammad will be shipped back to Virginia "within 48 hours." Mr. Gansler chose not to seek the death penalty for the killings, instead gaining multiple life sentences with no possibility of parole as insurance in case the Virginia death sentence is ever overturned.

Muhammad now heads back to Sussex State Prison's death row, where, according to a spokesman for the Virginia Attorney General's Office, he could be executed as soon as three years from now. Muhammad has exhausted his direct state and federal appeals in that case, but habeas corpus appeals still remain.

A federal law-enforcement official, however, said Muhammad will be "moved to the front of the line."

Before the judge imposed his sentence, family members of victims spoke in court about their loss.

Nelson Rivera, whose wife, Lori-Ann Lewis Rivera, was gunned down at a Kensington gas station, said his daughter says she wants to die so that she can be reunited with her mother.

"He not only killed my wife, he killed me, he killed my daughter and all the rest of the family," an emotional Mr. Rivera said.

"The day Conrad died, a piece of me went with him," said Sonia Wills, the mother of Conrad E. Johnson, who was fatally shot on Oct. 22, 2002. "I'll never get over Conrad," Mrs. Wills said, addressing Muhammad directly.

"I refuse to call your name, sir. You took my son, sir, in the hopes that you would snatch your children," she said. "You are the devil's advocate. You will never see or hear of your children again." Muhammad looked down as the family members spoke.

"It's a shame you cannot look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives you have ruined," Mrs. Wills said.

Ola Martin, whose brother James D. Martin was the first Montgomery County sniper victim, emphasized her brother's belief in "respect and courtesy" for all people.

"Jim spent his life fighting for the rights of others, and yet this coward, this bully, this cold-blooded killer, robbed him of all his rights," Mrs. Martin said.

During the trial, Malvo, 21, called the man who was once a father figure for him a "coward" who pulled the trigger in 10 of the 13 shootings.

Malvo also testified that Muhammad hates the United States and believes that "the white man is the devil."

Malvo has signed a plea agreement and will be transferred back to Red Onion State Prison in Southwestern Virginia once he has been sentenced.

A Chesapeake, Va., jury in 2003 found Malvo guilty of his role in the Meyers murder and sentenced him to life in prison with no parole possibility.

"I am not proud of myself, and I'm just trying to make amends, if possible," Malvo said when asked why he testified against Muhammad.

The six victims killed in Montgomery County were:

· James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39, landscaper, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 7:41 a.m., while mowing grass in White Flint.

· Premkumar A. Walekar, 54, cab driver, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 8:12 a.m., while pumping gas in Aspen Hill.

· Sarah Ramos, 34, housekeeper, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 8:37 a.m., while sitting on a bench in Silver Spring.

· Lori-Ann Lewis Rivera, 25, mother and homemaker, fatally shot on Oct. 3, at 9:58 a.m., while vacuuming a minivan in Kensington.

· Conrad E. Johnson, 35, bus driver, fatally shot on Oct. 22, at 5:55 a.m., on his Ride-On bus in Aspen Hill.

Muhammad Gets 6 Life Terms In Md. Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

(AP) - ROCKVILLE, Md.-Twice-convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad was sentenced Thursday to six consecutive life terms in prison with no possibility of parole, a sentence prosecutors consider insurance in case his Virginia death sentence is ever overturned.

"You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future. You will spend every day for the rest of your life locked in a cage," Montgomery County Circuit Judge James Ryan said.

Muhammad, 45, showed no emotion as the sentenced was announced. He stood with his arms crossed, looking directly at Ryan. Some in the audience applauded.

After representing himself throughout the monthlong trial, Muhammad chose not to speak at his sentencing. J. Wyndal Gordon, an attorney helping him, said Muhammad told him, "I said everything I wanted to say."

Several relatives of victims spoke before the sentencing, including Nelson Rivera, who described how his young daughter wanted to die so she could be reunited with her mother, Lori Lewis-Rivera.

"He not only killed my wife, he killed me, he killed my daughter and all the rest of the family," Rivera told Ryan.

Muhammad was convicted Tuesday of six counts of murder for six of the 10 deadly sniper attacks that terrorized the Washington area in October 2002. He was already under a death sentence in Virginia for a killing there.

This time, Muhammad's young accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, took the stand for the first time to testify against him. Malvo told jurors how the older man, his one-time mentor, trained him to shoot and drew him into a sinister plan to kill people, including children, indiscriminately.

Jurors deliberated less than five hours before finding Muhammad guilty.

Malvo, sentenced to life in prison in Virginia, had agreed to plead guilty in the Maryland killings. He was not promised leniency but told jurors he wanted to face the man who he said trained him to be a killer.

He called Muhammad a "coward" and, at one point, glared at him, saying: "You took me into your house and you made me a monster."

Muhammad called him "son" and questioned Malvo's credibility, saying the 21-year-old had problems with exaggeration and memory.

He also claimed he was framed by investigators who planted and fabricated evidence and said he was the victim of a broad law enforcement conspiracy.

Muhammad's legal adviser argued to the judge Thursday that Muhammad did not get a fair trial, saying evidence and witnesses that could have proven his innocence were not allowed into the courtroom.

"We came here to search for justice, we came here to seek the truth, to find out what happened in those 23 days in October," he said. "We fell short. I don't think anyone can celebrate the convictions in this matter."

Muhammad could be returned to Virginia's death row as early as Thursday afternoon, according to Darren Popkin, Montgomery County chief deputy sheriff. Malvo likely will remain in Maryland until he formally enters a plea in October.

Other states still have outstanding charges against Muhammad from earlier shootings, including Louisiana and Alabama. It will be up to Virginia whether to send him away again for further prosecution.

Muhammad Gets Six Life Terms (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, June 2, 2006

ROCKVILLE -- More than three years after a sniper's bullet felled Conrad Johnson as he stood in the doorway of a Montgomery County bus, Sonia Wills had the opportunity Thursday to confront her son's convicted killer.

Calling John Allen Muhammad the "devil's advocate," Wills bore into the 45-year-old Gulf War veteran as he looked downward, toward papers at the defense table.

"It is a shame you will not look at us to see the lives you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined," Wills told Muhammad.

Wills was one of four relatives of Muhammad's victims who spoke at a hearing at which he was sentenced to six consecutive life terms with no possibility of parole for sniper shootings in Montgomery County in the fall of 2002.

Though the relatives of victims expected no apology from Muhammad, several expressed revulsion at his refusal to acknowledge the grieving speakers.

Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan pointedly noted that Muhammad would live out his days "locked in a cage" while grieving families and a terrorized community would forge ahead with their lives.

DOJ_NMG_0031469

"You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence," Ryan told a grimacing Muhammad, who stood with his arms folded across his chest as he awaited sentencing.

"You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future," Ryan said before imposing the maximum sentence.

Shortly afterward, deputy sheriffs returned Muhammad to a prison in Waverly, Va., where he is on death row for a seventh sniper slaying, said Montgomery County Sheriff's Department Deputy Chief Darren Popkin.

Outside the courtroom, Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, a candidate for Maryland attorney general, said that anyone who questioned whether the county that suffered the most should try this case "should be ashamed of themselves."

Some had criticized the expense of the trial, with the cost of housing and providing security for Muhammad and Malvo exceeding $600,000. Gansler and others argued that the trial was needed as "insurance" in case Muhammad's sniper conviction and death sentence in Virginia were overturned on appeal, and to help the victims' families and the community put the case behind them.

Thursday, the hostility in the full courtroom toward the man believed to have masterminded a violent cross-country rampage with a teenager as his puppet, was palpable. Observers applauded Ryan's sentence as the tearful relatives of victims hugged.

Wills told Muhammad that he would never see his children again -- a reminder of Muhammad's opening remarks from the trial's start nearly a month ago. Maintaining innocence, he had told jurors that losing his children in a custody war was "my 9/11" and that he came east to reclaim them.

The words of Nelson Rivera, whose wife Lori Ann Lewis-Rivera was gunned down as she vacuumed her van, moved people in the courtroom to tears. The couple's 7-year-old daughter, Jocelin, talks of dying so that she can join her mother.

"She knows her mom is dead, but she is just hoping when she is going to die. That is what I am living now because of Mr. Muhammad," Rivera said.

"That worries me," he said outside the courtroom.

Every year, with Mother's Day and her mother's birthday near each other, Jocelin selects a plant in memory of her. Last month, Jocelin chose morning glories for the front of their home outside Sacramento, Calif., Rivera said.

Now, after three trials -- two for Muhammad and one for admitted accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo -- Rivera said he has no answer when she asks why her mother was killed.

"She wants these bad guys to say 'sorry' to her for her mom," Rivera said. "He's cold. No feeling at all."

Though permitted to address the court, Muhammad, who acted as his own lawyer through Tuesday's guilty verdicts, chose to stand in silence Thursday, letting one of his stand-by lawyers take over. Attorney J. Wyndal Gordon said Muhammad told him, "I said all I have to say."

Last Friday, in a nearly 3 1/2-hour rambling closing argument, Muhammad said he had no remorse because he was not guilty.

Victims' relatives said that after Muhammad's closing argument, they were glad that he didn't speak.

Muhammad had contended that he and the state's star witness, Malvo, were framed in a vast law enforcement conspiracy. He continued to call Malvo "my son" throughout the trial, though Malvo blamed Muhammad for indoctrinating him and said the senior member of the sniper team was the triggerman for most of the shootings. Defense lawyer Gordon referred to Malvo as Muhammad's son in brief remarks Thursday.

But Muhammad had produced little to dent prosecutors' overwhelming forensic case, which Malvo capped with a gripping account of the shootings. Malvo has agreed to plead guilty to the same six slayings for which Muhammad was tried.

Through DNA, fingerprints and the bullet analysis, prosecutors linked the duo to the high-velocity rifle stowed behind the back seat of Muhammad's car and to the crimes. A juror said Muhammad's voice in court sounded just like that on a voice recorder found in Muhammad's car.

Three jurors returned to court for the sentencing. One, who asked to be identified only as Debbie, said she was pleased with the sentence but wished that the death penalty had been an option. She said Muhammad's closing argument did not help him.

"You could see the anger behind him, especially during the closing," she said. "He raised his voice, his eyes were wide."

Juror Claudia Lopez-Cuevas, 21, an employee with the Montgomery County Department of Correction and Rehabilitation, disagreed that Muhammad should have received another death sentence.

"Life in prison sounds like he got what he deserved," she said.

"When he defended himself, he showed no remorse. In his mind, he really thinks he didn't do this," she said. "Even though he says he's innocent, the evidence is clear."

Muhammad is unlikely to serve the Maryland sentence, which is to begin after the Virginia death sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0031470

The sniper slayings terrorized the Washington region for three weeks in October 2002. Thirteen people were shot, 10 fatally, as people from Baltimore to Richmond lived in fear that they might be next in the cross hairs. On Tuesday, the jury convicted Muhammad in the murders of James D. Martin, 55; James L. "Sonny" Buchanan Jr., 39; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; Sarah Ramos, 34, and Lewis-Rivera, 25; and Johnson, 35.

In court, Gordon started to complain that Muhammad did not receive a fair trial, but Ryan cut him off, saying such statements belonged in an appeals court.

Gordon extended condolences to the victims' families. But, he told the judge, "I'm not convinced Mr. Muhammad is the man."

Despite some contentious moments -- Ryan once threatened to hold Gordon in contempt -- Ryan praised the stand-by legal team for its dedication and long, unpaid hours. Muhammad had fired his public defenders after they said he was mentally ill. The judge promised to search for funds to reimburse the stand-by lawyers from Baltimore -- Gordon, A. Jai Bonner and Russell Neverdon Sr. -- for their expenses.

Asked what Muhammad was writing before he was removed from the courtroom, Gordon replied that Muhammad was signing his appeals notices.

By Ernesto Londoño And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

As his last act in a Maryland courtroom, John Allen Muhammad chose silence.

The man convicted twice of terrorizing the Washington area with a powerful rifle and an impressionable accomplice betrayed no emotion yesterday as relatives of the people he killed spoke of their loss. He remained impassive as a judge sentenced him to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"You chose the wrong community, sir, to stain with your acts of violence," Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan told Muhammad. "You, Mr. Muhammad, have no hope. You have no future. You'll spend the rest of your life locked in a cage."

J. Wyndal Gordon, one of Muhammad's stand-by lawyers, maintained that Muhammad -- who doggedly defended himself during the month-long trial -- is an innocent man who was not allowed to tell his side of the story.

"We came here in search for justice," Wyndal said. "We came here in the search for the truth, to find out what really happened during those 23 days in October. My humble opinion is that we fell short."

What took place in the snipers' blue 1990 Chevrolet Caprice in October 2002 has never been clearer to the relatives of sniper victims, however, because the Maryland trial included the testimony of Muhammad's accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo.

Yesterday, four of those relatives stood just a few feet from Muhammad and told him of their anger and their heartache.

"You took my son from me in the hopes that you would snatch your children," said Sonia Wills, the mother of sniper victim Conrad Johnson, referring to Muhammad's apparent plot to reclaim the children he had lost in a custody dispute. "I know we will never see Conrad again. And you are the devil's advocate. You will never see or hug your children again. It's only a shame you cannot look at us to see the people you have devastated, the lives that you have ruined."

Muhammad didn't flinch, and his eyes remained cast down.

Nelson Rivera, the husband of Lori Ann Lewis-Rivera, described how much he struggled to explain to his young daughter what had happened to her mother.

"What I want to say is he not only killed my wife," Rivera said. "He killed me. He killed my daughter and all the rest of the family. You have no idea how hard it is to tell a 3 ½-year-old her mom got killed."

Ola Martin-Border, James Martin's sister, said she wishes she could have protected her "little brother" one last time.

"I was his big sister, but I wasn't there to protect him," Martin-Border said. "I would have taken that bullet myself. Gladly. But I wasn't there. I couldn't be there for him. And I couldn't even be there to comfort him."

Their voices, at intervals soft and thunderous, brought tears to the eyes of spectators in the courtroom, some intimately affected by the case.

Outside, State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, flanked by relatives of sniper victims, faced a wall of cameras to hail the sentence.

"Anyone who suggested that this trial shouldn't be brought to Montgomery County should be ashamed," he said of people who questioned the need for another trial after Muhammad had been convicted of murder in Virginia.

His deputy, Katherine Winfree, who prosecuted the case, said that although the county is no stranger to violent crimes, Muhammad is in a league of his own.

DOJ_NMG_0031471

"No one has ever stood before a judge in this county with more on his conscience and more crimes to his discredit than John Allen Muhammad," Winfree said.

The trial prosecutors and a small group of sniper task force members left the courtroom sporting weary smiles. Some hugged victims' relatives, revealing bonds forged during the investigation and three trials.

"Yes, it brought them some closure," said Sgt. Roger Thomson, a Montgomery homicide investigator who played a key role in the investigation. "And, yes, it brought some closure to Montgomery County. Justice was done, and I can't wait to get them out of the state. This man -- he can't even look at these people in the face. The only thing you see in his eyes is hate."

Muhammad, 45, has been convicted in seven of the 10 October 2002 sniper slayings and is on death row in Virginia. Malvo, 21, who has been convicted of one killing in Virginia, has agreed to plead guilty to the six Maryland slayings. He is expected to return to Virginia to serve a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Muhammad and Malvo could be prosecuted in other states, including Louisiana and Alabama, where they allegedly shot people.

As Ryan announced the sentence, Muhammad began scribbling on a notepad. Gordon later said he was drafting an appeal to the sentence.

"Mr. Muhammad, on behalf of all the people in this community, I order the sheriffs to take you into their custody, remove you from this courtroom, from this county and from this state," Ryan said. "Sheriff, take this man into your custody."

As he was escorted out in handcuffs, a short but hearty round of applause spread through the room.

Before suppertime, Muhammad had been transferred to the Sussex 1 State Prison in Waverly, Va., home to all death row inmates in that state.

Reputations Bruised As 'bagman' Opens Up (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 2, 2006

A longtime aide to Roscoe Dixon testified Thursday the former state senator had him handle bribe money and that Dixon also sometimes directed him to give portions to Kathryn Bowers and other legislators.

In his second day on the witness stand in Dixon's federal extortion and bribery trial, Barry Myers watched himself on surveillance tapes telling an informant that Dixon trusted him "like a son" and that his boss was paranoid and "scared of his own (expletive) shadow" about getting caught taking payoffs.

Advertisement

In a tape made Feb. 12, 2004, by informant Tim Willis, Myers counts out $100 bills, six stacks of 10 each, that Willis has placed on a coffee table on behalf of a fictitious FBI company called E-Cycle Management, Inc.

Dixon says "Throw me one of them stacks, man," but quickly declines when Myers reaches for one that has red markings on the top bill. Myers then gives Dixon a second stack, which he conceals inside a booklet before leaving.

"It's just that he gets so (expletive) paranoid and shaky, man," Myers tells Willis on the tape after Dixon leaves.

Myers said he kept $2,000 for himself and gave the rest to Dixon later that evening. Myers said Dixon then told him to take $2,000 and deliver part of it to Bowers and part to Dixon's sister, who needed to pay her light bill.

The testimony came on the second day of Dixon's trial in which he is accused of taking $9,500 in illegal payoffs to support legislation favorable to the fake E-Cycle company that was part of the FBI's sting.

Operation Tennessee Waltz, as the agents called it, resulted in 10 indictments, including Dixon, Bowers, John Ford and two other past or present state legislators.

Dixon contends he was entrapped by Willis and undercover FBI agents posing as corrupt businessmen, and that Myers sought payments without Dixon's approval or knowledge.

Myers also was indicted and last year pleaded guilty to bribery and extortion charges and began cooperating with federal prosecutors. He is awaiting sentencing.

"And when did you get this morality attack?" defense attorney Coleman Garrett asked Myers.

"It's not a morality attack," Myers insisted. "I wanted to correct a wrong."

He said he has not been promised anything for his testimony, but that he hopes that by telling the truth "I would get a reduction in my prison sentence."

In afternoon testimony, Myers is heard on tape telling an undercover FBI operative posing as an E-Cycle executive that the "heavy hitters" in the Tennessee legislature were on board with pushing legislation favorable to the company.

He names legislators Dixon, Bowers, Ford and Lois DeBerry, who has not been charged with any crime.

On the tape, Myers tells undercover FBI agent "L.C. McNeil" that he's the man who handles the money for the legislators, who he refers to as "the big juice."

At one point, he says of Dixon, "I'm his boy. I'm his bagman."

On that tape and others played for the jury, Myers talks of concerns of FBI or TBI investigations into bribery schemes and tells McNeil that City Councilman Rickey Peete "went to prison for that, you know, takin' money and stuff."

When McNeil wants to know how he'll be sure the money is getting to Dixon and he's getting something in return, Myers says they could set up a kind of code, where Dixon might call him and thank him for "taking care of Barry." He also said they might refer to the money as "tickets."

One secret video, shot from a hidden camera in the back seat of Willis's car, shows Willis in the driver's seat and Myers in the passenger seat on Aug. 26, 2003. The two had discussed the Children's Dental Clinic, which was trying to get a contract with TennCare, the state's healthcare program for the poor. They can be seen counting out $100 bills into two envelopes, $2,000 in each.

Myers said Dixon told him to take the money to Bowers.

"One was going to Kathryn Bowers and one was going to Roscoe Dixon," Myers testified.

After video of Myers getting out of the car and then returning, he testified: "I just gave Kathryn Bowers the envelope with the money in it. She put it in her car, the trunk."

Myers said that when he later mentioned to Dixon that Willis had the E-Cycle company as a client, the senator "told me to see if I could get anything from Tim." Myers said that meant money.

Defense attorney Garrett noted there was no recording of that exchange.

During a lengthy tape-recorded discussion about E-Cycle, Dixon asks Willis what kind of legislation E-Cycle wants. Willis says once E-Cycle gets a contract, the company could go public and "they'll all be damn near millionaires."

The trial before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla resumes this morning.

Reputations Bruised As 'bagman' Opens Up (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 2, 2006

Reputations went on trial Thursday in federal court when prosecutors played secret tapes that included allegations of payoffs to uncharged politicians.

On those tapes, played during the second day of testimony in former state senator Roscoe Dixon's bribery trial, confessed "bag man" Barry Myers brags to an undercover FBI agent about delivering money to several local public officials.

Myers' credibility also came under heavy attack when he acknowledged embellishing some of his claims involving Dixon.

Among his most explosive claims, Myers said he had delivered money over the years from unnamed businessmen to Lois DeBerry, D-Memphis, speaker pro tem of the Tennessee House.

Myers also named U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr. and his father and predecessor in the seat, Harold Ford, saying, "... they send me to pick up bags of money."

The taped statements triggered sharp denials from the uncharged parties. Some expressed frustration that they had no standing to defend themselves from the claims played out in a public court.

"They are totally -- totally -- untrue, with absolutely no basis in fact," DeBerry said. "I'm so disappointed."

Ford Jr., D-Memphis, said he hardly even knows Myers.

"I've never asked anyone to break the law," he said. "It's so crazy, it's hard to even respond."

A law professor cautioned that observers shouldn't put too much stock in claims that arise about uncharged individuals during criminal proceedings.

"This bag man is trying to build up his own credentials in the underworld context," said Ron Rychlak, a former criminal defense lawyer and now a law professor at the University of Mississippi.

"He has every reason in the world to embellish his credentials by tarnishing these other individuals. You can't put too much credence in this kind of stuff."

Indeed, Myers admitted Thursday under cross-examination he had embellished some of his taped claims about Dixon, 56, who's charged with taking $9,500 in bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover corruption sting.

Myers had claimed on one tape that he once covered for Dixon when the senator had an extramarital affair, yet Myers admitted in testimony that there was no affair.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett, who has portrayed Myers as a crook and a liar, got him to admit he had lied when he was first questioned by the FBI about his Waltz involvement, yet Myers said he did it to protect Dixon.

Myers, 39, pleaded guilty last fall to acting as a bag man for Dixon and a second Waltz defendant, state Sen. Kathryn Bowers. He is now a government witness and is awaiting sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0031473

Myers has given often scintillating testimony over the past two days as prosecutors played undercover tapes made during the Waltz probe when Myers had no idea he was being recorded.

In a taped conversation with an undercover agent on May 14, 2004, Myers bragged he had delivered "suitcases of money" over the years to Dixon, and said he delivered money to other African-American politicians, too.

"To be honest with you, most of the money I used to pick up come from white folks ... white males, established businessmen that would send money to Kathryn, Lois, Roscoe and John," Myers says on the tape.

It's a reference to Waltz defendants Kathryn Bowers, Roscoe Dixon and John Ford, as well as Lois DeBerry.

DeBerry has admitted taking $200 from an undercover Waltz agent to gamble in Tunica but hasn't been charged.

On another point in the tape, Myers claims he works for the Ford family, too.

"I don't know if you knew our first congressman, his name Harold Ford Sr. ... His son Harold Jr. I mean they send me to pick up bags of money. ... I mean and trust me (to) bring every penny back."

On a June 2004 tape, Myers said state Rep. Larry Miller, D-Memphis, "got a $5 million contract" with the Tennessee Lottery for a friend, businessman J.W. Gibson, now a Democratic nominee for County Commission.

Gibson's company, Tec-Print holds a subcontract to print lottery tickets, but he and Miller both said there was nothing untoward in the deal.

"What Mr. Myers is referring to, I have no idea," Miller said.

While it may appear to some that names of uncharged parties are being unfairly tossed out at the trial, a former prosecutor said it's unavoidable that some innocent parties become entwined in criminal evidence.

It's up to the jury to decide if Myers is lying about some things, but in the end, Dixon's guilt or innocence will hinge on whether he's seen taking bribes on tape, said former U.S. attorney Hickman Ewing.

"Whether (Myers) is a liar or not, there it is."

Waltz Jurors Watch Senator Take Cash (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), June 2, 2006

MEMPHIS — Federal court jurors watched a video Wednesday showing a state senator picking up a stack of $100 bills put before him by an aide and an FBI informant.

The video clip was played at the trial of former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon's trial on bribery and extortion charges stemming from the Tennessee Waltz corruption investigation.

On the video secretly recorded in February 2004, Dixon aide Barry Myers lays out $6,000 from informant Tim Willis in stacks of $1,000 each on a coffee table. Dixon, sitting on a sofa beside the table, makes small talk with Myers and Willis about politics, business and professional wrestling before getting up to leave for another appointment.

"Throw me one of those stacks," Dixon tells Myers, then pockets the money and leaves.

Testifying as a witness against Dixon, Myers said the money was to pay for the senator's help in getting a favorable state law passed for a company called E-Cycle Management, which was supposedly interested in buying and selling used government computers.

E-Cycle, Myers and Dixon found out later, was a fake company set up by the FBI to snag state lawmakers and other Tennessee officials looking for bribes.

Myers has pleaded guilty to passing along bribes to Dixon and Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis, and is awaiting sentencing.

Myers said he met with Dixon after the videotaped meeting and gave him another $1,000. Myers said he kept $2,000 for himself and set the rest aside to pass along to Bowers and a Dixon relative having financial troubles.

Dixon, a Memphis Democrat, and Bowers are among five current or former state lawmakers charged in the extortion and bribery investigation. Dixon was in the state Legislature for 22 years until his resignation from the Senate a few months before he was indicted last year.

Bowers remains in the Senate and is awaiting trial.

Agents working on the two-year investigation made hundreds of audio and video recordings, most of them with the help of informant Willis, a convicted felon and former business consultant.

In an audio recording played for the jury, Dixon, Myers and Willis talk about changes E-Cycle executives supposedly want to make in the proposed law they have gotten before the state Legislature.

A voice identified as Dixon tells Willis to get more information from E-Cycle executives. "They need to clarify in writing what they want ... they're all over the map," Dixon says.

Willis then asks how much Dixon and Myers need to be paid, suggesting "about six," which Myers said meant $6,000.

Dixon doesn't respond directly to the money question. "Work through Barry ... keep Barry happy," the lawmaker says.

When prosecutor Tim DiScenza asked Myers what that meant, he testified, "Give me the money so it won't pass through his hands."

Myers said Dixon was "paranoid" about handling bribe money himself.

Dixon, accused of seeking a total of $9,500 in bribes, is the first lawmaker charged in the scandal to go to trial.

Former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty and is serving a one-year prison sentence. Former Chattanooga lobbyist Charles Love, a second "bag man" charged with handling bribes for lawmakers, also has pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing.

Also awaiting trial are Sen. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga, D-Chattanooga, and former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis.

Two Shelby County officials charged in the investigation have pleaded not guilty, and a Hamilton County commissioner was found guilty at trial and sentenced to three years in prison.

Tennessee Waltz: The "Bag Man" Testifies (WPTY-TV)

WPTY-TV, June 2, 2006

The so-called "bag man" took the stand Wednesday in the trial of former Tennessee state senator Roscoe Dixon. Barry Myers said he accepted bribe money for Dixon. The FBI videotape shown as evidence during his testimony seems to back up his story!

Prosecutors are just getting started with Myers. It was almost 5pm when he was sworn in, but in that short time jurors got the chance to hear Myers' story behind the video shown earlier in the day. Barry Myers says the video played in court Tuesday shows him accepting $4000 from FBI informant Tim Willis in what was at the time state senator Roscoe Dixon's office. He says he split the money with Dixon.

The bribe was not connected to E-Cycle, the dummy company set up by the FBI to target crooked law makers in the Tennessee waltz sting, but it goes back to a scandal involving the Children's Dental Clinic and TennCare certification.

Lawyers for the government say tapes like this lead to Dixon's investigation. In the tapes Dixon says, "What I want to say is support Kathryn Bowers. She's been fighting for this thing big time." Myers said from the witness stand that Dixon was talking about a pay off.

The tapes also said: Dixon: let's just use Barry. I don't want to touch it, but I'm going to help you because of Barry and that way I can honestly say (unintelligible). . .

Myers: Yeah he didn't (unintelligible). . .

Dixon: and I'll show Barry what to do and Barry knows how to stay in the background.

Tape Shows Dixon Pocket Cash (TENN)

Jurors see recordings FBI made during Tennessee Waltz probe

MEMPHIS — With $1,000 in hundred-dollar bills wrapped inside a magazine, former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon left the home of a friend who was seeking his help passing legislation.

Prosecutors say it was the Memphis Democrat's first payoff for helping an upstart computer-recycling company get a leg up in securing business from state government.

Earlier in the evening, after Dixon's friend and "bagman" Barry Myers, counted out six piles of $1,000 each onto a coffee table, Dixon had said, "Throw me one of them stacks, man."

This was revealed in a video recording that jurors watched Thursday during the second day of Dixon's federal trial on bribery and extortion charges.

Later that evening in February 2004, Dixon would get even more money from the rest of the $6,000 he had left behind at lobbyist Tim Willis' house for Myers to deliver to him, star witness Myers testified during his second day on the stand.

Dixon would get another $1,000; Myers kept $2,000; and Dixon would direct Myers to divide the remaining $2,000 between then-Rep. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis, and Dixon's sister, who needed help paying her electricity bill, Myers told jurors.

After Dixon left, Myers told Willis — a government informant who was secretly recording their activities — that Dixon took $1,000 immediately so "he could run out to the casinos," the video showed.

The government's case so far has largely relied on audio and video recordings of the former senator and others discussing E-Cycle Management Inc., which wanted the help of lawmakers to pass favorable legislation and was willing to pay them for it.

DOJ_NMG_0031475

Some of the recordings have mentioned Bowers, former Sen. John Ford, D-Memphis, and House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry, D-Memphis, throwing their support to E-Cycle. Bowers and Ford also have been charged and, like Dixon, pleaded not guilty and are going to trial.

Myers pleaded guilty last August. Dixon is the first to go to trial among the current or former legislators who were charged.

E-Cycle, it turned out, was a fake company the FBI set up as part of a sting named Operation Tennessee Waltz. The sting became public a year ago.

Thursday afternoon, Dixon's attorney quizzed Myers on his motives for involving Dixon, suggesting that Myers had no other real source of income.

Attorney Coleman Garrett also suggested that the $1,000 Dixon took could have been a campaign contribution and that there were no witnesses who saw Myers turn over more money to Dixon.

A Dixon supporter who attended the trial as a spectator said he did not believe the recordings were incriminating.

"You hear them saying to Roscoe, 'I need your support.' Of course, Roscoe will tell a friend, 'You've got my support,' " said Del Gill, 56, an active Democrat in Memphis and retired industrial engineer.

Gill noted that $1,000 is the same amount other legislators, such as Sen. Jeff Miller, who have not been charged in Tennessee Waltz, got from E-Cycle.

Friends such as Gill, along with Dixon's wife, neighbors and pastors, attended the trial Thursday.

In his testimony, Myers said that he told Dixon about Willis' work with E-Cycle and was seeking Dixon's help to help Willis.

Dixon "told me to see if I could get anything from Tim," Myers said.

Federal prosecutors contend that Myers and Dixon had formed a criminal partnership, not just to extort money by using Dixon's public office, but to protect Dixon from prosecution if they got caught.

In the video recording, Willis told Dixon, "I'll have a little something for you." Dixon responded, "Work through Barry. … Keep Barry happy."

Myers told Willis that Dixon was paranoid about getting caught taking bribes, saying Dixon almost got caught in the 1980s Rocky Top scandal. At no time would Dixon take the money directly, Myers said.

That way, if they were ever caught, Myers could take the heat and say the money was being paid to him as a consultant.

Myers described other moments that he served as a loyal bagman for Dixon, telling one undercover agent that when he took a "suitcase of money" to Dixon, the senator got every penny.

Myers did not seem suspicious during the sting.

In the video recording, Myers told Willis that Dixon was nervous about hidden cameras, not knowing one was trained on him at that very moment.

Prosecutor: Video Shows Bribery Not First For Senator (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 2, 2006

There were more damaging tapes played Thursday in the bribery trial against former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon.

The tapes showed Dixon in the room as large amounts of money were changing hands. Prosecutors said it has happened more than once.

One tape showed Dixon at his desk. He leaned back and watched as money changed hands in front of him.

Prosecutors said an FBI informant handed $4,000 to Dixon's trusted aid Barry Myers. They said that money was so the senator would help a Memphis dental clinic get credentials in TennCare. It was after that transaction the FBI set up a fake company called eCycle and tried to bribe other lawmakers.

Thursday, prosecutors showed another video in which Dixon watched again as an FBI informant put $6,000 on the table. Dixon walked away with $1,000.

Myers, who already plead guilty, testified he took the rest and gave some to Dixon's sister, Sen. Kathryn Bowers, who has also been charged.

Dixon's defense attorney said he wants people to keep an open mind.

"We realize that that was basis for the government's case, and that's what we were confronted with. And that's the hurdles we're going to have to overcome," Coleman Garrett said.

The defense said the FBI entrapped Dixon.

The trial is scheduled to last for three weeks.

Sorich Defense Blasts Prosecution Witness (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 2, 2006

The lawyer for Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief aggressively attacked the credibility of a key prosecution witness in the City Hall corruption trial Thursday, suggesting the witness agreed to wear a hidden recording device to shorten his prison stay.

Defense attorney Thomas Anthony Durkin portrayed retired city official Daniel Katalinic, 54, as a crook with little choice but to help the federal investigation of alleged corruption in the Daley administration.

Katalinic pleaded guilty last year to one mail fraud count, admitting he got $15,000 in bribes from city trucking contractors. He said he hoped his cooperation would earn a lesser sentence—as little as half of the 2-year minimum prison term.

"A year and a day is a real good deal for what you got caught doing, isn't it?" Durkin asked Katalinic during cross-examination.

"I guess so," Katalinic replied, shrugging.

But Katalinic's two-day testimony provided damning accounts of the roles that Durkin's client, Robert Sorich, and three other city officials allegedly played in city hiring. Sorich, Daley's former patronage chief, is on trial with Timothy McCarthy, his assistant in the mayor's office, and ex-Streets and Sanitation officials Patrick Slattery and John Sullivan.

Prosecutors say they schemed to fix jobs and promotions in favor of applicants with clout, including pro-Daley political workers. The fraud allegedly was perpetrated to get around legal restrictions that ostensibly had curtailed the city's long tradition of patronage hiring and machine politics.

Katalinic said he was part of the patronage scheme, leading a "white ethnic" political group of about 300 city workers for Daley, U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and other candidates on commands from the mayor's office. Sorich and McCarthy helped secure jobs and promotions for the most dedicated of his political group, Katalinic said.

He alleged that Sullivan directed him to recruit city workers to make phone calls to potential voters. And he said Slattery complained to him that he could not get jobs and promotions for his own group of 11th Ward political workers, because the pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization got many coveted spots.Katalinic acknowledged that he agreed to cooperate with investigators after learning that they had caught him on tape discussing bribes he took. Katalinic secretly recorded a conversation with Sorich.

"I bet that was a tough pill to swallow?" Durkin asked Katalinic.

"Yes, it was," Katalinic replied.

"That's not how you were brought up on the East Side," Durkin said.

Katalinic, a broad-shouldered product of former Ald. Edward Vrdolyak's 10th Ward Democrats, looked down and shook his head. But prosecutors objected to Durkin's question before Katalinic could reply.

Prosecutors did not play the recording Katalinic made of his conversation with Sorich. The defense has said the conversation helps exonerate Sorich, in part because he advises Katalinic to tell the truth to federal agents.

Durkin asked Katalinic whether he had complained that former Sen. Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) selected an aggressive prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, as U.S. attorney in Chicago.

Prosecutors objected before Katalinic could answer about either of the Fitzgeralds, who are unrelated. But Durkin entered into evidence a transcript of a conversation that authorities secretly recorded between Katalinic and a Streets and Sanitation worker.

"Nobody could be worse than [Peter] Fitzgerald was," Katalinic said on the tape. "That's why you've got these U.S. attorneys running all over the place, starting all kinds of [stuff]."

Katalinic acknowledged he used to be a heavy gambler. After retiring from Streets and Sanitation in 2003 as a deputy commissioner, he lobbied the city for Allied Waste, the Daley administration's blue bag recycling contractor.

Katalinic also pointed the finger at his former boss, retired Streets and Sanitation Commissioner Al Sanchez. Sanchez, a leader of the Hispanic Democratic Organization, has not been charged.

To underscore his assertions that Katalinic turned on friends to spare himself, Durkin showed jurors Katalinic's resignation letter to Sanchez.

"It has been a learning experience made only easier by following the lead of a commissioner who is fair and honest in every part of our daily working relationship," Katalinic wrote.

Defense attorneys questioned whether it was Sorich or Sanchez who arranged for jobs as city truck drivers for Katalinic's political workers in 2004. Katalinic testified that the city hired nine of 10 truck driver hopefuls that he sponsored.

Katalinic said he could not remember whether Sorich or Sanchez helped in that case. It did not matter, he said, because Daley's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs had the final say.

"Al would always tell me, 'I've got to get the OK from IGA,'" Katalinic said.

Witness In Sorich Trial Says Politics Got Workers City Jobs (WLS-TV)

WLS-TV, June 2, 2006

Politics, not experience, got people job with the City of Chicago. That's the prosecution's claim in the trial of Mayor Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich. Thursday, a different take from witnesses.

Retired deputy commissioner of the Streets and Sanitation Department, Daniel Katalinic was on the witness stand for a second day. Defense attorneys had their turn with the man who cut a deal with the government to avoid a lengthy prison sentence. Katalinic was originally charged with Sorich and three others but pleaded guilty.

Daniel Katalinic knew he could no longer fight a federal investigation once the feds told the former streets and sanitation official that they had him on tape. Defense attorney Tom Durkin asked him, "You knew you were toast?" Katalinic said, "Yes." Katalinic testified that he hired the best plea bargain lawyer in town and cut a deal with the government. The attorney asked if he was at the US attorney's mercy. Katalinic said, "Yes."

The deal Katalinic cut with the government included Thursday's testimony against Robert Sorich and three other former City Hall employees. Katalinic told the jury, with Sorich's recommendation, he organized a political organization that worked on Mayor Daley's campaigns as well as the campaigns of pro-Daley candidates. In exchange for their hard work, Katalinic promised his political workers that he would help them get city jobs and promotions.

Katalinic sent lists of candidates to Robert Sorich and Sorich's aide Timothy McCarthy, who is also on trial. Katalinic prioritized the names based on how much political work they did. But under cross-examination Katalinic admitted that the first name on the list wasn't only his best political worker, but one of his best friends. Katalinic's nephew was also the list.

Katalinic also told the jury that he knew there would be no guarantees that any of the people on his list would get jobs or promotions. In the end, the majority did. Even though Katalinic testified that Sorich had the final say, Durkin said, "You're not saying that Sorich ran City Hall hiring?" Katalinic responded "No."

Also under cross-examination, Daniel Katalinic admitted he used to be a heavy gambler. Durkin shot back by saying that's when you used to have a lot of money, now your lawyer has all your money.

Meantime, prosecutors never played a tape of a conversation Katalinic had with Robert Sorich when the FBI had Katalanic wear a wire. The defense says the tape actually helps exonerate Sorich.

News Clash Of The Clout Armies (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, STEVE WARMBIR AND FRAN SPIELMAN, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 2, 2006

Political groups competed over the number of city jobs they could give their troops as post-election rewards, and they even complained that the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization got a larger share, a key witness testified Thursday.

But defense lawyers in the City Hall hiring trial quickly attacked Daniel Katalinic's testimony, getting him to grow misty-eyed about his decision to flip for government prosecutors -- and to admit that while political groups did slip lists of names to the Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, there were "no guarantees" they'd be hired.

Katalinic said the requested hires were qualified people and most already worked for the city but sought promotions or different jobs.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

The testimony comes in a trial that accuses Robert Sorich, a top IGA official, and three others of manipulating the city hiring system to hand out jobs as political rewards. Katalinic, deputy commissioner of street operations who cultivated a political army out of city workers, said he'd hand a list of names with corresponding job requests to Sorich and co-defendant Timothy McCarthy.

At one point, Katalinic said, Patrick Slattery, another co-defendant, complained to him that his 11th Ward group wasn't getting rewarded.

"He said he and his workers were getting sent all over doing political work and getting nothing in return," Katalinic told Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Guentert. "He blamed Al Sanchez and HDO. He said they were getting all the positions."

He later told Slattery lawyer Patrick Blegen, though, that Slattery wasn't behind any City Hall hiring.

'You were toast'

Sorich lawyer Tom Durkin ripped into Katalinic's motivation for testifying. Durkin said that last year, federal investigators played Katalinic a secretly recorded conversation he had with John "Quarters" Boyle. The conversation was caught in the Hired Truck investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0031478

"You knew from that moment on you were toast, correct?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Katalinic quickly went from "tough guy to rollover guy," Durkin said, and Katalinic blinked back tears when asked if it was the hardest thing he ever had to do in his life.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Katalinic agreed with Durkin that it was "preposterous" to say that Sorich controlled City Hall hiring, since he reported to higher-ups at the IGA.

"They are the heads of the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs?" Durkin asked.

"Yes," Katalinic said.

Durkin suggested that power went even higher, asking if the mayor didn't run his own office.

"I would think so," Katalinic said. "It's called the mayor's office."

Earlier Thursday, lawyers revealed that federal investigators secretly tapped Katalinic's office and cell phones, recording hundreds of conversations. None of the conversations was played at trial. In one, Katalinic reportedly complains to a city worker that former U.S. Sen. Peter Fitzgerald brought in the aggressive U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald.

"Nobody could be worse than Fitzgerald was," Katalinic said. "That's why you've got these U.S. attorneys running all over the place, starting all kinds of s---."

Leaving the federal courthouse Thursday, Katalinic lamented: "I need some aspirin."

'Scope of testimony' unknown

Meanwhile, City Hall disclosed that Mayor Daley's corporation counsel, Mara Georges, has been subpoenaed by the defense and will testify if she is called.

Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said it's impossible to know if Georges would refuse to answer on grounds that it might be a violation of attorney-client privilege.

"We'd have to know more about what information is being sought. It's not like every conversation is privileged," Hoyle said. "We don't have any information about what their expectations would be about the scope of testimony."

Hoyle denied that Georges' testimony would set a dangerous legal precedent or "constitute a waiver" for all Law Department attorneys on similar issues, including the long-running Shakman case.

Last year, the Daley administration suffered a black eye when the list of cooperating witnesses ended up in the hands of Georges and several influential aldermen. The corporation counsel subsequently acknowledged that she got the list from an attorney representing Sorich.

Ryan Lawyers Set The Stage For Appeal With Fresh Attack On The Jury (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, June 2, 2006

CHICAGO - George Ryan's lawyers set the stage Thursday for the former governor's appeal of his racketeering and fraud conviction by filing 70 pages of court papers asking for a new trial on the grounds that juror misconduct "taints the verdict in this case."

"Justice requires the District Court to set aside a tainted verdict such as this without regard to the length of the trial, the high profile nature of the prosecution, the resources expended or any other issues unrelated to the legal errors that deprived the defendant of a fair trial before an impartial jury," the defense attorneys said.

Much of the document was a painstaking rehashing of the agony that followed the April 18 guilty verdict at the close of a seven-month trial when goings-on in the jury room began to come to light and both sides spent two weeks haggling over whether they showed unfairness to Ryan.

Two jurors ended up hiring lawyers of their own with one attorney coming to court to plead with U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer to put an end to the investigation of the jury.

Pallmeyer eventually ruled that the verdict would stand. Sentencing is set for Aug. 4.

Ryan, 73, and businessman Larry Warner, 67, were convicted of racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses as part of a scheme hatched when he was secretary of state and later governor.

Prosecutors say the evidence shows that Ryan steered state leases and contracts to Warner and other lobbyists and in return received gifts ranging from free vacations to a golf bag.

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined to comment.

"This is an extraordinary case," the defense attorneys said. "False statements, misrepresentations, improper ex parte communications, disclosure of confidential information and a decision-making process influenced by external considerations - a litany not simply of the charges against George Ryan but of the juror misconduct that taints the verdict in this case."

DOJ_NMG_0031479

Juror misconduct was not the sole focus of the document. It also said that prosecutors had failed to provide adequate proof of the charges and that the judge should have allowed the defense to tell jurors more about what Ryan did when he was in power in Springfield.

In specific, defense attorneys pointed to Ryan's opposition to the death penalty, his promotion of a state organ-donor program and his campaign for tougher drunken driving laws.

Asking to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted is standard procedure following a guilty verdict. But such post-trial motions are very rarely granted by the courts.

They do, however, preview the case that the defense takes to the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals as it seeks to have the verdict overturned. Defense attorneys also can use other errors that they believe the judge made before and during the trial as the basis for their appeal.

Arrests In Fumo Probe Spur Debate Over Prosecution Strategy (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 2, 2006

The FBI spent three years investigating powerful state Sen. Vincent Fumo and his ties to a charity run by aides before charging two underlings Wednesday with obstructing justice.

A day later, the obvious question remained: What about Fumo?

Are federal authorities proceeding cautiously? Or do they lack the evidence to make a case against him?

"It tells me that they're trying to either scare the devil out of these two guys who got arrested to obtain their cooperation, or to put the fear of God into other people," said defense lawyer William A. DeStefano, a former federal prosecutor.

"And that sort of tells me that they're not comfortable with their case against the senator."

Others suggested that federal prosecutors _ humbled perhaps by the acquittal of some bankers in the Philadelphia pay-to-play scandal _ want to build an ironclad case.

"It may be that this is a reaction to some of the failures to get convictions without insiders in the last couple of years," said Temple University law professor David Hoffman. "Maybe they're trying to shake the trees.

"But you never know. It could be that they have a case ready to go," he said.

Fumo, the ranking Democrat on the Appropriations Committee, cuts a wide swath in Harrisburg and Philadelphia. As of March, he directly or indirectly supervised 73 people, including 32 in Philadelphia, Statehouse records showed.

The staff members arrested Wednesday morning _ for allegedly deleting years worth of Fumo e-mail sought by the FBI _ were roused from their beds at dawn by federal agents. They appeared stunned to be the center of a media throng at the federal courthouse in Philadelphia.

Hours later, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan released a juicy FBI affidavit that focuses as much on Fumo as it does on the defendants, computer technicians Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister.

The 65-page affidavit _ atypically _ tips Meehan's hand as to the focus and breadth of the probe.

Federal authorities want to know if Fumo extorted corporate donations for a South Philadelphia nonprofit, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods _ including a $17 million gift from Peco Energy Co. They also wonder if he used the nonprofit for his political purposes.

"Normally with political corruption, they'll do all their homework, they'll have a grand jury investigation and then out will come the indictment," DeStefano said.

Luchko, 49, of Collingdale, and Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, both resigned from their longtime jobs, which paid more than $60,000 each, the Senate Clerk's Office said Thursday. But neither plans to cooperate with the Fumo probe, their lawyers said.

Their lawyers said the men had done nothing wrong, and were being used as pawns in an all-out effort to get the senator.

"I'm convinced now more than ever that the reason the government proceeded the way they did, which was highly unusual ... is so they could get their big splash with their affidavit ... and make the point they obviously want to make," lawyer James Schwartzman, who represents Luchko, said Thursday.

The affidavit also discloses some of the evidence that investigators have gathered, such as e-mail that shows Fumo growing frenzied about leaving an electronic trail.

"The FBI probe into the Sen. has really set him off he wants us to start doing a number of security checks starting tomorrow. ... He wants all of the Blackberries wiped (clean of e-mail)" Luchko wrote to Fumo staffers in January 2004.

The FBI also says it has e-mail that shows Fumo directing aides to spend funds from the charity for political polling and other political ends, which could violate its nonprofit tax status.

"I would suggest that we're not finished yet," Meehan said Wednesday.

A CRUMBLING FOUNDATION? DID FUMO USE A NONPROFIT TO CEMENT HIS POLITICAL POWER? (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

WITH TWO of his aides facing federal jail time for allegedly obstructing justice and a highly detailed criminal complaint now in the public record, questions surrounding state Sen. Vince Fumo are beginning to pile up.

Don't expect answers soon, especially from the senator. Other than a slightly overwrought response from his attorney, Dick Sprague, that essentially denies wrongdoing, Fumo is staying mum.

Yet questions persist.

There's the obvious ones such as, is Fumo guilty of anything?

So far, the answer is no, though an investigation is continuing. According to the criminal complaint filed in connection with the arrests of the two Fumo aides, the FBI launched the investigation to determine if Fumo strong-armed Peco to make contributions to Citizens' Alliance, a nonprofit neighborhood organization that's done some good deeds in South Philadelphia, Fumo's political base.

Then there's the less obvious question: At what point does a politician mau-mauing a company into doing what could be argued is a public good become criminal activity?

Aren't politicians supposed to cajole private companies to do more for the communities they're in? Is that now a crime?

It could be if the feds can prove the other part of their inquiry: whether Fumo benefited politically or personally from expenditures made by Citizens' Alliance.

Here the feds may have a convincing case. Foundations, which don't pay taxes, are generally prohibited from making political contributions. Yet the FBI claims to have e-mails from Fumo that indicate he was directing Citizens' Alliance to make grants of a political nature.

Investigators say e-mails sent by Fumo in 2001 directed aides to use Alliance money to pay for programs and memorials that would help the political fortunes of allies and candidates in Pittsburgh and in Bucks County. Other e-mails indicate that Alliance money also was used to fund a lawsuit against a rival state senator and may have been used for political polling, the feds allege.

But other e-mails described by government investigators seem much less suspicious: Fumo ordering that Citizens Alliance pay for repairing a police surveillance van; another directing that money go to paying a bill for the Christopher Columbus Charter School. Isn't this what neighborhood foundations are supposed to do?

Fumo is not the first politician to face tough questions regarding foundations or nonprofits. Sen. Rick Santorum earlier this year was the target of media criticism over his Operation Good Neighbor foundation.

Which prompts this final question: Isn't it time for stricter restrictions on whether politicians should operate foundations at all?

Affidavit: Fumo Involved In Real Estate Deals (PHI)

By Dave Davies

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

Information contained in a federal affidavit released Wednesday casts some doubt on state Sen. Vince Fumo's claim earlier this year that he had no role in a $310,000 real-estate deal involving electrical contractor Donald "Gus" Dougherty, whose office was raided by the FBI in January.

And Fumo may have directed a nonprofit organization's purchase of as many as two dozen properties in South Philadelphia, the affidavit suggests.

Six years ago Donald Dougherty, dubbed by some as "Electrician of the Stars" because of his work for high-powered politicians, sold a Tasker Street warehouse to Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a nonprofit organization whose officers have ties to Fumo.

Spokesmen for Fumo and Citizens Alliance told the Daily News earlier this year that Fumo had nothing to do with the transaction and that Citizens Alliance made its own decisions about such matters.

But the affidavit associated with the arrest of two low-level state Senate employees Wednesday said federal prosecutors have acquired "a series of e-mail communications" in 2000 and 2001 in which Fumo directs Citizens Alliance "to purchase various properties in South Philadelphia."

The affidavit said Fumo instructed an unnamed aide "that he alone would decide which properties are to be purchased" by Citizens Alliance.

"Take all of their calls as suggestions and I will give final approval," Fumo wrote in an e-mail, according to the affidavit.

Citizens Alliance paid Donald Dougherty $310,000 for the Tasker Street property in December 1999. The transaction was recorded in January 2000, property records show.

Labor leader John Dougherty - a friend of but no relation to Donald Dougherty - told the Daily News in April that Fumo had failed to pay Donald Dougherty for extensive work on Fumo's Fairmount mansion but that Fumo had been involved personally in Citizens Alliance's purchase of Dougherty's Tasker Street property.

John Dougherty said he had attended a meeting with Fumo and Donald Dougherty at which the sale was discussed.

Fumo said that he had not recalled meeting Donald Dougherty and that records showed Dougherty had done only a "small amount of work" on his house.

The exact nature of the federal investigation into Donald Dougherty isn't clear. The raid on his business was conducted by the FBI and agents from the IRS and the Labor Department.

Citizens Alliance's purchase of Donald Dougherty's warehouse was far from its only property transaction. A Daily News analysis in November showed Citizens Alliance and its seven subsidiaries bought at least 26 properties in South Philadelphia between 1998 and 2003.

Spokesman Ken Snyder said the Citizens Alliance purchases had been part of an effort to spark neighborhood revitalization.

The two state Senate aides charged with obstruction of justice, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, resigned their posts Tuesday, the day before their arrests, Senate officials said yesterday.

According to Senate rules, employees charged with crimes related to their jobs or the allocation of public funds are immediately suspended without pay.

They're fired if they are found guilty, and reinstated with back pay if the charges are dropped or they are acquitted.

Affidavit Offers Details On Fumo Investigation (PHI)

By Craig R. Mccoy And Mario F. Cattabiani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

On Wednesday, the long-running investigation into State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo finally went public.

With the arrests of two low-level computer techs and the release of a 65-page arrest affidavit filled with e-mails and other evidence, federal authorities demystified much of their probe.

In page after page of e-mails from his employees and a few from Fumo himself, they laid out a case that Fumo had ordered a campaign to wipe e-mails from office and home computers - an attempt, the government alleges, to thwart the FBI.

Fumo, 63, the powerful South Philadelphia Democrat, has not been charged with wrongdoing. Three years into the investigation, it's clear authorities aren't finished yet.

The affidavit contained many new details about what the FBI and prosecutors have been pursuing for so long. Here's a probe primer:

What happened on Wednesday?

The aides, Leonard Luchko, 49, and Mark Eister, 36, were charged with obstructing justice by, in the FBI's words, "systematically" wiping clean BlackBerrys, servers and computers used by Fumo and his staff.

Who are these guys?

Until Wednesday, they were obscure computer experts - two of 29 employees supervised by Fumo to run the information network for Senate Democrats. Their lawyers say they did nothing wrong.

Luchko lives with his elderly mother in Collingdale, Delaware County. When arrested, Eister, of suburban Harrisburg, refused to submit to a urine test, telling federal investigators he had smoked pot the night before. His own attorney called him "a computer nerd."

If the techies wiped computer evidence, how did authorities recover anything?

According to prosecutors, the two didn't follow their own policies: they failed to destroy e-mails from their own computers. Their e-mails, quoted at length in the affidavit, refer repeatedly to the FBI investigation and to Fumo's demands for deletions.

"The FBI probe into the Senator has really set him off... He wants all of the BlackBerries wiped," Luchko wrote in 2004.

Isn't Fumo the focus of the probe?

Yes, and he remains so. Experienced criminal defense lawyers say prosecutors are playing hardball in hopes of turning the two aides against their boss, Fumo. The 6 a.m. arrests at their homes, the handcuffs, the possible maximum five-year prison sentences, the affidavit larded with evidence - all are said to be part of the strategy to apply pressure to the pair, to try to build a stronger case.

Have other techies talked?

Yes. If prosecutors succeed in "flipping" the pair, they will join a third computer technician, Donald Wilson, who has already been given immunity.

Wilson told a grand jury that Fumo gave his blessing to the deletions, the affidavit claims. However, the document provides few details on Wilson's testimony.

Wilson worked with Luchko in Fumo's Philadelphia legislative office. Eister worked in Harrisburg.

What has Fumo said about the arrests?

He's not talking, but his attorney, Richard A. Sprague, the well-known Philadelphia lawyer, said the feds have a vendetta against Fumo. Sprague's statement also hinted at a possible defense: The deletions were part of a preexisting document-destruction policy.

When did the probe start?

The FBI, IRS and federal prosecutors began by looking into Fumo's ties to a series of nonprofits about three years ago. After concluding they were being stonewalled, they launched a parallel obstruction-of-justice investigation.

Why did they suspect a cover-up?

Authorities said they found it suspicious that very few e-mails were given them in response to their initial subpoenas, even though boxes of evidence were turned over.

What were they investigating in the first place?

In Wednesday's affidavit, the FBI disclosed it was investigating whether Fumo "engaged in extortion" in seeking money for a nonprofit from two corporations, Peco Energy and Verizon Communications.

Verizon balked, but Peco gave $17 million to Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods under secret deals in which Fumo dropped his opposition to the electric giant's business plans.

The company struck the deals with Fumo in 1998 and 2000, but they remained secret until The Inquirer made them public in 2003. The FBI then began investigating those donations.

The newspaper also disclosed that Citizens' Alliance got another $10 million from a special fund created at Fumo's urging by the Delaware River Port Authority.

Are the donations the only issue?

No. The FBI also is looking at whether Fumo got any personal or political help from Citizens' Alliance, a nonprofit organization formed in 1991 by Fumo allies.

Nonprofits are barred by law from providing benefits to individual citizens and from engaging in partisan politics.

As has been previously reported, the nonprofit spent $215,000 on political polling - and later was reimbursed by a Fumo political action committee after the FBI began poking around.

Citizens' Alliance also spent $17,000 to secretly finance a lawsuit seeking to unseat a political foe of Fumo's from the state Senate.

In one e-mail quoted in the affidavit, Fumo balked at a proposal to hire a new manager for Citizens' Alliance.

That could be trouble, Fumo said, in an e-mail marked: "CONFIDENTIALLY (only because I trust you)... "

If a manager was hired, "and we tried to do some of the things that are political that we do, we would now have someone else 'in our tent' and we would be subject to his blackmail," he wrote.

What's Fumo's role in the nonprofit?

He holds no official position, but authorities cited numerous e-mails to contend he is the one calling the shots.

Among other decisions, he ordered Citizens' Alliance to pay for an unspecified program in Pittsburgh and a memorial in Bucks County, steps that boosted unidentified political allies, authorities have said.

In other e-mails, the government said, Fumo instructed the nonprofit to buy various properties, informing an aide that he alone will decide such purchases.

What has Fumo said about Citizens' Alliance?

He has pointed out it has done a lot of good things - among them, shoveling snow, cleaning streets, supporting a charter school, and gentrifying the Passyunk Avenue business district in South Philadelphia.

Have any other nonprofits been scrutinized?

Yes. Investigators have subpoenaed records from a series of nonprofits backed by Fumo. Notably, agents have explored Fumo's cruises on luxury yachts owned by the Independence Seaport Museum.

Fumo is a board member and has arranged for state funding for the museum at Penn's Landing. He belatedly reimbursed the museum for one yacht trip.

What's next?

Ruth Arnao, the director of Citizens' Alliance and a former Fumo aide, received a "target" letter from the government several months ago. Such letters are normally a precursor to criminal charges. In court, prosecutors have already said they believe Arnao, too, helped destroy computer documents.

What's the connection between Arnao and Fumo?

They're very close. Until late 2004, she was one of Fumo's top legislative aides. She and her husband, Turnpike Commissioner Mitchell Rubin, vacationed with Fumo on the Seaport's yacht.

How's Fumo bearing up?

He's publicly confident. In March, he told a luncheon crowd in Harrisburg that he had "no fears" and that the probe would "go nowhere."

Privately, he's been anxious. In 2004, Fumo sent an e-mail to a political consultant railing at his inability to get inside dope on the FBI's activities. "You know how serious and almost life threatening this is," the senator wrote.

Fumo Will Keep Power, Experts Say (PPG)

By Tracie Mauriello, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 2, 2006

ANALYSIS

HARRISBURG -- Officially, Vince Fumo is the third-ranking leader of the state Senate's virtually powerless minority party.

Unofficially, the Philadelphia Democrat is one of Harrisburg's most influential politicians.

Dubbed by some "Prince Vince," Mr. Fumo is unlikely to be shaken off his throne anytime soon, insiders say, despite an FBI investigation into whether he extorted contributions to a Philadelphia charity that were later used to benefit him personally and politically.

Two computer technicians in the senator's office were charged Wednesday with obstructing justice by purging government computers of all traces of e-mail messages thought to be pertinent to the investigation.

The U.S. Department of Justice says more charges and more arrests are possible, but insiders and pundits predict Mr. Fumo will emerge unscathed.

"I'd be the last person to write him off," said Christopher Borick, associate professor of political science at Muhlenberg College in Allentown. "He's a true political survivor."

He will do more than survive, Dr. Borick predicted. He will continue to shape public policy through upfront demands, back-door deals and top-down pressure.

"There's formal power and then there's informal power. Formal power comes with your title, but informal power is based on the power to persuade. Some people just have that innately," Dr. Borick said.

Count Mr. Fumo among them.

He's a member of the minority party, yet he's a power broker.

He has been able to make a career out of leveraging that informal power, Dr. Borick said.

That is obvious to Marc Stier, too. Dr. Stier, a political scientist and director of the Intellectual Heritage Program at Temple University, also is an activist who frequently calls upon lawmakers.

"I call some senators and say, 'Would you sponsor this bill?' and they say, 'Have you talked to Vince yet? I'm not going to support it unless Fumo supports it. Run it by Vince and if it's OK with him then that would be fine,'" Dr. Stier said.

Fellow senators might dispute the notion that they take orders from him, but they are certainly swayed by his arguments, said Thomas Baldino, professor of social science and communications at Wilkes College in Wilkes-Barre.

The rank-and-file defer to Mr. Fumo because, they say, he is smart, bold, outspoken and thoughtful.

It doesn't hurt that he controls a big pot of money, either. As minority appropriations chairman he has a big say in where state dollars go.

"They divvy up the money and they have to keep people satisfied, but they don't have to keep everyone satisfied. They can cut people out, and senators know that," Dr. Stier said.

Mr. Fumo's intelligence, personality, persistence and tenacity allow him to get things done, supporters say.

Mr. Fumo was the driving force behind legislation that legalized slots casinos in Pennsylvania. Passage required a decade of talks aimed at securing support from the Republican majority, which had religious and philosophical qualms about gambling.

Even political adversaries acknowledge his ability to attract loyal followers and to lead them wherever he wants.

"What Fumo wants, Fumo gets. He has a total network of folks who are loyal to him because he is loyal to them," said Philadelphian Anne Dicker, who last month ran for state House against Fumo ally Terry Graboyes. Both lost to Michael O'Brien.

In some circles, Mr. Fumo is better known for quashing candidacies and projects he doesn't like than for rounding up support for new initiatives. In the late 1990s, for example, he helped thwart the Phillies' plans to build a new ballpark eight blocks from his house.

An anti-gun-control Democrat, Mr. Fumo also supported legislation that prevented Philadelphia from enacting local gun-control laws.

"He's actually more of an obstructionist than a constructionist and he's done very well at it," said Larry Ceisler, a Philadelphia public relations executive who has worked on campaigns with Mr. Fumo, but now is aligned with a rival Democratic faction in Philadelphia.

"The time I've worked with him has been the most fun I've ever had in politics. He knows how to get things done and he's a really smart guy who can see around the curves," Mr. Ceisler said.

The FBI investigation is focused on the Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods and whether the charity spent donated funds to benefit Mr. Fumo personally and politically.

Despite the computer purges, the FBI was able to retrieve several key messages that, an affidavit says, show charity money was spent on political polls and on programs that would help garner support for politicians Mr. Fumo backed. In one case, according to court documents, the senator directed an aide to use the charity's funds to buy Philadelphia a new police surveillance van and then make it look as if the vehicle had been donated by a public official who needed good publicity.

The trick now for Mr. Fumo will be avoiding the legal traps being laid out by federal investigators who arrested the two Fumo staffers Wednesday. Attorneys for the men say the arrests were an FBI tactic to get the staffers to cooperate in the investigation. Instead, the men plan to fight the charges and remain loyal to Mr. Fumo, their lawyers told reporters.

With that kind of loyalty, "Vince the Prince" could well keep his place in the castle that is the state Capitol.

FBI Raids Official's Home, Office (WP)

By V. Dion Haynes And Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Investigation Targets Use of Funds for Charter Programs

The FBI raided the office and home of the D.C. school board's executive director of charter schools yesterday as part of an investigation into the possible misuse of hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal and city funds, school board officials and law enforcement sources said.

Investigators are focusing on the charter school office, which is responsible for overseeing 17 of the city's 51 charter schools. Brenda L. Belton, a school board employee, is the office's executive director.

The other charter schools are overseen by the D.C. Public Charter School Board, which was not involved in the investigation.

School sources, who asked not to be identified because the investigation is continuing, said authorities also are looking into whether some firms hired by the charter school office were connected to Belton. The sources said that the FBI search of the office began about 7 a.m. and continued for six hours and that numerous boxes of documents were confiscated.

Last night, Belton's attorney, Danny Onorato, said that Belton had done nothing wrong.

"She adamantly denies any wrongdoing," he said, adding that Belton would have no further comment.

Belton, reached earlier yesterday on her cellphone, said she was unaware that search warrants had been executed at her office and home.

"I wasn't there. I was in a training all day," she said.

The investigation of the city's charter school office dates to January, said Peggy Cooper Cafritz, president of the D.C. Board of Education. She said that members of the board agreed then to have an audit conducted of hundreds of thousands of dollars that had been designated for the charter schools.

The audit was not prompted by any particular concerns, said Carolyn N. Graham, vice president of the school board.

"This office has never been audited," Graham said last night. "We decided all our operations have to be audited annually."

Cafritz said the board stopped its audit when the D.C. inspector general's office began to investigate the charter schools office in March.

Investigators from the inspector general's office seized Belton's computer that month, sources said yesterday. Deputy Inspector General Austin A. Andersen confirmed the investigation Tuesday.

Belton said yesterday that she was unaware of the inspector general's investigation, but Cafritz said Belton "definitely knew" of it.

"Everyone involved -- employees and board members -- knew about the investigation being conducted by the IG's office," Cafritz said.

DOJ_NMG_0031485

D.C. Council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3), who chairs the education committee, has raised concerns in recent months about how funds for the board's charter schools are managed.

In an April report, Patterson questioned a budget proposal submitted by the charter school office. She said the proposal lacked detail and a plan on how services would be provided. "The committee remains seriously concerned about the current management and operations of that office," she wrote.

In early May, Patterson wrote Cafritz a letter detailing her concerns with several contractors hired by the office. In particular, she questioned whether the school board had awarded contracts totaling about $32,000 to a company called Equal Access in Education without competitive bidding. The company was hired to monitor charter schools.

Patterson also questioned why Belton was reimbursed $1,100 for refreshments at meetings and why charter school leaders in August were paid $513 for an "executive program for strategic management."

Judge Allows Evidence In Pellicano Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, June 1, 2006, 10:53 Pm Edt

Long Island Newsday, June 2, 2006

FBI agents raided Anthony Pellicano's offices in 2002 and found illegal explosives. Authorities were investigating whether Pellicano hired a man to threaten a Los Angeles Times reporter working on a story about actor Steven Seagal and his possible links to the Mafia.

Pellicano's attorney Steven Gruel challenged the legality of the search, saying the raids amounted to a fishing expedition. FBI agents seized computers and numerous digital audio tapes that led to a 112-count indictment unsealed in February against Pellicano.

Fourteen people have been charged in the government's wiretapping case. Six have pleaded guilty. Federal prosecutors say Pellicano used wiretaps, threats and blackmail to help lawyers and their clients win high-stakes legal disputes.

Judge Dale S. Fischer on May 22 concurred with an earlier ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that found the search was valid. The judge's decision was made public Thursday.

"There is no authority to suggest that officers seeking a search warrant must describe all of the crimes they believe the subject of the warrant may have committed or all of the things they hope to find," Fischer wrote. "So long as the warrant is valid and properly executed, the search is lawful."

However, the judge said her decision doesn't preclude Pellicano from requesting a hearing at which Gruel could call FBI agents to determine if there were any misrepresentations made with the search warrants.

"I'm encouraged and enthused by her decision," Gruel said. "She has clearly indicated in written form that if we can show there are falsehoods. She is going to look at this seriously."

Fischer found no grounds to support Gruel's assertion that agents had violated Pellicano's attorney-client privilege by enlisting his ex-girlfriend to extract information.

Pellicano claimed the government used Sandra Carradine, former wife of actor Keith Carradine, to gather a "fountain of information" about his legal strategy during jail visits last year.

Sandra Wil Carradine pleaded guilty to two counts of perjury and is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 25. She admitted in January that she lied to a grand jury about her knowledge that Pellicano had wiretapped the home of Keith Carradine during a child support dispute.

Pellicano, 62, has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial on charges of wiretapping such stars as Sylvester Stallone and paying two police officers to run names, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through a government database.

Pellicano served a 2 1/2-year sentence on charges related to the explosives.

United Response To Gangs Sought (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

COLUMBIA, Md. -- Federal, state and local officials who participated in the Maryland Gang Summit yesterday agreed that cooperation is key for fighting the increasing number of criminal gangs in the state.

Gaithersburg Police Detective Patrick Word said yesterday that there are currently about 10,000 gang members in Maryland. The gangs that exist in Maryland include the Bloods/United Blood Nation, Black Guerilla Family, Mara Salvatrucha or MS-13, Tiny Rascal Gangsters, Street Thug Criminals, Hells Angels, Vatos Loco, Pagans and South Side Locos, he said.

"We knew the gang problem was in every single county of Maryland," U.S. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski told participants.

DOJ_NMG_0031486

"They're violent. They're predatory. ... A rise in massive, almost ghoulish behavior of gangs," said Miss Mikulski, Maryland Democrat who secured $2 million in federal funds for the creation of a statewide anti-gang initiative. "That's what today is all about. This is the beginning conversation. We have to protect our people."

More than 300 people attended the day-long summit at the Sheraton Hotel. Participants included Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr., Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, sheriffs, federal and state prosecutors, police, mayors, community officials and non-profit organizations.

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, announced the creation of a gang coordination committee that will establish a statewide database of gang activity.

While gang violence is a growing problem, there is a window of opportunity to act before it becomes a major problem, Mr. Ehrlich said, outlining four major goals for dealing with the problem.

He said he wanted to avoid turf battles between law-enforcement agencies, identify active gangs in the state, ensure enforcement tools are available and provide early intervention to disrupt recruiting of young members.

"The first goal is no turf battles [among law-enforcement units and communities]," Mr. Ehrlich said. "In some cases, the lack of team effort results in failed goals."

Mr. Ehrlich said that Maryland State Police has a lead role in fighting gang membership increases. There are 400 officers trained to deal with gangs and 400 more are being trained. About $4.6 million are allotted to juvenile services to deter youths from joining gangs, $500,000 in other grants, and $500,000 to the Safe Neighborhood Program.

Officials also called for the ability of police and prosecutors to enter areas where gangs are known to exist and work with residents and encourage them to call authorities with tips.

"Enforcement is a key," said Rod J. Rosenstein, U.S. Attorney for the District of Maryland, explaining that investigations should focus on where gangs are organized, mostly in schools.

"Education and parents are the best guides for [keeping] children away from gang temptations," he said.

Detective Word said that residents should notify and cooperate with authorities investigating crimes by youths, even if the crimes don't appear to be gang-related. The information often will be linked to a gang member, he said.

Frank Clark, with the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services, said parents must be educated about gangs. "Kids are at risk because gangs are glamorized," he said. "We have to educate parents."

Prosecution of gangs has increased, said Assistant U.S. Attorney James M. Trusty. "In a perverse way, it almost has the effect of glamorizing gangs," he said.

Kate Garvey, chief of Montgomery County's Department of Children, Youth, and Family Services, and Officer Rob Musser said the county has 28 street gangs, 922 members, 50 percent are of mixed races, 28 percent are black and 22 percent are Hispanic.

Montgomery and Prince George's counties offer tattoo removal to encourage youths to get out of gangs.

"We're behind the eight-ball," Prince George's County Police Sgt. George Norris said. "We probably should have been looking at gangs 10 years ago. ... A lot of kids join gangs because they have no family. Somehow or other, we've got to get parents more involved with their kids."

Broad Gang Presence Requires Parents' Vigilance, Officials Say (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Criminal gangs are operating across Maryland at a level many in the state do not recognize or are unwilling to admit, participants in what was billed as the first Maryland gang summit warned yesterday.

At the Columbia summit, speakers -- who included police detectives, state and federal prosecutors, politicians and representatives of community groups -- described an insidious problem and said law enforcement is often not the solution. The battle to keep young people out of gangs is being fought inside schools and homes, they said, with teachers, parents and social workers on the front line.

"We've lost the battle if we wait until the kids have already joined the gangs," said Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), who called for more after-school and mentoring programs for youths.

Maryland, with its broad socioeconomic and ethnic mix, has become a "microcosm of gang activity," according to Assistant U.S. Attorney James Trusty. "We really have every type of gang activity," added Trusty, gang coordinator for the U.S. attorney's office for Maryland. "Our schools and businesses are increasingly in the line of fire."

The problem drew broad attention in Montgomery County last summer when, on a single day in August, gang fights led to the stabbing of two summer school students at a Silver Spring high school and to a melee at a Wheaton shopping center that left four teenagers wounded. Later that month, 19 Mara Salvatrucha members were indicted on federal racketeering charges.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), calling for an end to "turf battles" among law enforcement agencies, announced the formation of a coordinating committee that will create a statewide database on gangs.

Those who specialize in gangs acknowledged that they are struggling to keep up with the proliferation of gang crime, and they said many parents are not willing to recognize that their children are involved.

At one panel discussion, Sgt. George Norris, supervisor of the gang unit for Prince George's County police, warned colleagues not to wait to address the problem. "We probably should have started looking at gangs 10 years ago, because right now we are severely behind the eight ball," he said.

Trusty said, "Our best efforts are not going to eradicate gangs in Maryland."

Gaithersburg Detective Patrick Word, president of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network, put the number of gang members in Maryland at 10,000, but he and other speakers said there inevitably are many others of whom police are unaware.

More gangs in the area are identifying themselves as Bloods or Crips, which are violent Los Angeles-based gangs, law enforcement officials said.

Word described the Bloods as "the biggest threat" in the state. Other major gangs in Maryland include the Black Guerrilla Family; MS-13, or Mara Salvatrucha, a Latino gang; and Tiny Rascal Gangsters, a Southeast Asian gang. Among motorcycle gangs, Hells Angels has established itself in Southern Maryland, which was previously considered the territory of the Pagan motorcycle gang. Police also said that the Vatos Locos, South Side Locos and Street Thug Criminals are serious gang threats.

"It's no longer like West Side Story, where people run around singing . . . 'Maria,' " said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), one of the organizers of the summit.

Mikulski recently obtained $2 million in federal funds for a statewide anti-gang initiative, and Ehrlich said the state had $300,000 in grants to combat gangs.

Capt. Lennard Johnson of the Maryland Division of Corrections said 1,900 confirmed gang members are in the prison system. "For every one we've validated, there are probably two or three we don't know about," he said.

Summit Elevates Anti-gang Initiatives (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan

The Baltimore Sun, June 2, 2006

MS-13, the target of a major federal indictment in Maryland last summer, isn't the state's biggest gang problem. The Bloods are.

That is the conclusion reached by the state's leading gang investigators, who presented their latest findings Thursday at a summit in Columbia of 300 law enforcement officers, political leaders and educators.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, originated in Los Angeles among refugees from El Salvador and received national attention in recent years for its rapid spread and violence.

Federal prosecutors charged 19 alleged MS-13 members from Southern Maryland in August.

Experts said Thursday that it is still the Bloods, who crop up on street corners in Baltimore, in schools in Harford County and in prisons throughout the state, who have the greatest reach.

"They're the outside influence here," said Maj. David Engel, the chief of the Baltimore Police Department's criminal intelligence unit.

The daylong conference, funded by a $2 million federal grant to the Maryland U.S. attorney's office, sought to promote local and federal efforts to prevent young people from joining gangs, to encourage current members to quit, and to lock up their leaders.

Gang violence in the region has grown, but officials acknowledge that some police chiefs and political figures were, until recently, loath to say there was a crisis ahead.

"We know that we have a gang problem in every county of Maryland," Democratic U.S. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski said.

Her comments were echoed by U.S. Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, a Baltimore Democrat, U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein and Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who called for greater cooperation.

"The first goal is no turf battles," the governor told participants, adding that the effort to combat gangs should transcend partisan differences and bureaucratic wrangling.

Ehrlich announced $300,000 in state funding for new anti-gang efforts in Maryland. The federal government, through Project Safe Neighborhoods, will kick in $500,000 for Baltimore City and Montgomery, Prince George's, Wicomico and Baltimore counties, Rosenstein said.

Detective Patrick Word, a Gaithersburg police officer and vice chairman of the Mid-Atlantic Regional Gang Investigators Network, said authorities have identified at least 100 gangs in the state.

DOJ_NMG_0031488

The sizes range, Word said, from gangs of just three people to those that claim more than 100 members.

In Baltimore, gangs were once known somewhat benignly as "street crews" who limited their activity to drug dealing on a particular cross street. In state prisons, they are still known clinically as "security threat groups."

Word said they should all be known as gangs. And every law broken by their members -- from running a red light to beating their wives to committing murder -- should be duly recorded by law enforcement as gang activity.

Experts stressed that intelligence show an ever-changing picture of gang activity in Maryland. National gangs have arrived in large numbers in Baltimore only in the past 10 months, Engel said.

Between 1999 and 2005, the city had a single Bloods and Crips set. Today, Engel said, there are 14 Bloods and five Crips sets.

Detective Scott Yosua of the Harford County Sheriff's Office explained that he had to eat his words after he told a local newspaper that the gang problem in his county was so limited that most residents would never notice.

"I was proved to be wrong," he said.

His mind changed, he said, after the 2004 shooting death of a 37-year-old father of nine. Wayne Lavon Bond Jr., who prosecutors said was a Bloods recruit, was found guilty of first-degree murder and received 45 years in prison.

Yosua said authorities have now documented 140 Bloods members in the county, though some may no longer be active.

Not to say that gang experts will ignore MS-13 members in Maryland, officials said.

Mara refers to a gang, while Salva is an abbreviation for Salvadoran. Trucha is slang for "fear us," according to federal authorities. An estimated 10,000 MS-13 members are in the United States, many in the Washington suburbs, which has a large population of Central American immigrants.

Authorities are also tracking other trends, like a new outpost of the Hell's Angels motorcycle gang in Baltimore. Until recently, Word said, it was their rivals the Pagans who were thought to hold the greatest sway in Maryland.

Many Thursday called for the increased coordination among anti-gang law enforcement agents in the state and better links to the work on the national level.

Word added that Maryland should pass a state racketeering law to mirror the one in the federal system known as RICO.

The RICO statutes have enabled prosecutors to hold gang members responsible for their crimes and seek hefty prison sentences, as well as seize their assets, according to Word.

Judging Whether A Killer Is Sane Enough To Die (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal And Adam Liptak

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

HOUSTON, June 1 — Scott Panetti, a death row inmate in Texas, understands that the state says it intends to execute him for the murder of his wife's parents.

But Mr. Panetti, 48, who represented himself in court despite a long and colorful history of mental illness, says he believes that the state's real reason is a different one. He says the state, in league with Satan, wants to kill him to keep him from preaching the Gospel.

That delusion has been documented by doctors and acknowledged by judges and prosecutors. It poses what experts call the next big question in death penalty law now that the Supreme Court has barred the execution of juvenile offenders and the mentally retarded: what makes someone too mentally ill to be executed?

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, recently said Mr. Panetti was sane enough to die. The full court will soon decide whether to hear the case.

Mr. Panetti, in prison now almost 14 years for the killings in 1992 in the quaint Hill Country city of Fredericksburg, has long seemed to exemplify madness, addressing himself to the jury in his trial in 1995 as "the born-again April Fool," a schizophrenic healed by God.

In and out of mental institutions 14 times and addicted to drugs and alcohol since he almost drowned as a child and was nearly electrocuted by a power line, Mr. Panetti wore cowboy costumes to court, delivered rambling monologues, put himself on the witness stand and sought to subpoena the pope, Jesus and John F. Kennedy.

Jurors were clearly alienated and took little more than an hour to reject his insanity defense.

They found that Mr. Panetti knew right from wrong and so deserved the death penalty. That is a separate question from whether his mental illness should bar his execution.

Two decades ago, the United States Supreme Court in Ford v. Wainwright ruled that the Eighth Amendment prohibited the execution of the insane. Since then, lower courts have struggled to find a way to apply that principle in practice.

DOJ_NMG_0031489

The state and federal courts that have heard Mr. Panetti's case have said that a bare awareness of the fact of impending execution and the stated reason for it is enough.

"In Texas," said Greg Wiercioch, a lawyer with the Texas Defender Service who has consulted with Mr. Panetti's defense, "if you cast a shadow on a sunny day, you're competent to be executed."

Other courts require more. Relying on a concurring opinion in the Supreme Court decision, they say the inmate actually has to perceive the connection between the crime and the punishment.

The three-judge panel in Mr. Panetti's case acknowledged that he was mentally ill with what has been diagnosed as schizoaffective disorder and that he thus might lack a rational understanding of his fate. But the panel nonetheless ruled that he was competent to be executed because he was able to understand the stated basis for his execution.

His new lawyers dispute that.

"He completely scoffs at the notion that it's the State of Texas trying to execute him," said Keith Hampton, a lawyer from Austin who filed the latest appeal with a co-counsel, Michael C. Gross of San Antonio. "He thinks it's the demons and evil ones."

Legal and medical experts estimate that hundreds of people with schizophrenia and other severe mental illnesses are on death rows around the nation.

Courts have spared the lives of seven inmates based on the 1986 decision, the Texas Defender Service said.

David R. Dow, a law professor at the University of Houston who has met more than 75 death row inmates, visited Mr. Panetti at his lawyers' request. "Of all the people I have met on death row, he's the gold-medal-crazy winner," Professor Dow said.

On Sept. 8, 1992, Mr. Panetti broke into the home of his in-laws, Joe and Amanda Alvarado, and shot them to death in front of his estranged second wife, Sonja, and his 3-year-old daughter, Amanda, known as Birdie.

Taking on his defense, and calling himself as a witness, he argued that he had been taken over by an alter ego he called Sarge Ironhorse.

"Sarge boom boom," Mr. Panetti testified. "Sarge is gone. No more Sarge. Sonja and Birdie. Joe, Amanda lying kitchen, here, there blood. No, leave. Scott, remember exactly what Sarge did. Shot the lock. Walked in the kitchen. Sonja, where's Birdie? Sonja here."

Prosecutors, their medical experts and the courts agreed that Mr. Panetti suffers from mental illness. Judge Sam Sparks of Federal District Court in Austin found in 2004 that Mr. Panetti's illness was characterized by "grandiosity and a delusional belief system in which he believes himself to be persecuted for his religious activities and beliefs."

Judge Sparks said that was not enough to spare Mr. Panetti.

Others agree.

Robert Blecker, a law professor at the New York Law School and a cautious supporter of the death penalty, said Mr. Panetti's execution could serve the goal of retribution.

"He knows what he did," Professor Blecker said. "He knows what the state is about to do to him, and why. For the retributivist, the past counts. It counts for us, and for us to be retributively satisfied, it must also count for him."

Prosecutors made the same point in a brief to the Fifth Circuit last year.

"All that is required to avoid the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is that the petitioner factually understand the reason for this punishment," the prosecutors wrote.

Executions of inmates who exhibited signs of madness are not unusual. In 1992, Arkansas executed Ricky Ray Rector not long after he put aside the dessert of his last meal to eat later.

In March, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Richmond, Va., split, 7 to 6, over whether Percy L. Walton could be executed, notwithstanding his delusional belief that after his death he would "come back as a better person" and "get a Burger King." A majority said this was proof that Mr. Walton understood he would be executed.

"That a person believes that he will have an 'afterlife,' however strange his views of that 'afterlife' may be," Judge Dennis W. Shedd wrote, "necessarily suggests he believes his existing life will end."

The laws of most states, based on English common law, have long banned the execution of the insane.

"The reasons for the rule are less sure and less uniform than the rule itself," Justice Thurgood Marshall wrote in the 1986 case.

Some judges say the "miserable spectacle" of such executions simply offends humanity. Others say retribution is not served by executing someone who cannot understand why he is being put to death. Still others point to the inability of the insane to assist their lawyers in last-minute litigation. In the Middle Ages, it was thought that madness was its own punishment.

Mr. Hampton, who filed the latest appeals brief, said that from the trial on he was revolted by the Panetti case.

"I thought there was no way, no way, no matter how bad things in the state of Texas got, that it would allow someone in the full flower of schizophrenia to represent himself," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031490

But in repeatedly calling himself insane — "I went nuts," Mr. Panetti told the police officers after the killings, "well, I am nuts" — Mr. Panetti seemed to have run into his own Catch-22, leaving jurors skeptical of anyone so eager to establish his insanity.

Now the courts, taking one last look at Mr. Panetti, must decide whether he is sane enough to die.

Two Sex Offenders Charged With Possessing Child Porn (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, June 2, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) _ Two registered sex offenders have been arrested for allegedly possessing child pornography, federal authorities said Thursday.

Jeffrey Frazier, 40 of North Tonawanda, who was sentenced to 60 days in prison after being convicted in 2003 of sexual abuse and endangering the welfare of a child, was charged following a visit to his home by probation officers.

Frazier admitted that he sent, received and possessed child pornography using five e-mail addresses on his home computer, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia.

He would face between 10 and 40 years in prison if convicted.

Timothy Brenon, 56, of North Tonawanda, was charged with possessing child pornography four years after his conviction on a charge of possessing a sexual performance by a child, for which he received five years probation.

He admitted to North Tonawanda police that he possessed porn, including images of young children, Gioia said. He could be sentenced to at least 10 years if convicted.

DURHAM - Following a federal investigation, a local man plead guilty on Wednesday to possession of child pornography.

Richard Wertheim, 60, of 41 Lexington Place South in Durham waived indictment in U.S. District in Hartford. According to Thomas Carson, spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor, Wertheim could face 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000.

According to documents filed with the court and statements made at the hearing, Wertheim participated in "peer-to-peer" file sharing with other Internet users. The applications allowed the users to share access to electronic data files, which contained visual images, music, text and videos.

Wertheim has an Old Saybrook residence in addition to his home in Durham. On May 6, federal agents searched both of his homes and seized two different personal computers.

According to Carson, Wertheim had been under investigation by the Department of Homeland Security, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Forensic evidence revealed a large amount of child pornography on both of Wertheim's personal computers.

According to Carson, the analysis revealed 117 images and videos. The images included several that involved prepubescent minors.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney John Marrella. He was unavailable to comment on the proceedings.

Estimates Of Copyright Piracy Losses Vary Widely (WSJ)

By Geoffrey A. Fowler

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The plastic in a blank CD or DVD costs less than a quarter. Putting a price on a disc loaded with content is more difficult.

When the music industry finds a CD that has been ripped off by copyright pirates, it says it is worth between $1 and $5. Hollywood says a pirate disc can be worth between nothing and the full retail price of around $25. The software industry sometimes weighs in at more than $200 per counterfeit disc.

Why is there such a wide range in the estimates? Counting the losses from piracy isn't a science -- it's an art. Police in developing countries like China may count pirated goods at their street value, but companies and industry associations have different, often political, goals behind their counting systems. Now the growing problem of Internet piracy is making gauging losses even harder, and more controversial.

"We can confidently say we will never know 100% the exact loss. There are several sciences, and none of them work entirely satisfactorily," says Keith Jopling, the director of strategic analysis and research for the International Federation of the Phonographic Industry, the main music industry trade group.

DOJ_NMG_0031491

Police data and surveys can provide estimates of the number of DVDs sold in street pirate markets, and the numbers of songs and programs downloaded off the Internet. But the music, movie and software industries -- which have been hammered by piracy in many developing countries -- face a more vexing problem of reckoning their losses.

Somebody who buys a pirated disc at a steep discount isn't necessarily a lost customer for a full-priced product. In many poor countries, a customer who buys a CD for $1 could never afford to pay $16.95 for a legitimate copy. In countries such as China and Vietnam, many legitimate film titles aren't even allowed on store shelves because of government quotas and censorship standards. Moreover, music industry surveys have found that in some developed markets, 10% to 15% of consumers actually spend more money on legitimate music when they're also downloading songs illegally.

So is a pirated disc really a loss?

Over the past two years, the Motion Picture Association of America has spent $3 million to figure that out. The answer it arrived at -- that Hollywood studios alone lose $6.1 billion world-wide -- was so high that some Tinseltown executives didn't want the figures made public.

Behind the movie studios' backstage catfight about the figures was a dramatically new system for counting the value of a pirated disc. The new method involved asking consumers about their piracy habits directly.

In telephone, Internet and focus group polls developed by consultant L.E.K. Group, the MPAA asked consumers how often they buy pirated discs and download pirated movies, as well as whether they would have bought the film legitimately had the pirated version not been available. By that approach, not every pirated disc equates to lost revenue.

But the new method has a big problem. People lie in surveys, especially folks who like to pirate movies. The MPAA spent months revising their figures down.

To be sure, legitimate companies want and need to know how much they're losing, as the piracy problem grows. But accurate assessments may be influenced by competing demands. Hefty piracy loss figures can serve the interests of movie, music and software industry organizations, all of which lobby governments for tougher intellectual property laws and enforcement. On the other hand, member companies of these organizations often don't want investors to be spooked by figures that suggest their piracy problems are scaling out of control.

The computer software industry, represented by the Business Software Alliance, has taken a simpler approach than the movie industry, and come up with a much bigger number. According to a study it released in May, there were $34 billion in global PC software piracy losses in 2005. The alliance hired analysts at the International Data Group's IDC to calculate losses based on the total value of software installed on computers around the world minus the total legitimate sales of software. That way, the industry doesn't have to track pirated discs or files swapped online. The big loss figure it comes up with helps push governments to sign treaties to ensure that businesses aren't using pirated software on computers.

The software industry's figures assume that pirated software is worth the same as full-price commercial software. Many software users in the developing world say they can't afford to substitute in a full-priced copy of Microsoft Office, even if Microsoft already discounts the product for developing markets.

However, the BSA's Asia regional director, Jeff Hardee, says the group's studies show nearly a one-to-one ratio between decreases in piracy and increases in legitimate sales, suggesting that, on average, people are willing to "replace" pirate software with the real thing.

The music industry has long taken a more limited approach to its piracy assessments. Instead, the IFPI estimates that the world-wide commercial disc market is worth $4.6 billion to the pirates themselves, at pirate prices, which range from $1 to $5 per CD. The IFPI uses police data, surveys and legitimate disc sales to estimate the number of pirate discs in the market.

That approach avoids counting customers of cheap pirate products the same as legitimate customers, but assigns a very low value to the music on CDs. It also leaves a hole in accounting for losses from songs swapped for free over the Internet. The IFPI says it knows there are 885 million "infringing" songs available for download at any one time, but doesn't know how much they're worth.

In recent months the IFPI has been sorting through surveys in a handful of markets that try to count Internet losses, many involving direct consumer interviews about substitution habits like the MPAA survey. Record companies are currently reviewing the findings from those surveys, and the results could be released with the group's annual piracy report later this month.

Lawyer: Convertino Is Under Investigation Over Drug Case (DEN)

Detroit News, June 2, 2006

Second inquiry cited against ex-prosecutor, awaiting trial over his terror case prosecution.

Former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of at least one other case in addition to the terrorism case for which he was indicted, one of Convertino's lawyers has alleged in a court filing.

DOJ_NMG_0031492

Lawyer Jeffrey Del Fuoco said in a motion recently filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that Convertino is under investigation for possible criminal conduct in his handling of a 1998 drug case involving Joseph Stines.

Stines, who was convicted of running a cocaine ring around Ypsilanti, has alleged misconduct by Convertino. Stines' lawyer, Carole Stanyar, has filed a motion seeking his release from prison.

"It has been learned that Mr. Stines' baseless allegations are now the subject of an ongoing criminal investigation into Mr. Convertino's conduct," Del Fuoco says in a motion filed May 26.

In the motion, Del Fuoco argues that Convertino should be allowed to intervene in the Stines case to protect his interests. If his request is granted, Convertino will be able to introduce evidence and cross-examine witnesses.

Both parties involved, Stines and the U.S. government, allege misconduct by Convertino, Del Fuoco says in the motion. They are "strange bedfellows" and "teammates," he argues.

Drew Wade, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington, D.C., would neither confirm nor deny whether Convertino is under investigation for any cases other than the terrorism case.

The government indicted Convertino on March 29, accusing him of lying to a jury and a federal judge in prosecuting four men accused in a 2001 terrorism-related case in which convictions were ultimately thrown out. Convertino has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial.

Del Fuoco would not say Wednesday what makes him believe Convertino is under criminal investigation for his handling of the Stines case.

Allegations in the Stines case involve early releases given to felons who testified against Stines, who was sentenced to 33 years and four months in prison following a 1999 trial.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge OKs Questioning Of Justice Department Official (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - A judge ruled Thursday that Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum must undergo questioning in a lawsuit, a decision that is helpful to a private group seeking records about the Justice Department's conduct in a landmark case against the tobacco industry.

The action by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is the latest problem related to McCallum's nomination as the Bush administration's choice to become ambassador to Australia.

Democratic Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois is blocking McCallum's nomination over allegations the No. 3 official at the Justice Department improperly influenced the government's lawsuit against cigarette manufacturers.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington sued last year after the department ignored the testimony of one of its own witnesses in the tobacco trial and reduced the amount the Bush administration is seeking from the tobacco industry from $130 billion to $10 billion.

CREW says the department has failed to produce a single responsive document to demands for information under the Freedom of Information Act.

Sullivan said the private organization is entitled to delve into the department's handling of the document requests by questioning McCallum, who is at the center of the controversy over whether the administration caved into the tobacco industry in reducing the amount of money it is seeking.

The judge said statistical data the department sends to Congress every year belies the government's argument that there is nothing unusual or out of the ordinary in the amount of time it has taken to respond to CREW's lawsuit.

In its lawsuit filed last October, CREW asked for records of all contacts between Justice Department officials and the White House concerning the tobacco litigation and records of all contacts between McCallum and his old law firm in Atlanta which has done work in the past for the tobacco industry.

Legal Blow Over Tobacco Case Information (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessnerin Washington

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

The US Justice Department was dealt a legal blow on Thursday when a judge ruled that a watchdog group could interview a top official in connection with the government's controversial handling of its landmark case against tobacco companies.

DOJ_NMG_0031493

Judge Emmet Sullivan said Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (Crew) could depose Robert McCallum and other Justice Department officials about how the department handled Crew's requests for information about the case.

The judgment does not give Crew the latitude to interview Mr McCallum, the associate attorney-general nominated by President George W. Bush to be ambassador to Australia, on the underlying facts of the case.

But Crew says the deposition will shed light on whether the department sought to cover up its decision-making process by wilfully ignoring requests under the Freedom of Information Act.

The judge's ruling is the latest chapter in a long-running saga about whether a decision by the government last year to reduce the amount of penalties it was seeking from tobacco companies – from $130bn initially to $5.2bn – was politically motivated.

Reports in the Washington Post and other newspapers last June suggested that the government's decision to change its position on the five-year civil racketeering case against the tobacco industry was made over the objection of career lawyers at the Justice Department.

A government witness, Harvard professor Max Bazerman, who said he believed the industry should be subject to a court appointed monitor, was told by a trial attorney at the department to change his testimony to be more favourable to the industry, according to a 2005 article in the Washington Post. Mr Bazerman was ultimately allowed to testify.

The controversy put a spotlight on Mr McCallum, who had oversight of the case and was a former attorney for Alston & Bird, a law firm that represents tobacco companies.

The Justice Department has previously denied that its legal deliberations were politically motivated. Its decision, nevertheless, prompted a group of Democrat senators to demand an investigation and for Crew to take up the cause.

Anne Weismann, Crew's chief council, said the government had, in effect, argued that the documents Crew was requesting were not for public consumption because they involved legal work product, which is protected, and that it would cost Crew, a non-profit organisation, $90,000 to process the request.

"Hopefully, the American people will begin to learn the truth about why the DoJ so drastically reduced the penalty in the tobacco case." said Melanie Sloan, Crew's executive director.

Justice Dept. Requests Documents From Career Education (CRAINS)

By Kate Ryan

Crain's Chicago Business, June 2, 2006

Company asked to provide various details, officials said

(Crain's) — The U.S. Department of Justice has outlined the nature of its inquiry into Career Education Corp., almost two years after an investigation was first reported.

On Tuesday the department asked the Hoffman Estates-based operator of for-profit schools to supply documentation of the way job placement rates and tuition costs were presented to current and prospective students at particular schools. The company was also asked to provide details about the way it compensates admissions officers, the way federal Pell Grants are used at one school, and the calculation of student refunds at another school, according to a Thursday filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"We received a letter from the Civil Division of the U.S. Department of Justice advising us that it is reviewing allegations that certain of our schools may have submitted false claims to the U.S. Department of Education," the Career Ed said in its SEC filing. A Justice Department probe was first reported in August 2004. Tuesday's SEC filing referred to the review as "informational."

A Career Ed spokeswoman said the company is cooperating with the investigation.

"It's not good news, but the things that they've requested aren't very different from what everybody else has been investigating for the last two years," says Alexander Paris Jr., an analyst at Barrington Research in Chicago. "It's not uncommon in this industry for the Department of Justice to review allegations by former students."

Career Education operates for-profit colleges and trade schools around the United States, enrolling about 104,000 students. The company has been plagued by legal and regulatory problems for more than two years, and several of its schools are on probation or under review with their accreditation agencies. In December, the company's American InterContinental University (AIU), which accounts for half of the company's revenue, was placed on probation by its accrediting agency, which cited concerns about the integrity of student academic records and accuracy in recruiting and admission practices.

A spokesman for the Justice Department declined to comment on investigations or inquiries. The Department of Justice will confirm an investigation only when unsealed charges are filed against a company, a spokesman said.

Career Education Gets Detention, Again! (MOTLEYF)

By Rich Duprey
Motley Fool, June 2, 2006

Well, that didn't take long. Only last week, Career Education (Nasdaq: CECO), the country's second-largest for-profit chain of colleges, announced that the Education Department had satisfactorily concluded its financial review of the company and might allow it to graduate to making acquisitions once again.

But just this morning, the company announced that the Justice Department was giving it detention again, investigating allegations that some of Career Education's schools had submitted false claims or statements to the Education Department. The DOJ also wants information related to compensation for admissions personnel, the use of Pell Grant funds at one school, and student refund calculations at another.

Career Education has more than 80 campuses, more than 100,000 students enrolled, and a $3.2 billion market cap, putting it in second place among for-profit higher education. The much larger Apollo Group (Nasdaq: APOL) leads the industry with 95 campuses and 159 "learning centers," enrolling more than 300,000 students. Apollo also sports a market cap nearly three times larger than Career Education's, at $9 billion.

The company, and indeed much of the industry, has been dogged by allegations of misrepresenting graduation and job-placement rates, lowering admission standards, and paying recruiters to get warm bodies in their classrooms. Last year, Apollo was fined $9.8 million for admitting unqualified students to boost enrollment at its University of Phoenix online campus.

Yet while these types of charges have been raised many times over the years, most of the complaints have turned out to be unproven. ITT Educational Services (NYSE: ESI) was investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice and subsequently exonerated of wrongdoing. And Corinthian College (Nasdaq: COCO) was also given a passing grade by the SEC last year.

Still, the industry's continuing legal woes have taken their toll on share prices of some of the industry's main players. But like the academic trajectory of advanced-placement students, some key players continue to excel despite the ennui gripping the rest. ITT, Strayer (Nasdaq: STRA), and DeVry (NYSE: DV) have continued to graduate to higher market caps.

Career Education has been able to grow over the years by making a sizeable number of acquisitions, which the Education Department investigation had held back. The company hoped that being cleared of any wrongdoing would let it resume adding schools and students and gaining market share from its competitors. But the Justice Department inquiry, which the company assures us is only "informational in nature," may just put another mark on its permanent file. Further delays can only be bad news for Career Education, and even worse tidings for investors seeking satisfactory returns.

Justice Department Appeals In Teen Firefighter Case (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department has appealed a judge's decision that a 14-year-old Delaware County junior firefighter killed while answering an alarm was entitled to death benefits and a place on the National Fallen Firefighters Memorial.

Christopher Kangas' mother hoped to see his name added to that memorial in October, but unless the Justice Department drops its appeal, "the dream is deferred again," lawyer Frank W. Daly said yesterday.

Kangas was struck and killed by a car four years ago while racing on his bicycle to Brookhaven Fire Co. No. 52. Local and state officials awarded death benefits to Kangas' mother, Julie Amber-Messick, but the Justice Department said Kangas did not qualify as a public safety officer.

A U.S. Court of Federal Claims judge ruled in Amber-Messick's favor on March 27. Daly said the government had 60 days to appeal and did so at the last minute Tuesday.

FEC Fines Frist's 2000 Senate Campaign (AP-Y2)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod
AP2, June 1, 2006

The Federal Election Commission has determined that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's 2000 Senate campaign violated federal campaign finance laws.

The federal agency fined Frist 2000, Inc., $11,000, according to a lawyer representing Frist's campaign and a watchdog group. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington had filed a complaint last year against Frist's 2000 campaign committee and received the FEC's findings Thursday.

The FEC found that Frist 2000, Inc., failed to disclose a $1.44 million loan taken out jointly by the campaign and Frist's 1994 campaign committee.

The Tennessee Republican, who was elected to the Senate in 1994, is not seeking another term and is weighing a possible bid for the presidency in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0031495

Federal law requires full disclosure of any loans taken out by campaign committees. Frist's 1994 campaign committee did disclose the loan to the FEC in January 2001, but the 2000 campaign did not, according to the FEC.

In an agreement reached with the Frist campaign committee, the agency said Frist 2000, Inc., violated the law by failing to report the loan in its January 2001 campaign finance report and did not properly report the repayment of the loan in a July 2001 report.

Jason Torchinsky, a lawyer representing Frist 2000, Inc., said the campaign settled the FEC complaint. "What the FEC suggested, we believe would have resulted in double reporting of the loan," Torchinsky said.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the watchdog group, praised the FEC action.

"We have campaign finance laws, and everyone's supposed to abide by them," she said. "It's such a clear area of the law."

The Asbestos-Fraud Express (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

If the Milberg Weiss indictments are anything to go by, federal prosecutors are finally getting serious about tort lawyer corruption. So let's hope they've also noticed a federal lawsuit in West Virginia that describes some of the most sordid asbestos fraud to date.

The suit comes courtesy of CSX, one of the nation's largest rail companies and long a target of frivolous asbestos claims. CSX last year turned the legal tables on its nemesis -- Pittsburgh-based plaintiffs firm Peirce, Raimond & Coulter -- filing a lawsuit against it and an employee alleging fraud, misrepresentation and negligence. The tale is a modern tort classic.

It begins in early 2000, when CSX employee Ricky May learned that the Peirce firm was going to conduct an asbestos "screening" in June. Peirce is a big player in railway asbestos suits and has brought thousands against CSX. Mr. May had already attended such a mass screening prior to 2000, and had tested negative for asbestosis.

Enter Robert Gilkison, a former CSX employee. According to the lawsuit, the Peirce firm occasionally hires retired rail employees as "runners," or people who round up former colleagues for lawsuits. The suit alleges that, faced with Mr. May's unfortunate good health, Mr. Gilkison suggested that Mr. May get someone who had previously tested positive for asbestosis to impersonate him at the June exam.

Mr. May then recruited Danny Jayne -- a CSX employee who'd been "diagnosed" with asbestosis in 1999 -- to sit for his June X-ray. Mr. Gilkison is alleged to have facilitated all this, allowing Mr. May to complete the necessary forms but then walking Mr. Jayne through the exam. Mr. Jayne later received a settlement of $7,000 from CSX, while Mr. May received $8,000.

Turncoat employees, mass screenings, medical impersonations -- this is already the stuff of bad thrillers, but it gets worse. The Peirce law firm was an avid user of the medical services of Dr. Ray Harron, a physician singled out in a federal court opinion last year for having "manufactured" silicosis diagnoses. The good doctor learned this skill in the asbestos field, producing tens of thousands of asbestosis "diagnoses" for eager law firms. That included a "positive" diagnosis for Mr. Jayne -- casting doubt on whether even he was really sick.

Suspecting foul play, CSX did some investigating and had a doctor verify that the May and Jayne X-rays were in fact of the same man. CSX last year filed suit against both claimants, and they later confessed to the scheme. Mr. May agreed to pay back his settlement; Mr. Jayne agreed to offer testimony. Mr. Gilkison has denied any wrongdoing.

Which brings us to the current lawsuit focusing on the extent to which the Peirce law firm knew about this fraud. CSX claims that, after the screening, Mr. May got cold feet and asked Mr. Gilkison about dismissing the case. The railway also claims Mr. Gilkison talked to the Peirce firm about the fraud, but that Peirce lawyers proceeded with the lawsuit anyway.

CSX is further claiming that Peirce keeps records of both its positive and negative screening applications and so would have known that Mr. May had already been screened and that the X-ray was not his own. At the very least, the railway has a good case that Peirce, as administrator of the screenings, failed in its obligations to quality control.

While Peirce has conceded in court documents that the scam took place, it insists it had no knowledge of the deception or what role Mr. Gilkison played, and says it did not start keeping records of "negative" screenings until 2000. It has further argued that since Mr. Gilkison was an "independent contractor" (rather than a salaried employee), the firm has no legal liability for his conduct. This is a convenient and not very persuasive distinction, to say the least. * * *

Tawdry details aside, the case offers some broader lessons for the judiciary. West Virginia long ago became a favorite dumping ground for asbestos suits because of its reputation for jackpot justice. The state's court system responded by consolidating suits into mass litigation, thus denying defendants the ability to contest individual cases. This in turn became an invitation for tort lawyers to generate as many claims as possible, and the May-Jayne fraud is one result. Anyone who thinks this is the only such fraud hasn't been paying attention to asbestos litigation.

Which is where the prosecutors can and should come in. As more cases of silicosis and asbestosis fraud come to light, courts have slowly changed course and allowed defense teams more leeway to investigate individual claims. This is a great first step toward getting the tens of thousands of bogus suits dismissed, while getting legitimate claims heard more quickly.

But this still leaves the question of who will be held responsible for filing fraudulent claims. Both a New York federal grand jury and Congress are looking at silicosis fraud. Yet as the CSX case shows, many of the corrupt practices rampant in silicosis suits got their start in asbestos. If the Justice Department really wants to clean up the trial bar, asbestos-lawsuit fraud is the mother lode.

Not All Speech Is Free (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SOME CIVIL LIBERTARIANS ARE denouncing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling Tuesday against a former Los Angeles prosecutor who says he was disciplined for speaking out against police misconduct. They may want to consider how they would feel if the same decision went against, say, a Bush administration official who was fired for saying that proponents of the president's immigration policy suppressed evidence that illegal immigrants increase crime and disease.

The high court was divided along ideological lines on the case. It held that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office did not violate the free-speech rights of Deputy Dist. Atty. Richard Ceballos by denying him a promotion because of his memo alleging that police officers lied to obtain a search warrant.

The majority opinion was written by Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative who has been a defender of the 1st Amendment. Kennedy conceded that the 1st Amendment protects public employees when they speak as citizens, but he said no such protection attaches to speech "pursuant to their official duties." He noted: "When a citizen enters government service, the citizen by necessity must accept certain limitations on his or her freedom."

This was a close case for the court — it was a 5-4 decision. But the dissenters couldn't agree on a single rationale for protecting on-the-job communications like the Ceballos memo — a sign that the majority was right in not announcing a new 1st Amendment protection for such speech.

Justice David H. Souter, in an opinion joined by justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, suggested a case-by-case approach to deciding whether "addressing official wrongdoing and threats to health and safety can outweigh the government's stake in the efficient implementation of policy." Justice Stephen Breyer declined to sign the Souter opinion because he said it "fails to give sufficient weight to the serious managerial and administrative concerns that the majority describes." Stevens, though he signed the Souter opinion, wrote a separate dissent objecting to the notion "that there is a categorical difference between speaking as a citizen and speaking in the course of one's employment."

But is there? Any American has the right to spout off against the legalization of illegal immigrants. A member of an administration that takes a pro-legalization stance does not have the same right to second-guess that administration's views in the name of "whistle-blowing." Whatever one thinks of Ceballos' actions, the court was right not to blur the distinction between citizen speech and employee speech.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Citizens Seek Investigation (IRONTT)

By Michael Caldwell, The Ironton Tribune

Ironton (OH) Tribune, June 2, 2006

Nearly 70 citizens — and one U.S. Congressman — are asking for some federal help to investigate theRock Hill School District's handling of disabled and minority students, an issue that is already being addressed in three pending legal cases.

Though Rep. Ted Strickland has joined in on the request, the effort has been led by Richard Diamond, a vocal opponent to longtime Superintendent Lloyd Evans and parent of a child with disabilities in the school district.

Sixty-nine signatures were turned in on a petition asking the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Education to step in, citing a host of allegations, most of which have not been substantiated or are part of three pending legal cases.

DOJ_NMG_0031497

"We know that over the years, parents have asked the Ohio Department of Education and the Justice Department for help but, until now, nothing has happened," Diamond said in a written release distributed by Columbus attorney Mike Moore, who also represents the three families in the pending legal cases.

Three years ago, Brent and Amanda Unroe filed a lawsuit against the board, claiming Brent Unroe was unlawfully fired from his job as a special education teacher and that their adopted African-American special needs children were discriminated against.

School officials have always denied the allegations and have said in the past that Brent Unroe was terminated for insubordination and inappropriately handling students.

The Unroe case is scheduled for trial next week in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati.

Through Moore, two other families have also filed lawsuits against the board. Brenda Mulkey and Shara Jenkins claim their diabetic children were discriminated against.

Trial dates have not yet been scheduled in those cases.

School officials have also denied any wrongdoing in all these cases. Evans said he is not aware of any basis for these claims and thinks the real motivation is far less altruistic.

"I think this is a political action group just out to get someone," he said.

In fact, Evans said he thinks the district had done the exact opposite of the discrimination allegations.

"We have erected additional special education units to take care of handicapped kids," Evans said. When the district was building new schools a few years ago, the district funded more classrooms for special education than the state had allocated funds for.

The petition and Strickland's letter ask for an immediate and thorough investigation of the administration and the allegations.

"More than 50 of my constituents signed a letter that raises disturbing questions about the RHLSD administration's treatment of minority students with disabilities," Strickland said in his letter. "The letter cites instances of physical abuse, intimidation and failure to cooperate with basic administrative requests.

Evans said he welcomes any agency to take a closer look at the district.

"I have no problem with anyone investigating," he said. "I think we are doing things in a proper manner and certainly not discriminating against kids."

Bush To Back Gay Marriage Ban Amendment (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, June 1, 2006

President Bush will promote a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage on Monday, the eve of a scheduled Senate vote on the cause that is dear to his conservative backers.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, the proposal would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

It stands little chance of passing the 100-member Senate, where proponents are struggling to get even 50 votes. Several Republicans oppose the measure, and so far only one Democrat — Sen. Ben Nelson (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska — says he will vote for it.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved the amendment on May 18 along party lines after a shouting match between a Democrat and the chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa. He bid Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record), D-Wis., "good riddance" after Feingold declared his opposition to the amendment and his intention to leave the meeting.

Bush aides said he would be making his remarks on the subject Monday.

A slim majority of Americans oppose gay marriage, according to a poll by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press from March. But the poll also showed attitudes are changing: 63 percent opposed gay marriage in February 2004.

Those poll results don't reflect how people might feel about amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court decided to legalize such marriages in 2003. A year later, San Francisco issued thousands of marriage licenses to gay couples.

This November, initiatives banning same-sex marriages are expected to be on the ballot in Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. In 2004, 13 states approved initiatives prohibiting gay marriage or civil unions, with 11 states casting votes on Election Day.

Bush benefited as religious conservatives turned out to vote and helped him defeat Democratic Sen. John Kerry in 2004. In Ohio, an initiative rejecting the legality of civil unions won handily. The same state tipped the election to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0031498

"The president firmly believes that marriage is an enduring and sacred institution between men and women and has supported measures to protect the sanctity of marriage," White House spokesman Ken Lisaius said.

Bush has lost support among conservatives who blame the White House and Congress for runaway government spending, illegal immigration and lack of action on social issues such as the gay marriage amendment.

Opponents of the amendment objected to Bush promoting a measure they said amounts to discrimination.

"This is fundamentally both a civil rights and religious freedom issue and the president's position of supporting amending the constitution is just dead wrong," said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "This is simply to give ammunition to the so-called religious right just to show that the president is still with them."

U.S. Threatens To Sue Over Care At Prison (MJS)

By Mary Zahn Mzahn@journalsentinel.com

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, May 31, 2006

Taycheedah treatment 'unacceptable'

Female prisoners with mental illness - some as young as 15 - are regularly placed in isolation cells at Taycheedah Correctional Institution, receive little treatment and are given psychotropic drugs for months without monitoring by a physician, a U.S. Justice Department report has concluded.

In a May 2 letter to Gov. Jim Doyle, the assistant attorney general in charge of the Civil Rights Division, Wan J. Kim, called Taycheedah's treatment of inmates with mental illness "unacceptable" and a violation of their constitutional rights. The letter states that Wisconsin can either voluntarily correct the problems or face possible legal action by the federal government this year.

The Justice Department report was based on a yearlong federal investigation. It does not indicate what prompted the review, and federal officials declined to comment further.

"It is an embarrassment for our state," said state Rep. Sheldon Wasserman (D-Milwaukee), who is also a physician. "This is an absolute horror. What we are doing is something from the dark ages. Why does it take the threat of a federal lawsuit to get Wisconsin to do something about it? This is going to cost millions of dollars to fix."

Doyle's office referred a call for comment to state Department of Corrections officials.

John Dipko, Department of Corrections spokesman, said Tuesday the concerns raised in the report are being taken "very seriously" and that the state will work with U.S. officials to address them.

"It is important to note that the Department of Corrections is taking a comprehensive, systemwide approach to health care - including mental health," Dipko said, adding that the system is working toward becoming accredited by the National Commission on Correctional Health Care in the next six years. Taycheedah, he said, will be the first prison in the process.

The prison, in Fond du Lac County, houses about 700 maximum- and medium-security female inmates.

Federal investigators found that 44 out of 59 women in segregation last July had "serious mental illnesses and were observed to be in significant distress." One of the women was clearly psychotic and had a history of eating her feces and drinking her urine. Investigators said she had been placed in segregation because of "lots of tickets" for disciplinary problems and for "disrespect."

Other cases and issues cited in the report include these:

· An inmate with severe mental illness who fatally asphyxiated herself while in segregation. In episodes before her death, she had swallowed pen inserts and had gone on periodic hunger strikes.

· The prison operates a unit to provide specialized treatment for inmates with mental illness, though federal investigators found almost no programming and that most of the inmates had nothing to do during the day.

· Untrained correctional guards distribute and monitor medication to inmates with mental illness because there are too few nurses. In addition, it sometimes takes weeks to fill prescriptions for medications used to treat mental illness.

· Some inmates with mental illness who attempted to harm themselves with writing instruments or parts of mattresses have been charged with "misuse of state property" and placed in segregation units. In other cases, inmates have been charged with self-abuse and then punished by being placed in segregation.

"Punishing inmates for mental health symptoms that are beyond their control is unacceptable and ineffectual . . . " the federal investigators wrote.

The report notes that the prison's annual report for fiscal year 2005 described "an elaborate array of programming" but that investigators found "that very little actually exists."

Dipko, the prison spokesman, said the system has "made significant strides" in the area of mental health throughout the system, including Taycheedah. Those include an increase in psychiatry hours and additional nurse hours, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031499

The federal findings come as the state is facing a $1.5 billion deficit in 2007. Health care expenditures for the adult prison system have increased by more than 86% from 2001 to 2005, when the average daily population grew by 38.5%, state records show.

Among the report's list of needed changes were increased psychiatric and nursing staff, better medication monitoring and improved programming and treatment to ensure that inmates with mental illness are not kept in segregation cells.

Psychiatrist staffing at the prison was called "grossly inadequate." The prison employs two part-time psychiatrists who carry a caseload of more than 400 patients at time, the report states. Inmates with serious mental health needs sometimes wait for months untreated, investigators wrote.

By Michael Hill, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 2, 2006

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-Lawyers for same-sex couples seeking the right to marry in New York told the state's highest court Wednesday they are being treated as "unequal citizens" and denied a constitutional right.

The 44 couples want the Court of Appeals to follow the lead of high court judges in neighboring Massachusetts and rule that New York's constitution gives same-sex couples the same right to wed that straight couples have always had.

"We are evolving as a society," said Terence Kindlon, one of the lawyers representing the couples in four lawsuits before the court, "and just because we did something 200 years ago, or 100 years ago or 50 years ago, it's not necessarily a good justification to do it now."

The couples have lost in lower appeals courts and are at odds with Gov. George Pataki's health department and state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer's office, which claim New York law prohibits issuing licenses to same-sex couples.

The cases argued Wednesday were filed two years ago, when gay marriage controversies flared up from Boston to San Francisco.

A decision from the court could come in a month or two.

At The Corner Of Progress And Peril (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

What does it mean to be a black man? Imagine three African American boys, kindergartners who are largely alike in intelligence, talent and character, whose potential seems limitless. According to a wealth of statistics and academic studies, in just over a decade one of the boys is likely to be locked up or headed to prison. The second boy -- if he hasn't already dropped out -- will seriously weigh leaving high school and be pointed toward an uncertain future. The third boy will be speeding toward success by most measures.

Being a black man in America can mean inhabiting a border area between possibility and peril, to feel connected to, defined by, even responsible for each of those boys -- and for other black men. In dozens of interviews, black men described their shared existence, of sometimes wondering whether their accomplishments will be treated as anomalies, their individuality obscured by the narrow images that linger in the minds of others.

This unique bond, which National Urban League President Marc Morial calls "the kinship of the species," is driving many black men to focus renewed attention on the portrait of achievement and failure that hangs over the next generation. A recent spate of scholarly studies have brought urgency to the introspection, as the studies show the condition of poor, young black men has worsened in the past decade despite the generally strong economic conditions of the 1990s.

Black men now number 18 million, and many are pondering their roles in a country that is undergoing significant social and demographic changes.

In the coming weeks and months, The Washington Post will explore the lives of black men through their experiences -- how they raise their sons, cope with wrongful imprisonment, navigate the perceived terrain between smart and cool, defy convention against the backdrop of racial expectations. On Sunday, The Post will publish the findings of a major poll conducted jointly with the Henry J. Kaiser Family Foundation and Harvard University. The nationwide survey measured the attitudes of black men on a variety of issues and asked others for their views of black men.

More than 50 years after the publication of Ralph Ellison's "Invisible Man," black men appear more visible than ever -- a freshman senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, is the American Idol of national politics, and Will Smith is perhaps the most bankable star in Hollywood. Yet black men who put their kids through college by mopping floors, who sit at home reading Tennyson at night, who wear dreadlocks but design spacecraft, say it sometimes seems as if the world doesn't believe they exist.

DOJ_NMG_0031500

The dueling realities of their history -- steady progress and devastating setbacks -- continue to burden many black men in ways that are sometimes difficult to explain.

"As a black man, you often think that things can go either way," says Todd Boyd, an African American who has carved out a niche exploring race and popular culture as a professor at the University of Southern California. "You could be that guy in the penitentiary, or you could be that guy on everybody's television screen."

You could be Gilbert Arenas, an NBA all-star who makes millions of dollars a year but still feels he relates to the "young brother" who catches the bus every day to fry burgers for a living. "We have an unspoken bond about life," he says.

The statistics that spell out the status of black men are often conflicting, sometimes perplexing.

The percentage of black men graduating from college has nearly quadrupled since the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and yet more black men earn their high school equivalency diplomas in prison each year than graduate from college. Black families where men are in the home earn median incomes that approach those of white families. Yet more than half of the nation's 5.6 million black boys live in fatherless households, 40 percent of which are impoverished. The ranks of professional black men have exploded over four decades -- there were 78,000 black male engineers in 2004, a 33 percent increase in 10 years. And yet 840,000 black men are incarcerated, and the chances of a black boy serving time has nearly tripled in three decades, Justice Department projections show.

So where does that leave 17-year-old Jonathan McMaster as he ponders his future? The statistics show that fewer than half of black boys graduate from high school four years after entering the ninth grade. And yet here he is, a junior at Baltimore's exclusive Gilman School, running track, playing the viola in the school orchestra, approaching fluency in French. He has visited nearly 30 countries and is spending a month studying in London. It used to be "a hindrance" to be a black man, McMaster says he's been told by his elders. "But with everybody trying to diversify now, I think it has become almost an advantage."

Where the nation was once largely segregated along a black-white divide, the country has become more racially and ethnically mixed, creating opportunities -- and new sensibilities.

Erin Smith, 23, who recently graduated with a business degree from Howard University, once considered himself a militant. "You kind of get groomed, in a way, in that totally pro-black environment at Howard." But as he began to pursue his business dreams -- a fledgling multimedia company he created his freshman year and a real estate venture with his father -- Smith started to expand his thinking.

"I saw myself as potentially being kind of racist," he says "of closing myself off to people. I'm still pro-black, but we don't need to totally focus on race. We're all part of the human race. I kind of grew a little bit. I look at life as a puzzle -- day by day, you get a new piece. Some young men think success is 20-inch rims, flat-screen TV. They only think of success as what they see -- and that's what they see."

What does it mean to be a black man?

Marc Morial was leaving the downtown Madison Hotel when he got into an impromptu conversation with a doorman. The doorman, also black, wore a uniform and a whistle around his neck; Morial was dressed in an immaculate gray suit with a crisp white pocket scarf. When the chat concluded, the two locked arms and pulled each other close in a signature embrace that is common to black men across the country.

"Black men relate to each other in a special way," Morial says.

On the streets, strangers frequently give each other an uptick of the head when their eyes meet, a nod of black male acknowledgment. Black men have invented so many special handshakes that a recent McDonald's commercial turns on this fact. Their commonality is often defined by their style, their walk, their slang and even how they refer to each other ("Slim," "Shorty," "Dawg," "Mo," "Brother"). Wherever black men congregate, there is often a comfort level that crosses class and generational lines. There is even a universally acknowledged black men's club, the barbershop, where no subject is off limits.

"It's the cohesion that comes from knowing whatever your situation in life is you're carrying a special burden," says Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans. "But also that you're strong enough to do it. Whatever they put on you, you can handle it. You can knock me down, but I'm getting up. You can't knock me down with no love tap."

Over the past 100 years, perhaps no slice of the U.S. population has been more studied, analyzed and dissected than black males. Dozens of governmental boards and commissions have investigated their plight, scholars have researched and written papers on them, and black men have been the subject of at least 400 books.

In the early 20th century, researchers pioneered a still-evolving movement to pinpoint a biological link between black men and crime. After the social turmoil of the 1960s, experts spotlighted the rampant deprivation and lack of opportunity among black men that lent urgency to President Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty.

Later, the focus became the diminishing opportunities in cities, where well-paying manufacturing work was vanishing, locking many unskilled black men out of the job market. That gave way to concerns about drugs and crime and the fraying of the family structure, as 70 percent of black babies were being born to unmarried mothers and incarceration rates soared.

The NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund hosted a 1985 panel discussion that called young black men "an endangered species," a label that stuck even as some black men were making strides toward the middle class and a new level of social acceptance.

In 1995, the Million Man March, spearheaded by Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan, drew hundreds of thousands of black men to the Mall in an unrivaled show of unity and concern for one another. The gathering seemed to signal a watershed moment of self-reflection.

Since the march, black men have met in thousands of groups to address their problems, reinforce their progress and understand their lives with greater clarity. Perhaps the latest, most dramatic evidence of this involvement is "The Covenant," a book charting a plan for black self-improvement that was an outgrowth of commentator Tavis Smiley's State of the Black Union forums. The book has been a No. 1 seller on the New York Times nonfiction paperback list.

"What we have seen in the last 10 years is increasing concern among successful black men in terms of trying to help other African American men succeed," observed Courtland Lee, a University of Maryland professor and former editor of the Journal of African American Men. "Even successful black men are victims of this crisis. They know they walk around with a target on their backs."

For black men, being poor has grown more perilous with time -- especially for the young. The 1960s sociological classic "Tally's Corner" charted the lives of what it called "Negro streetcorner men" in the Shaw neighborhood of Northwest Washington, painting a portrait of a group hobbled by weak education, dead-end jobs and fracturing families. Over four decades, wages and opportunities for uneducated workers have diminished, while the ranks of men disconnected from much of society have grown.

The path to the corner is set early for some black men. While school achievement has been a growing concern for boys of most every ethnicity, the problem is most acute among black boys, who are far more likely to be left back, be assigned to special education, score poorly on standardized tests, be suspended from school or eventually drop out than any other demographic group, numerous studies show.

Once they leave school, nearly three-quarters of black men in their twenties are jobless or incarcerated, an unemployment rate much higher than that of similarly situated white and Hispanic youth, according to a report from the Urban Institute.

"There has been a big change in what is thought of as normal in poor black communities," says John H. McWhorter, a senior fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute, which is hosting a conference on black men this month. "Back in the old days, there were always black men who were not interested in working. They were called corner men. But years ago, if you were a black man and you didn't work, it was a shame. Now, the shame is gone."

A black man is more than six times as likely as a white man to be slain. The trend is most stark among black men 14 to 24 years old: They were implicated in a quarter of the nation's homicides and accounted for 15 percent of the homicide victims in 2002, although they were just 1.2 percent of the population, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Also, black men are nine times as likely as white men to die from AIDS, and life expectancy for black men is 69.2 years -- more than six years shorter than that of white men.

Trying to reverse these trends through a broad public policy strategy is at the heart of the Dellums Commission, named after former congressman Ronald Dellums (D-Calif.). The commission will issue its report later this year. "This is beyond a crisis," says Gail Christopher, a vice president at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, who is overseeing the commission's study of the problems affecting young men of color. "It is a catastrophe."

It doesn't always start as a catastrophe.

Growing up in New York City and San Jose, Rahsaan Ferguson, 27, remembers his father's mantra: "You are a black boy. That's two things you will always have against you."

Now, Ferguson understands that his father, an employee of the Santa Clara County transit system, was merely trying to prepare him for a harsh world. But in his young mind, his father's message was confusing -- and a little disabling. "It kind of brings you down," he says. "I know it is supposed to make you strive harder. But when you hear that over and over, it makes you believe you are not supposed to succeed."

After being left back in third grade, Ferguson says, he lost confidence. As he continued to struggle in school, he worried about failing, as he had been taught so many black men do. Ultimately, he stopped trying, dropped out of school, fathered a son, now 7, and fell into crime. First, it was a few stolen cars. After a while, he sold crack cocaine, eventually serving a four-month jail term after authorities confiscated more than three grams of the drug from an apartment he shared with his girlfriend. Now,

Ferguson is struggling to find stability, earning $10 an hour working for a sign company in one of the nation's most expensive areas.

"I can't help but think about the white kids I know. They were raised to think they are going to succeed and be better than everyone," Ferguson says.

The Rev. Elwood Gray, chaplain at the Patuxent Institute in Jessup and president of the National Coalition of Prison Ministries, has been working with inmates and ex-offenders for nearly 30 years. Many of those black men feel left behind and stigmatized by their behavior, he says, and as a result are sometimes difficult to reach when they leave prison. It's almost like they are in "an intensive-care unit," Gray says. "The approach must be holistic because they need employment, food, shelter and mental health care."

The plight of poor, young black men has fueled some attitudes and practices that affect all black men. In a 2001 article defending racial profiling as a rational police tactic, journalist John Derbyshire wrote in the National Review Online: "A policeman who concentrates a disproportionate amount of his limited time and resources on young black men is going to uncover far more crimes -- and therefore be far more successful in his career than one who biases his attention to, say, middle-aged Asian women."

These images not only shape how others see black men but also can affect how black men see themselves. Warren Simmons, 55, executive director of Brown University's Annenberg Institute for School Reform, recalls waiting in his car at a stoplight in downtown Washington and locking his doors when he spotted a black man approaching. Incredulous, the man began yelling at Simmons.

"For a moment, I found myself caught in a cultural quandary," Simmons says. "I'm a black man, and I know what it is like to have people respond to me with fear. Yet I did this. He assumed my response was to him as an individual, but it was directed to him as part of a larger group."

If these images distort the rich complexity of the lives of black men, they also have been embraced by some of the nation's most prominent icons of popular culture. A long, lucrative stream of music videos and movies extol the "thug life" fantasy of fast money, fast women and fast living.

Rapper 50 Cent has built his chart-busting, multimedia career on his being shot nine times and left for dead during his days as a drug dealer in Queens. Similarly, rapper, actor and pitchman Snoop Dogg has ridden music referring to his gang-life past, and his playful public persona as a would-be pimp, to fame.

In some ways, black men have always stood on the leading of edge of popular culture, often through the very imagery that offstage or off-screen inspires fear and contempt. Minstrel shows, widely regarded as the nation's first form of mass entertainment, burst on the scene in the decades after the American Revolution. The shows most often featured white performers in blackface mocking aspects of black life.

While the wide-eyed parodies are widely condemned as racist, in their heyday they helped shape society's perception of African Americans. Similarly, some scholars say, popular music -- including hip-hop -- and sports play an outsized role in forming contemporary notions of black men.

"When you look at American popular culture, it is really driven by hip-hop, and young, African American men are the face of hip-hop," says S. Craig Watkins, a University of Texas researcher. "It speaks to the fear-fascination relationship the nation has with black men."

The nation's most accomplished black men usually have a story to tell about what they overcame, who influenced them, how they survived.

Edward T. Welburn, chief of global design at General Motors Corp., says his interest in cars was stoked by observing his father operate a West Philadelphia auto repair service.

Guidance counselors at John B. Slaughter's high school in Topeka, Kan., laughed aloud, Slaughter said, when he told them he wanted to be an engineer. They had never heard of a black engineer, and they told Slaughter he should pursue a trade. Slaughter ignored them and graduated from Kansas State University in 1956 with a degree in electrical engineering, launching a career that took him to the helms of the National Science Foundation, the University of Maryland and Occidental College in Los Angeles.

Colin L. Powell recalls that he had only a 78 average at Morris High School in the Bronx and was considered a late bloomer at City College of New York, but the Army's robust affirmative-action program accelerated his rise through the ranks.

"It doesn't bother me if people say I made it with affirmative action," says Powell, who joined the Army ROTC in 1954, just six years after President Harry S. Truman ended segregation in the armed forces, and eventually became chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "All that matters is what you do afterwards. When I heard complaints, I'd say: 'It doesn't matter if it was affirmative action or not. I got it, you didn't.' "

Powell, who is now active in an array of mentoring programs, offers his own history to young black men who worry about the limitations others may place on them. Your achievements, he tells them, need not be accompanied by apology.

"Of course you're offended," he says. But "you can choke with something in your craw. I've seen too many people grind themselves to death worrying about what other people say about them. Frankly, we don't have time for that."

And yet even among the highest achievers, doubts sometimes intrude.

Curtis Symonds, 50, was one of the youngest African Americans to run a cable TV business in the nation in the early 1980s. He eventually wound up at Black Entertainment Television, where he helped expand the reach of the cable network from 18 million to 70 million homes over 14 years.

He left BET a multimillionaire and became chief operating officer of the Women's National Basketball Association's Washington Mystics. He also dreamed of opening Hoop Magic, a $7 million, 65,000-square-foot gym in Chantilly.

Despite his wealth and business experience, the first five or six banks he talked to did not want to touch his idea -- a reluctance that, rightly or wrongly, Symonds laid to the fact that he is a black man. "A lot of those bankers could not see my dream," he says. "All they could see is this black guy who wanted to borrow X millions of dollars."

Symonds got his financing and opened his gym.

Several years ago, Franklin D. Gilliam Jr., a political scientist at UCLA, set out to understand more deeply the perceptions people have of black men. He chose a provocative topic for his experiment: crime. In his test, he showed groups of viewers a mock newscast, which included a short account of a robbery at an automated teller machine during which the victim was killed.

Gilliam manipulated the image of the "suspect" in the newscast, sometimes depicting him as black, sometimes as white and other times not at all. Afterward, the participants were asked to identify the suspect's race. Most of the viewers accurately recalled whether a black or white face was shown. But 60 percent of those shown no image remembered seeing one, and an overwhelming majority of those said they saw a black face. In fact, they had not seen a face at all. To Gilliam, that meant that when people saw crime, they often expected a black man to be linked to it -- not necessarily because of blind racism but because of the images they had consumed their entire lives.

He sees evidence of that in his own life. As a vice chancellor, he is the highest-ranking black man on UCLA's campus. "Within 200 yards of my office, people genuflect when they see me," he says with a laugh. But a few blocks away on the street in Westwood, his colleagues often walk right by him, particularly when he is dressed casually.

"All they see," he says, "is a black male."

The Akaka State? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The last time we wrote about the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, in July 2005, we called it secessionist, unconstitutional and un-American. And that was being kind.

Our view of the bill -- which, like Freddy Krueger, refuses to die -- hasn't changed. But now that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has promised to bring it to a cloture vote in the coming days, it's worth reminding readers what this ugly drama from the beautiful state is all about.

The Reorganization Act -- better known as the Akaka Bill, after its U.S. Senate sponsor, Democrat Daniel Akaka -- would create a sovereign government, similar to existing Indian tribes, for the roughly 400,000 people who identify themselves as "Native Hawaiians." At a minimum, such recognition would protect dozens of federally funded programs for native Hawaiians that in recent years have come under increasingly successful Constitutional challenges as violations of the 14th and 15th Amendments.

But it would probably do much worse. The Akaka Bill could also lead to discriminatory treatment of non-Native Hawaiians, who already are excluded from private schools run for the exclusive benefit of the Natives. Vast tracts of land (entire islands, perhaps) might also be set aside exclusively for Native use. The Office of Hawaiian Affairs, a state agency, acknowledges that the Akaka Bill allows for the "complete legal and territorial independence from the United States and the re-establishment of a Hawaiian nation-state." Years, if not decades, of litigation would follow its passage.

No wonder that, while the bill is popular among Hawaii's political class, including Republican Governor Linda Lingle, it has generated remarkable resistance among Hawaiians. More than 80% of Hawaiians are not "Natives," and, believe it or not, the great majority actually think they are entitled to equal protection under the law and do not want to create a privileged class among them.

As one Kaleihanamau Johnson told the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, "I am of Hawaiian, Caucasian and Chinese descent . . . and do not support the Akaka Bill." She added that if the bill "comes to pass, I will be forced to choose on which side of the fence to stand. I will choose the Anglo-American tradition of the right to life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness. This will prevent me from recognizing all that is Hawaiian in me. I consider the Akaka bill to be a proposal to violate my rights."

DOJ_NMG_0031504

Ms. Johnson is not alone. In its January report, the Civil Rights Commission found that the Akaka Bill would "establish an impermissible racial preference in the establishment and operation of a governing entity." The report noted that, unlike the Native Americans to which Governor Lingle tries to liken Native Hawaiians, "membership would be defined solely on the basis of ancestry, not on the basis of geographic, cultural, and political cohesiveness and the presence of an established community as is done for other Indian tribes."

The Commission also found that "nothing in the [Akaka Bill] guarantees that the race-based entity to be created would be democratic in nature," and that the Akaka Bill "could prompt other native or indigenous entities or other ethnic groups to seek similar rights through self-governance programs."

The Commission went on to recommend against the bill. Extraordinarily, however, its findings were removed last month from the January report, apparently under pressure from Commissioners Michael Yaki and Arlan Melendez, both Democrats. Now it looks as if the bill will pass the Senate if brought to a floor vote. It has the backing of most, if not all, 45 Democrats, as well as Republicans such as Lisa Murkowski and Ted Stevens of Alaska, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina.

Maybe this all seems like a quaint and distant debate. But Hawaii is no less a state than New York or Texas, and the legal precedents established there matter to the mainland. The Akaka Bill should frighten everyone who cares for the American ideal of e pluribus unum, and fears the ethnic Balkanization of the country. Republicans this week have a chance to get one right by keeping an unconstitutional bill from reaching the floor of the Senate.

ANTITRUST:

Michigan Minimum-service Real Estate Bills Moving Forward (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, June 2, 2006

State Senate committee passes DOJ-opposed bills 4-0

A proposal to require real estate agents and brokers to provide a specific set of services for their clients is moving forward in the Michigan Legislature, despite opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and a state regulatory agency.

House Bill 4849 and House Bill 4850, companion bills that passed a state Senate committee in a 4-0 vote Wednesday, provide that real estate licensees who enter into service agreements with clients must provide certain services for that client, including acceptance and delivery of offers and counteroffers; assistance in developing, communicating, negotiating and presenting offers, counter-offers and related documents or notices; and furnishing or causing to be furnished a complete and detailed closing statement.

In October 2005, after the Michigan state House of Representatives voted 105-3 to pass the bills, the Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department sent a letter to a state Senate committee chairman and the director of the Michigan Department of Labor and Economic Growth to express opposition, citing concerns about the possible anti-competitive and anti-consumer effects of the legislation.

The language in the bills is similar to other state legislation, sometimes referred to as minimum-service legislation, that has passed in other states despite similar federal objections. The Michigan Association of Realtors is supporting the bills, which could reach the state Senate floor as soon as next week. In other states, too, Realtor trade groups have endorsed the legislation as pro-consumer.

Opponents of minimum-services legislation have said that such efforts could serve to limit consumer choice for real estate services, while supporters have said the legislation ensures that real estate consumers will receive adequate service in real estate transactions.

The federal agencies charged that House Bill 4849 "is likely to increase the price that some consumers who prefer full-service brokerage pay for real estate services," and "would deprive consumers of the opportunity to purchase their preferred choice (of services)." Also, the letter states, "We recognize that some laws limiting forms of competition may be beneficial when they address specific market failures shown to harm consumers. However, we have seen no evidence that consumers currently are harmed by fee-for-service real estate brokerage."

Likewise, Tom Martin, of the Michigan state Department of Labor and Economic Growth, said in a May 31 statement to the Senate Economic Development, Small Business and Regulatory Reform Committee that the legislation "unnecessarily limits consumer choice and diminishes the attractiveness of some new business models that show promise of reducing the price of houses for consumers who wish to use these new models."

He also stated, "If there is a regulatory need to mandate the provision of certain minimum services, the (state) Bureau of Commercial Services has not experienced an increase in complaints that would demonstrate it. (I)t is very important to empower consumer choice. These bills do the opposite. It is equally important in our economy to embrace new technologies and the innovative business models that use them. These bills move Michigan in the opposite direction."

Martin said today that the department has had "a long history of dialog on these bills" with the Michigan Association of Realtors and the federal agencies. "Basically our feeling is there's no need for regulation here. The bills reduce customer choice, and though the proponents say that the bills are neutral with respect to alternative business models we do believe that they make some alternative business models less attractive."

Bill Martin, CEO for the Michigan Association of Realtors, said the association has attempted to work with Justice Department officials to resolve differences over the legislation. "Frankly, it was very frustrating -- the exercise that we went through with them. We're doing this to protect the consumer."

He noted that Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission officials stated in their letter that many multiple listing services in Michigan bar property listings in which there is no formal exclusive agency relationship between a real estate professional and a client, though he said the proposed legislation "has absolutely zero to do with MLSs."

Also, he said, the proposed laws allow real estate professionals to avoid the service requirements when they work with clients outside of a formal service agreement. "If (consumers) don't want those that is fine -- go do a different relationship." The text in HB 4849 provides that "a licensee providing real estate services pursuant to an agreement allowed under law that is not a service provision agreement creating an exclusive agency relationship is not considered in violation" of the minimum-service requirements.

Peter Langley, chief of state for state Sen. Alan Sanborn, R-Richmond Township, who is chairman of the Senate committee that approved the legislation this week, said that representatives for the Michigan Association of Realtors spoke in favor of the legislation during the hearing, and there was also a statement in opposition to the bills from two real estate professionals.

Cheryl Lynch, co-owner of Lake Michigan Realty Center in New Buffalo, Mich., who has opposed the legislation along with her husband and brokerage co-owner Mike, said she did not attend the committee meeting and she was upset to learn that the legislation is moving to the full Senate.

In a written statement to the committee, the Lynches said, "We adamantly remain opposed to any restrictions on the freedom of choice that consumers now enjoy when buying or selling real estate. Consumers are growing angry about the continual destruction of their individual sovereignty by their elected officials."

She also said she expects the Senate will approve the legislation. "I guess the people are powerless at this point."

EBay Tries E-mail In Net Neutrality Fight (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, CNET News.com

CNET News, June 2, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif.--eBay this week unleashed a political machine that should make politicians envious: a national e-mail blast over Net neutrality.

Meg Whitman, chief executive of the Internet auctioneer, called on more than a million eBay members to get involved in the debate over telecommunications laws and "send a message to your representatives in Congress before it is too late."

"The telephone and cable companies in control of Internet access are trying to use their enormous political muscle to dramatically change the Internet," Whitman wrote. "It might be hard to believe, but lawmakers in Washington are seriously debating whether consumers should be free to use the Internet as they want in the future."

This is the first time that eBay has used e-mail to urge its members to weigh in on a national issue, and also the first time Whitman sent it out under her own name, the company said Thursday.

eBay--which has been active in a pro-Net neutrality coalition for years--confirmed that more than a million e-mails have been sent out so far, but declined to offer a more specific number. The campaign is ongoing.

The concept of Net neutrality, which generally means that all Internet sites must be treated equally, has drawn a list of high-profile backers, from pop music star Moby and actress Alyssa Milano to Vint Cerf, one of the technical pioneers of the Internet. It's also led to a political rift between big Internet companies such as Google and Yahoo that back it--and telecommunications companies that argue federal legislation will curb their ability to manage their own networks.

"Meg has been following the issue, and with legislation moving through the House and the Senate, felt that this was an appropriate time to reach out to the community to make sure Congress heard what the community thought about the telecommunications reform bill," said Tod Cohen, eBay's associate general counsel for global policy.

Other tech companies have tried e-mail outreach efforts before, though this week's campaign ranks among the largest. Microsoft, for instance, distributed a "Freedom to Innovate" newsletter during its antitrust trial that ended with the exhortation: "Now is the time to let your elected officials know how you feel about the case."

eBay's e-mail campaign comes as the political debate over Net neutrality is growing more pointed in Washington, D.C. On May 25, one House of Representatives panel voted for formal Net neutrality regulations bitterly opposed by AT&T, Verizon and other broadband providers--while another House panel rejected them on April 5.

For their part, network operators from the telephone and cable industries, now allied with some of the nation's largest hardware makers, have said repeatedly that they have no intention of blocking, degrading or impairing content. They say they're protecting their right to manage their networks as they see fit, which could mean charging extra to heavy bandwidth users, such as video providers, that expect to have their content shuttled at priority speeds.

Also on Thursday, the American Electronics Association, or AeA, cautiously embraced Net neutrality.

In a statement, the trade association said its board of directors' executive committee endorsed a set of principles asking Congress to protect consumers and Internet companies "from anticompetitive and unreasonably discriminatory conduct by broadband network providers."

That's a careful statement that falls short of endorsing some of the more aggressive Net neutrality proposals--such as the one approved by the House Judiciary Committee on May 25--that would go further and block what's being called a "high speed" lane for certain services such as video.

AeA's board includes representatives of dozens of companies including Microsoft, Sun Microsystems, Nanoventions, Intel, Adobe Systems, Qualcomm and eDiets.com.

A Cisco representative responded to AeA's announcement with a statement that said: "Some of the groups who are most public in this debate focus on one part of the network stack or another. We actually care about the entire network--from core to end-user. No new regulations are needed in order to support the FCC's connectivity principles."

Inco Won't Sell More Assets To Win Antitrust Approval (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman Doug Alexander

Bloomberg, June 2, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- Inco Ltd. said it doesn't expect to have to sell more than a Norwegian metals refinery to win U.S. and European regulatory approval for its C$19.5 billion ($17.7 billion) takeover of Canadian mining company Falconbridge Ltd.

The deal, which would create the world's largest nickel producer, is being reviewed by regulators and Toronto-based Inco has offered to sell Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery in Kristiansand, Norway, and ``related marketing organizations'' as a remedy to get approvals.

``My view is that the remedy we propose should be adequate,'' Inco Chief Executive Officer Scott Hand said today in an interview. ``I'm confident we'll get the clearance that we need.''

The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, held a closed-door hearing May 29 to discuss Inco's proposals and antitrust concerns. The EC on Feb. 24 opened a four-month probe of the deal. A ruling is due by July 12.

``What we're doing is proposing a remedy that we think makes sense, and one that conceptually I think the regulatory agencies will agree with, because it will replicate the competition that exists today,'' Hand said. ``I think at the end of the day we will work it out.''

Inco shares rose 61 cents to C$73.11 at 4:17 p.m. on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Falconbridge rose 40 cents to C$55.15.

Divestment Proposal

Inco said in an Oct. 11 statement that Falconbridge's Nikkelverk refinery and ``related marketing organizations'' may have to be sold to complete the deal ``expeditiously.''

The refinery would be sold, listed in an initial public offering or disposed of by distributing securities in a separate company that would operate independently, Inco said in the statement.

``If required, Inco would provide the refinery with intermediate product to meet its forecast needs, consistent with what Falconbridge would have done,'' the company said.

Inco and Falconbridge said in October their combined 2005 nickel production would be 735 million pounds, or about 333,000 metric tons. That's equal to 26 percent of global output, based on data compiled by Credit Suisse. Russia's OAO GMK Norilsk Nickel is currently the world's top producer of the metal.

Cobalt Suppliers

Nickel is used in batteries and to prevent corrosion in stainless steel. The commission said in February that Inco and Falconbridge are the two leading suppliers of nickel used as a coating. The companies are also the two biggest suppliers of high-purity cobalt found in so-called super alloys, the commission said. Inco and Falconbridge have about 90 percent of the market for nickel used in super alloys, a key component in turbine blades for jet engines.

The transaction, which has already been cleared by Canadian authorities, is also under review by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Inco spokesman Steve Mitchell said in an interview today that the company is ``having productive discussions'' with U.S. and European antitrust agencies on the disposal of Nikkelverk.

Emails Send A Strong Message For Rambus (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Shares in Rambus, a US memory chip designer, rose nearly 20 per cent on Thursday after it released emails in support of its antitrust litigation against chip manufacturers Samsung and Hynix of Korea and Micron of the US.

But Micron responded that the emails collected during a Department of Justice price-fixing investigation were unrelated to the San Francisco lawsuit where Rambus accuses the three of trying to exclude it from the memory market. The emails made available by Rambus were the result of its successful court action to get evidence unsealed to help its case.

One email sent in June 2001 by Linda Turner, an international sales vice president for Micron at the time, comments on Hynix lowering its prices for DDR (Double Data Rate) memory.

“No problem!” she writes. “We want DDR to explode in the marketplace so have actually been requesting Infineon, Samsung and Hynix to lower their DDR pricing to help it become a standard and drive Rambus away completely.”

Other Micron emails suggest the company’s salesforce is concerned at pricing of DDR, with major PC manufacturers Dell and Compaq seeming to prefer RDRAM (Rambus Dynamic Random Access Memory) chips designed by Rambus.

Daniel Francisco, spokesman for Micron, said yesterday: “Rambus has attempted to bootstrap the DoJ price-fixing investigation into a supposed boycott of Rambus Dram.”

“Rambus Dram was a failure in the marketplace because it was too costly and any performance differentials were not sufficient to justify the inherent cost differences.”

Rambus shares closed 18.5 per cent higher at $28.75 on the news.

Meanwhile, the Semiconductor Industry Association reported on Thursday that worldwide sales of semiconductors grew 8.1 per cent year-on-year to total $19.6bn in April. Sales of D-Ram chips grew by 3.7 per cent from March’s total and were up 7.7 per cent on a year earlier.

Global Stock Trading (NYT)

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

It has been over two centuries since securities traders began meeting informally under a buttonwood tree on Wall Street. The New York Stock Exchange's columned neo-Classical building is as instantly recognizable as the ceremonial ringing of the opening and closing bells, its floor brokers the embodiment of the frenzied pace of the market. The exchange remains a potent symbol of this city's and this country's financial pre-eminence.

Despite the tradition, things have changed. Investment is no longer contained by national boundaries, and operations are regularly executed electronically. Into the crowded fray come new and more complicated financial instruments.

If the exchange's corporate parent, the NYSE Group, is going to keep up, it will have to embrace change. Last year the company announced its acquisition of the electronic trading network Archipelago. Now it has reached a deal for the cross-border European exchange company Euronext.

If approved by regulators and shareholders, it would be the first trans-Atlantic market, though the rival Nasdaq has already bought up a 25 percent stake in the London Stock Exchange. Rather than leading the way, the exchanges are catching up to the reality of internationalized investing.

The combination would create "the world's most liquid and truly global financial marketplace," according to John Thain, chief executive of the NYSE Group. It would certainly be a goliath, with a combined market capitalization at the time of the offer of roughly $21 billion and listed companies worth a total of $27 trillion. Most important to investors in the exchange companies themselves is the $375 million in potential savings that NYSE Group predicts for a combined entity.

If a combined company can pass the fruits of those savings on to the average investor — not to mention added ease in buying shares of foreign companies — we're all for it. An era of global trading could benefit from international exchanges. Regulators on both sides of the Atlantic should take a cue and speed up the process of bringing their respective rules into harmony. There's no time to lose. The financial markets never sleep.

ENVIRONMENT:

$92 Million More Is Sought For Exxon Valdez Cleanup (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 1 — When the Justice Department and the State of Alaska reached their $900 million court settlement with the Exxon Corporation over the environmental damages caused by the Exxon Valdez oil spill, they agreed that, if unforeseeable damages occurred later, the two governments had 15 years to ask for $100 million more.

On Thursday, with the deadline approaching, the governments exercised this clause. They announced in a statement that they would seek $92 million from Exxon Mobil to clean up stubborn patches of oil, whose most toxic components, they say, have not dissipated since the spill in 1989.

Federal and state lawyers said in statements that they believed the lingering oil was still interfering with the recovery of animals in the area. The worries, environmentalists say, are focused on species that frequent the intertidal areas of Prince William Sound, like clams, mussels and harlequin ducks.

With this action, "we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement," said Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant attorney general for the Environment and Natural Resources Division of the Justice Department, in a statement. "Our goal throughout this process has been to pursue all scientifically and legally appropriate means of restoration."

While the oil can be found along several miles of beach, tying its effects to the slow recovery of some species may not be easy, one environmentalist said.

"No one doubts there is ongoing damage," said Eleanor Huffines, of the Alaska office of the Wilderness Society. "The challenge is that the ocean is so dynamic that it will be a hard thing to do to make the connection. But since this has been the most well-studied area since the spill, they have been able to document the lack of recovery."

Mark Boudreaux, the media relations manager for Exxon Mobil, focused on this uncertainty in a statement responding to the action. A link between the remaining oil and effects on wildlife, Mr. Boudreaux said, "is no more than a hypothesis." He added, "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

Of the $900 million paid by Exxon, $145 million remains in a trust fund administered by a council representing the federal and state agencies and local groups. "If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair," Mr. Boudreaux said, "it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem."

Along with the request for the $92 million, which may be decreased or increased to the maximum $100 million after negotiations, the state and federal agencies gave Exxon a blueprint for how the restoration should proceed.

The request for additional money had the support of Alaska's two senators, Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski, Republicans who had encouraged Exxon to provide the extra $100 million without the formal "reopener" process set by the 1991 settlement.

In March 1989, the Exxon Valdez supertanker, with an inebriated captain, ran aground on Bligh Reef, ruptured and spilled 11 million gallons of crude oil into the sound, contaminating about 900 miles of shoreline.

The damage to the fishing industry and to native subsistence hunting lasted for years. The herring population, a crucial link between the tiny plankton at the bottom of the food chain and the larger predators at the top, crashed four years after the spill. Of the $145 million remaining from Exxon's original payment, a significant part has been set aside to compensate herring fishermen.

Exxon Mobil continues to appeal a separate punitive damage award of $4.5 billion resulting from the spill.

The move to push for the extra money comes at a significant moment in the political life of Alaska, a state whose economy has been oil-dependent for three decades, but which is also encountering a steady decline in its share of oil revenues because of declining production of North Slope oil.

A new natural gas pipeline promises to be a source of income. But how ConocoPhillips, Exxon Mobil and BP, the energy industry's three major players here, will be taxed on overall levels of energy production is the subject of intense debate in a special session of the Legislature.

The open question is whether the industry, if it sees those tax discussions in the Legislature going too far against its interests, will abandon the pipeline, leaving the state without these potential new revenues.

So even though the legal deadline set the timetable for the state and federal governments' actions Thursday, it is an awkward moment to push for more money from Exxon Mobil. The company, in the statement of Mr. Boudreaux, made no allusion to its other major political and legal struggle in Alaska.

U.S., Alaska Want $92 Million More From Exxon (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0031509

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

The Justice Department and the state of Alaska have asked Exxon Mobil Corp. to pay an additional $92 million to help repair damage caused by lingering quantities of oil that continues to sully the waters in Alaska's Prince William Sound where the Exxon Valdez tanker crashed in 1989.

Exxon has already paid $900 million for damage caused by the spill, the worst in the nation's history, but the 1991 agreement settling claims allowed the state and federal governments to ask for as much as $100 million more for damage that could not be foreseen at that time. The deadline for reopening the agreement is today.

"After extensive review it is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill," said Alaska Attorney General David W. Márquez. In a background briefing yesterday, officials from the Agriculture, Interior and Commerce departments said the additional money was needed because substantial amounts of oil remained in the sound's tidal basin, affecting clams, mussels, sea otters, sea ducks -- especially harlequin ducks -- and other birds.

Exxon disputed the governments' move. "Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate," the company said in an e-mailed statement. "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

The company said the problem of lingering pockets of oil was anticipated in 1991. "Nothing surprising has occurred since 1991," the company said.

Exxon also noted that $145 million of the money it has already paid hasn't been spent yet.

Márquez said yesterday that the remaining money has been earmarked, and the Justice Department said that in 1991 officials did not anticipate that any oil would remain toxic so long.

"I'm disappointed," Márquez said upon hearing Exxon's reaction. "I'm hopeful that they'll take long and serious look at our proposal." The federal agencies and the state of Alaska can file a claim against Exxon Mobil on Sept. 1 if the company does not agree with the governments' assessment.

Environmentalists, who noted that the vast majority of species injured by the oil spill have yet to recover, welcomed yesterday's announcement.

"The decision to seek the reopener is very important for the economy and ecosystem of the region," said Katherine Fuselier, a Sierra Club conservation organizer based in Alaska. "Concerned citizens from across the spill zone and throughout Alaska have come together to hold Exxon accountable for one of the worst environmental disasters of our time."

Environmental groups, citing government reports, have said that there are still 100 to 200 tons of oil in Prince William Sound, covering six discontinuous miles of shoreline.

According to the Exxon Valdez Oil Spill Trustee Council, a joint federal-state group that has monitored the area, clam productivity on oil-covered beaches that have been cleaned up is still down by two-thirds. Several sea-bird populations in oil-covered areas have declined, including pigeon guillemots and marbled murrelets.

The environmental devastation has also hurt local fishing operations. The herring fishery remains closed because of too-low numbers.

An official from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration said in yesterday's background briefing that there had been a precipitous drop in the herring population, but that a link to the Exxon Valdez spill couldn't be proven beyond a doubt.

Exxon Asked To Pay More To Clean Spill (CNN)

CNN.com, June 2, 2006

Government wants $92 million more for Valdez cleanup

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- ExxonMobil on Thursday was asked to pay another $92 million to further clean up shorelines in Prince William Sound and the Gulf of Alaska, which still contain oil from the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill.

The company said it will study the request by the Justice Department and the state of Alaska while calling the department's basis for making it "speculation and hypothesis."

The action was taken under a provision in a $900 million damage settlement in 1991 allowing the government to reopen the agreement in 2006 to consider issues unforeseen at the time.

The Justice Department said the need for an additional project was shown by a series of 2001 studies that document the presence of residual oil from the spill along beaches in the area. The government said in a written statement it had not anticipated the oil would remain toxic and continue to affect the area.

"By sending our plan ... we are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time of the 1991 settlement," Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge said.

DOJ_NMG_0031510

The Valdez ran aground in 1989 and leaked 11 million gallons of crude oil, polluting more than 1,000 miles of Alaska's shore and killing tens of thousands of birds and marine animals.

In a written statement, ExxonMobil said: "The current request for funding appears to be focused primarily if not exclusively on the hypothesis that remaining weathered oil could be capable of causing biological impacts. That is no more than a hypothesis."

The company said it agrees that "small pockets of sequestered and degraded oil residues" remain in spots on less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the affected shoreline. But it said "there is no scientific evidence that this oil ... could cause damage to any population or species. Speculation and hypothesis do not amount to proof."

ExxonMobil also said the existence of small pockets of residue was expected at the time of the 1991 agreement and noted that about $145 million of the $900 million paid by Exxon to the oil spill trustees is still available.

"If there were any matter in Prince William Sound that needed restoration or repair, it was the trustees' duty to use this money to remedy the problem, and we are confident that they would have done so," the statement said.

Government officials said the leftover money has been earmarked for other restoration projects.

The company added, "Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate. Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

ExxonMobil recorded a profit of $36.1 billion in 2005, the largest-ever annual amount for a U.S. firm, and former Exxon boss Lee Raymond walked away with a retirement package worth roughly $400 million.

In a conference call, federal and state officials expressed disappointment at ExxonMobil's response, and said they hope to come to an agreement with the company over the next 90 days. If no agreement is reached in that time, a "formal claim" would be filed.

The officials said much of the $750 million that has been spent so far went toward acquiring land, and little was used on "restoration on the land and species."

"We have created an environment where Mother Nature can restore itself," one official said, adding that rather than being "weathered," some of the remaining oil is "as fresh as the day it was spilled."

That was not expected, based on experience with other oil spills, the official said.

"It wasn't until the late '90s we realized that oil was persisting, much more than we would have predicted, because the science just wasn't there," the official said.

Exxon Resists Claim For More Oil Spill Cash (FT)

By Sheila Mcnulty In Houston

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

ExxonMobil on Thursday refuted the US government's claim that it should pay $92m more to clean up Alaska 17 years after the Exxon Valdez tanker accident resulted in the US's largest oil spill.

The US Justice department and the Alaska Department of Law said studies showed residual oil from the 1989 spill in the inter-tidal zone of beaches, which they had not anticipated "would remain toxic and continue to impact natural resources".

Exxon already paid $900m in a civil settlement, yet that settlement had a "re-opener clause'' stating Exxon could be required to pay up to an additional $100m for unforeseen natural resource damages.

The company said it would study the request before responding, but added, "Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

Exxon argues that the request appears focused primarily, if not exclusively, on the hypothesis that remaining oil could be capable of causing biological harm.

"That is no more than a hypothesis," Exxon said.

While Exxon agrees small pockets of oil remain on less than two-tenths of 1 per cent of the shoreline, it says there is no scientific evidence the oil could damage any population or species.

Yet the federal and state governments said there was "substantial loss of habitat" from the oil.

They said predators that feed in the inter-tidal - primarily harlequin ducks and sea otters - showed reduced survival rates in oiled areas and seemed to avoid locations with extensive lingering oil.

In addition, they said, subsistence users avoid harvesting in oiled areas because of concerns over contamination.

"Removal of lingering subsurface oil, which remains bio-available and toxic 17 years after the spill, is a necessary step in the effort to restore this environment," said Mark Rey, undersecretary of the Department of Agriculture.

The federal and state governments assert that current science supports their position that the continuing bio-availability and toxicity of the lingering oil could not reasonably have been anticipated.

Exxon said remaining pockets of oil were anticipated in 1991, when the federal and state governments pointed to evidence from prior spills and acknowledged oil would remain for 20 years or more.

The issue could add fuel to recent debates in Congress about whether the big oil companies are profiting on the backs of consumers in this record oil-price environment, with Exxon's unwillingness to hand over the money possibly seen as further proof of greediness.

Government Wants $92 Million More From Exxon Mobil Over Oil Spill (AP)

By JEANNETTE J. LEE, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, June 2, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Federal and state authorities asked the Exxon Mobil Corp. on Thursday for an additional $92 million to clean up residual oil from 1989's devastating Exxon Valdez spill.

They said studies in the last five years have shown oil from the tanker's grounding still lingers in the tidal zones of Prince William Sound. The oil is reducing survival rates of some marine species and is disrupting fishing in the region, according to a joint statement released Thursday by the U.S. Justice Department and the state's Department of Law.

"It is clear that populations and habitat within the oil spill area have suffered substantial and unanticipated injuries that are attributable to the Exxon Valdez oil spill," Alaska Attorney General David Marquez said Thursday.

The nation's largest oil spill emptied 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in 1989, killing hundreds of thousands of birds and marine animals and fouling more than 1,200 miles of rocky beach.

Irving, Texas-based Exxon has paid $900 million in restitution for the spill required in a 1991 civil settlement.

A "reopener" provision in the settlement created a window from 2002 to 2006 in which the state and federal governments could claim up to an additional $100 million.

To claim the money, state and federal officials must prove that a population, habitat or species had suffered loss or decline in the area of the spill, and link that loss to the spill. They also must prove the loss was not known or anticipated when the settlement was signed.

Hundreds of studies by Exxon have shown the environmental impact to be less serious than claimed by other researchers. Company spokesman Mark Boudreaux said Thursday the request is based on "hypothesis."

"Nothing we have seen so far indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified," Boudreaux said in a statement.

More than $100 million of the $900 million Exxon has paid has not yet been spent. Officials said they expect that to become an issue in negotiations.

"It was (their) duty to use this money to remedy the problem," Boudreaux said.

Most of that remaining money has already been set aside to help the flagging herring fishery, which has dwindled since 1993, said Craig Tillery, an Alaska deputy attorney general.

The state has until Sept. 1 to make financial demands of Exxon Mobil under the reopener provision. State and federal officials were required to provide the company with detailed plans and costs for any rehabilitation project at least 90 days before that date.

Alaska Sens. Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski sought to cut the process short by asking Exxon Mobil to voluntarily commit $100 million more to restoring the sound. The company, whose $36.1 billion in earnings last year were the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, rejected that proposal.

The claim is separate from an unresolved punitive damage judgment of $4.5 billion against the company, which it is appealing.

Exxon Asked To Pay $92 Mln More In Valdez Oil Spill (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, June 2, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government and Alaska will seek an additional $92 million from Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's largest oil company, for the 1989 spill caused by the crash of the Exxon Valdez tanker. The company has already paid $900 million in the case.

The decision to pursue extra damages for environmental clean-up was announced by the Justice Department today in Washington. Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil said there are no grounds for reopening the settlement.

``Exxon will study this request carefully and respond as appropriate," the company said in an e-mailed statement. ``Nothing we have seen so far, however, indicates that this request for further funding from Exxon is justified."

DOJ_NMG_0031512

The accident poured 11 million gallons of crude oil into Prince William Sound in Alaska, the worst oil spill in U.S. history. A 1991 settlement included a so-called re-opener provision permitting the state and federal governments to seek up to $100 million in additional damages for problems unforeseen at the time.

In making today's request, the federal and state governments contend that the presence of lingering oil in the sound's shoreline has caused a ``substantial loss'' of habitat, particularly for harlequin ducks and sea otters.

Sue Ellen Wooldridge, chief of the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division, said in a statement that the state and federal governments ``are aggressively seeking to restore natural resource damages unforeseen at the time'' of the settlement.

90 Days

Exxon has 90 days to consider the request for the extra payments. The company said it probably will reject the claim, forcing the governments to pursue the matter in federal court.

``Prince William Sound is healthy, robust and it's thriving,'' Mark Boudreaux, an Exxon Mobil spokesman, said in an interview.

The company's stock fell 33 cents to $60.58 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 3:08 p.m.

Exxon Mobil reaped $36.1 billion in 2005, the biggest annual profit for any company in U.S. history. The company, which traces its roots to the 1880s and John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil Trust, amassed cash holdings of $36.5 billion as of March 31.

The company is appealing to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals a $4.5 billion punitive damage award to fisheries, native Alaskans, cannery workers and landowners over the Valdez spill.

Gold Prospector Sees Chance For Big Strike In Toxic-Waste Dump (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

BUCKSKIN, Nev. -- Dave Pruett has prospected for gold for 46 years in mines from Arizona to the Amazon. He thinks he has finally found his big fortune in a pile of toxic waste in this desert ghost town.

Mr. Pruett's hope lies in nearly 200,000 tons of rubble sitting in man-made containment ponds outside a defunct mine. The rubble is laced with cyanide that Nevada regulators say threatens water supplies. But Mr. Pruett believes the pile, which is the waste, or tailings, left over from a previous mine, contains as much as 30,000 ounces of gold. Woven in with crushed rock and other material in a sort of rubble stew, that gold was considered not worth extracting.

But with gold prices having soared, the precious metal in the pile is suddenly worth around $20 million, Mr. Pruett figures. He has begun hauling truckloads of the waste to a larger mine that has facilities to extract the gold. "Maybe, just maybe, this will be the big one," Mr. Pruett says.

The run-up in gold prices over the past few years -- the futures price stood at $627.60 a troy ounce yesterday -- has ignited a mining frenzy in Nevada, the biggest gold-producing state. It has led some mining companies to reopen mines with low-grade reserves that previously weren't profitable to extract. A 26-year high for the U.S. gold price was reached last month, well over $700.

In Nevada, most of the remaining gold lies deep underground, and the state's $3.7 billion-a-year gold-mining industry is dominated by big corporations with the technology and machinery to dig it out. But here and there are a few small-stake prospectors -- independent fortune seekers like Mr. Pruett who are a throwback to the gold rushes of yore. "He's a dying breed," says Royce Hackworth, owner of a drilling company in Elko, Nev.

The 68-year-old Mr. Pruett is racing against the chance gold prices may crash again. He rarely takes a day off as he shuttles between his pile, about 80 miles southeast of Reno, and a larger mine 350 miles away that extracts the gold. On a recent day, Wayne Monyihan and Wayne Monyihan Jr. -- a father-and-son team who call themselves the Sagebrush Express -- were each set to haul 20 tons of his ground-up waste rock on their 18-wheel tractor-trailers.

Digging in his toxic pit, Mr. Pruett uses a Caterpillar 966 bulldozer to push the black, clay-like waste into a heap. Mr. Pruett uses a Mitsubishi Excavator to scoop giant buckets of the material onto a dump truck, which then loads the waste onto the big-rig trucks. He then either hauls loads himself or pays the Monyihans to drive it to the bigger mine operator, where the waste rock goes into a mill. The gold is extracted after the rubble that contains it is burned for fuel to help run the mine.

The bigger mine pays Mr. Pruett a percentage of the value of the gold that is extracted from the waste. Minus costs and payments to a financial backer, Mountain West Resources Inc., of Vancouver, British Columbia, Mr. Pruett hopes to net about $5 million from his pile of waste. So far, he and Mountain West -- they split the proceeds equally -- have netted a check for $7,939.33 and are expecting another for about $35,000.

DOJ_NMG_0031513

A descendant of Mormon settlers, Mr. Pruett grew up on a Nevada sheep and cattle ranch. "Mining is a big adventure compared to herding sheep," he says. "It's like being on a treasure hunt."

As a young man, he bought a small gold mine for $10,000 and sold it for $40,000, he says. He later bought stakes in mines across Nevada, Arizona and California, most containing gold but others containing lead, zinc, silver and copper.

By the mid-1990s, according to a Chapter 11 bankruptcy filing in 1995, he had about $15 million in assets, including ranchland and equipment like rock crushers and Peterbilt trucks. Hoping to make more, he wandered the world, including the Amazon jungles of Brazil and Peru, looking for gold and other metals. He says he came away empty-handed.

He took his biggest gamble in 1994, he says, when he bought the toxic-waste pile he now hopes to make a fortune on. The waste pile, from a mine in California, was trucked to this spot -- next to the remains of a mine and boom town that opened in 1906 -- by a Canadian company in the 1980s. Nevada regulators say the company found California laws inhospitable to its plans to extract the gold. The cyanide in the waste came from a gold-leaching process considered more controversial in populous California than in remote Nevada. Cyanide leaches gold out of rock after the substance is poured over a pile of rubble.

With gold prices stagnant in the 1990s, the company turned the mine over to Mr. Pruett, who agreed, as his part of the deal, to assume its cleanup liabilities. In 1995, Mr. Pruett says, he began shipping the ore to a mine near Elko. But gold prices soon crashed, making it uneconomical to move the waste. Nevada regulators threatened to fine Mr. Pruett unless he kept cleaning up the mine and paying for water monitoring. To pay bills, he sold most of his land, including his grandfather's 1906 ranch home. On Dec. 31, 1995, he filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. "I was stuck," says Mr. Pruett, who is unmarried and lives with a longtime girlfriend.

A glimmer of hope came when gold prices began ticking up four years ago. He found a mine near Elko that could process his rubble, and he began hauling it himself in late 2004, racing up and down Interstate 80 in a Peterbilt truck. "I spent 60 days on the truck straight," he recalls. But Nevada regulators soon stopped him, saying he was unloading the waste improperly on the ground without any padding underneath to prevent contamination of ground water. The mine went on to use more of its own fuel source, mainly natural gas, as Mr. Pruett was left to scramble to find a new contract.

He made ends meet selling salvaged equipment he collects, such as truck trailers, office shelving and rusted steel stairwells. When his Peterbilt got stuck in a snowdrift for two months just before Christmas in 2004, he was left without much income. "He's always got good intentions," says Doug Driesner, mining services director of the Nevada Commission on Mineral Resources, "but he hasn't always had good luck."

Mr. Pruett's luck may have turned this time. The surge in gold prices made his toxic pile here more valuable than ever. Last month, he started trucking it out again, to a mine owned by Canada's Queenstake Resources Ltd.

Between hauling trips Mr. Pruett drives a battered 1996 Ford F-150 pickup he bought for $300 at a mine auction. He bought two more pickups like it for $300 apiece and leaves them scattered around Nevada -- keys in the ignition -- in case he needs one to haul a piece of junk equipment he stumbles across.

As two big-rig loads of rubble were about to head out on a recent run, Mr. Pruett went on ahead in his pickup to spend the night at the Val U Motel in Winnemucca, Nev. The next morning, he headed up to Queenstake's Jarrett Canyon mine in the sage-covered foothills north of Elko to renew his hauling contract with local mine managers.

Even if he finally gets his gold fortune, it probably won't entice him into retirement. "It's kind of like a disease, this prospecting thing," Mr. Pruett says. "I don't know if I can quit."

Greenpeace Just Kidding About Armageddon (WP)

By Philly.com

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

The environmental activist group Greenpeace wanted to be prepared to counter President Bush's visit last week to Pennsylvania to promote his nuclear energy policy.

"This volatile and dangerous source of energy" is no answer to the country's energy needs, shouted a Greenpeace fact sheet, decrying the "threat" posed by the reactors Bush visited in Limerick.

But after that assertion, the Greenpeace authors were apparently stumped while searching for the ideal menacing metaphor.

"In the twenty years since the Chernobyl tragedy, the world's worst nuclear accident, there have been nearly [FILL IN ALARMIST AND ARMAGEDDONIST FACTOID HERE]," the sheet said.

The Greenpeace spokesman who issued the memo, Steve Smith, told the Web site that a colleague was making a joke in a draft that was then mistakenly released.

The final version did not mention Armageddon; instead it warned of plane crashes and reactor meltdowns.

Bush Admin. Wants To Cut Meth Use 15 Pct. (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration wants to cut methamphetamine use in the United States by 15 percent by 2009, relying on cooperation with Mexico and steps at home that include expanded random drug testing in schools.

Administration officials said Thursday they have reduced the number of U.S. labs that make meth but have not been able to stem the flow of the cheap and highly addictive drug from Mexico, estimated to be the source of 80 percent of the U.S. supply.

Most of the details of the administration's synthetic drug control strategy have been previously announced, including new specialized enforcement teams on both sides of the border.

Fewer than 600,000 Americans use meth, just two-tenths of 1 percent of the nation's population, according to administration estimates. But more than the half the nation's counties count meth as their top problem, said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

He said the administration supports increased drug testing in schools as a sort of early warning program.

"It is a way to cut down student failure, truancy, gang membership," Walters said. The decision to test students will remain with individual districts, he said.

Many states and the federal Combat Meth Act, signed into law in March, have made meth ingredients like pseudoephedrine harder to obtain. Federal drug agents and local police shut down 11,189 meth labs in the first 10 months of 2005, 26 percent fewer closures than over the same period a year earlier.

New Policy Aims To Reduce Meth, Prescription Drug Abuse (SH)

By George L. Richards III

Scripps Howard, June 1, 2006

(AXcess News) Washington - The U.S. government announced a new synthetic drug control strategy Thursday that calls for a 15 percent reduction in methamphetamine and prescription drug abuse in three years.

"Although teen drug use in the United States has dropped by nearly 20 percent over the last three years," said John Walters, director of national drug control policy, "we will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market. The aggressive measures called for in the synthetics strategy build upon significant progress already made as a result of law enforcement efforts."

Methamphetamine is also known by many more street names such as ice, speed and crystal meth. It is highly addictive and can be injected, snorted, smoked or swallowed. It can be produced in small, hard-to-detect labs and is made with materials that have been easy to find.

Walter said drug use "is a behavior that starts with our youth in the United States. If you don't try by age 20, you're unlikely to go on and try."

Walters said the strategy has three goals over the next three years:

* To reduce methamphetamine use by15 percent.
* To reduce the number of meth labs by 25 percent.
* To reduce prescription drug abuse by 15 percent.

The policy also lays out ways to prevent the distribution and use of methamphetamine.

This starts with extensive communication and what Walters called a "unique expression of cooperation" with Mexico and other international partners, including India, Germany and China.

That will include tightening control over shipments of so-called precursor chemicals, or raw materials needed to make meth.

"If you can cut off the precursor, you can see the number of small, toxic labs go down dramatically," Walters said.

Methamphetamine is cheap and easy to produce. Legislation approved last year required that products – mainly cold medications – that contained pseudoephedrine, one of meth's main ingredients, be kept behind store counters. It also limited how much can be sold to an individual.

DOJ_NMG_0031515

The use of methamphetamine was originally a problem in only select parts of the country. However it has now spread worldwide. Mike Braun, chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, referred use of methamphetamine as a "global epidemic."

"The synthetic strategy is a comprehensive plan that focuses on reducing the supply of methamphetamine and controlled substance prescription drugs through aggressive enforcement efforts," said Rachel Brand, assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Policy.

Walters said controlling illegal immigration will help control illegal drug imports.

"This is not an either or," he said.

Feds Set Goal To Cut U.S. Meth Use By 15 Percent (DMR)

Des Moines Register, June 2, 2006

Washington, D.C. – The Bush administration called today for cutting methamphetamine use by 15 percent over the next three years and continuing a sharp decline in the domestic labs that have plagued rural states like Iowa.

A national methamphetamine strategy released by the administration included recommendations to increase random testing of school students and use of special courts to handle drug addicts.

The administration said that much of the production of U.S.-consumed meth has shifted to larger labs in Mexico and other countries. U.S. and Mexican officials said they are working to cut the flow of precursor chemicals to Mexico and to shut down labs in that country.

"We will not let up on the pressure being applied to the methamphetamine market," said John Walters, the White House director of national drug control policy.

The administration's plan is a "balanced effort on supply and demand," he said.

The administration strategy document said there had been a sharp decline in meth use in the country and attributed much of the decline to measures taken by states, including restrictions on the sale of pseudoephedrine, a key chemical used in making meth.

The document cited Iowa's annual drug control strategy as an example of the way states had laid out plans to combat meth use in collaboration with law enforcement, prevention specialists and others.

The administration's plan did not set any goals for reducing international production, in part because officials doesn't know how much is currently going on, according to Walters.

There are a "variety of sources of meth" in Mexico, he said, referring to the country's meth-manufacturing rings. "Some of this is dynamic, it's moving."

He said the first priority was to cut off shipments to Mexico of precursor chemicals such as pseudoephedrine.

The 15-percent decline in meth use targeted by administration's plan would amount to 5 percent a year for 2006, 2007 and 2008. Recent trends indicate that the goal is achievable, the plan said.

Feds Take Global Approach To Meth Abuse (ABC)

By JOHN YANG And JASON RYAN

ABC News, June 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration unveiled today a new global approach to curbing the production and abuse of methamphetamine, a highly addictive party drug produced in clandestine labs.

"It is a specific focus on methamphetamine and prescription drugs that have become, as you all know, a growing part of the drug problem in this country over the last decade," John Walters, the White House director of national control policy, told a news conference. "This represents a commitment of the administration to work toward a meaningful and a sustained reduction in meth use as well as the number of meth labs that have been poisoning too many communities."

In the past year, federal, state and local law enforcement authorities have seized about 11,000 small labs that produced an estimated 20 percent of methamphetamine sold in the United States.

The goal is to cut methamphetamine abuse 15 percent by 2008 and reduce the production from illegal meth labs in the United States by 25 percent.

To do that, the departments of Justice, State and Homeland Security will work to improve intelligence on the global market of the chemicals used to make methamphetamine, which are produced in China, India and Germany. The United States will also work with Mexico to step up law enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexican border, the site of much of the trafficking in both methamphetamine and its component chemicals.

DOJ_NMG_0031516

"Mexico and the United States' joint battle against drugs has reached an unprecedented level," Eduardo Ibarrola, the deputy chief of mission at the Mexican Embassy in Washington, told reporters. "Under no circumstance can our common border be an excuse for impunity."

In addition, the strategy calls for strict enforcement of laws — part of the Patriot Act extension that President Bush signed in March — that restrict the sales of many common cold and allergy remedies that can be used to make methamphetamine.

Many states had already acted to restrict sales of those over-the-counter drugs.

Bush Adds To Drug Kingpin List (AP)

AP, June 1, 2006

President Bush added three accused drug traffickers and two reputed crime organizations to the U.S. list of foreign drug kingpins on Thursday, denying them access to the American financial system and barring them from trade with U.S. companies and individuals.

The additions bring to 62 the number of individuals and entities designated under the 1999 Kingpin Act to target significant foreign narcotic dealers, their organizations and operatives worldwide.

The three individuals added to the list were Dawood Ibrahim of India, Fahd Jamil Georges of Brazil and Ali Naway of Iran. The organizations are the Dawood Ibrahim Organization in India, Pakistan and United Arab Emirates and the Amezcua Contreras Organization in Mexico.

Man Receives 15 Years (HARTC)

By Annie Tasker, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, June 2, 2006

A 32-year-old Hartford man was sentenced Tuesday to more than 15 years in federal prison for conspiracy to possess crack cocaine with intent to distribute.

Kaniel "Beevis" Forrester pleaded guilty on Aug. 23, 2005, to charges that he conspired to possess and distribute between 150 and 500 grams of crack, according to a statement released by the U.S. Justice Department.

Forrester, who his lawyer said has been on the streets since he was about 15, was on probation for a previous narcotics charge at the time of his arrest, federal law enforcement officials said.

"Unfortunately, he turned to the wrong way to make money," said his attorney, Walter Hussey.

Forrester was sentenced to 182 months in prison, and Hussey said he expects Forrester to serve about 10 years of the sentence. He also will have to complete a 500-hour drug program, Hussey said.

Forrester, a father of two, could be deported back to Jamaica after he finishes his sentence and five years of supervised release.

"It's going to be rough for him," said Hussey, adding that upon his release his client will have been away from Jamaica for more than 20 years. Forrester has hired an attorney to determine his status upon release.

Operation Big Boy, an investigation run by the FBI and the Hartford police, led to Forrester and his brother, Negus Forrester, after months of surveillance, wiretapping, crack seizures and purchases.

It led to the arrests of about 60 cocaine dealers and buyers in the Hartford area. Investigators found that Kaniel Forrester bought crack in the form of "half cookies," or 63-gram units, from his brother on several occasions, documents say.

In two phone conversations recorded Sept. 26, 2004, shortly after a crack delivery, Negus Forrester told his brother he "has it." Minutes later, Negus Forrester called again and told Kaniel that he would need to bring a knife or razor, purportedly to help cut and bag the new supply of crack, court records say.

U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said in a sentencing memorandum that the calls were considered evidence by the FBI that Negus Forrester bought crack from an accomplice, and that Kaniel Forrester was involved in the transaction.

Negus Forrester is awaiting sentencing after pleading guilty on Aug. 8, 2005, to involvement in narcotics conspiracy, federal officials said.

DEA Searches Dispensary's Deposit Box (DS)

Desert Sun, June 1, 2006

Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary earlier this week, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner.

"I don't have anything to hide," said Stacy Hochanadel, owner and operator of CannaHelp in Palm Desert, on Thursday.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0031517

Hochanadel said the box, located at a Coachella Valley Canyon National Bank branch, contained nothing, which investigators soon discovered.

According to the warrant, the search took place at 2:40 p.m. on Monday, as part of an investigation into suspected violations of federal drug trafficking laws.

"This is harassment. ... I guess they thought I had money stashed away," Hochanadel said.

Brothers Receive Jail Time As Part Of Area Drug Ring (ABH)

Ahtens Banner Herald, June 2, 2006

Two Athens brothers will serve long sentences in federal prison after they pleaded guilty to being part of a local cocaine distribution ring.

A U.S. District Court judge in Macon on Tuesday sentenced Antron Ricardo Bishop, 24, and Antonio Ramon Bishop, 22, after they pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to possess with intent to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine, acting Middle District U.S. Attorney G.F. Peterman III announced Thursday.

"Beginning in 2000 and continuing until November 2005, both Bishop brothers and other co-conspirators were part of a group of individuals distributing crack cocaine throughout the Athens-Clarke County area," Peterman said in a prepared statement.

Antron Bishop was sentenced to 14 years in prison, and his younger brother was sentenced to just under six years behind bars.

Antonio Bishop, who dodged a murder conviction when a Clarke County jury acquitted him in the 2002 shooting death of 21-year-old Athens resident La Cedric "Ced" Shields, still faces allegations he tried to murder another Athens man two years later in a drive-by shooting on North Avenue.

In April 2005, a Clarke County jury deadlocked on aggravated assault charges for the July 2004 shooting and a mistrial was declared. A new trial date has not been set.

Since the Bishops and several other conspirators have been arrested, violent crime in the county has decreased, according to Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger.

"I would say it's had an impact on crime, which is down overall," said Hunsinger, who supervises the Athens-Clarke Police Department's Drug and Vice Unit. "A lot of the programs the police department has in effect have decreased crime, and one of those programs has been targeting crack cocaine activity."

A countywide sweep of street-level crack cocaine dealers last July netted more than 80 arrests, and local police have been working with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration to collar mid-level suppliers.

The DEA has provided some support, such as occasionally supplying "buy money" that Athens undercover police use to purchase illegal drugs during their investigations, police said.

By and large, however, the numerous cocaine-related arrests made in recent years were the result of local law enforcement efforts.

"We're pretty fortunate that we've got skilled investigators who can make cases that can be prosecuted on the federal level," Hunsinger said.

Drug Runner Sentenced To 90 Months (BSB)

Brighton Standard-Blade, June 1, 2006

A confessed drug runner who agreed to testify against his alleged fellow drug conspirators was sentenced May 18 to 7 1/2 years in federal prison, said U.S. Attorney Office spokesman Jeffrey Dorschner.

The sentence was slightly higher for 26-year-old Kenneth F. Fuqua of Brighton than prosecutors sought in exchange for Fuqua's continued cooperation with investigators. Prosecutors were asking for a lighter sentence in hopes of winning convictions against six others arrested in connection with a metrowide drug ring. As part of Fuqua's plea agreement, he agreed to testify against the others who are accused of moving large quantities of methamphetamine, cocaine and other drugs.

Once Fuqua finishes his 90-month sentence, he will serve five years supervised release and pay $100 to a victim's fund.

Fuqua told investigators with the Drug Enforcement Administration and Boulder County Drug Task Force that he ran drugs between Santiago Mena-Flores, 26, of Henderson, and runners of the drug trafficking ring allegedly run by Donald Jason Skinner, 31, of Longmont. He said he did so between January and June 2005. Children allegedly were used to move the drugs locally.

Mena-Flores was arrested at his Henderson home in December, and Skinner and four other men from Longmont were arrested at the end of the year or beginning of this year. Dorschner said those cases are in the motions phase and it could be several months before a trial date is set.

Man Killed In Blast Targeted Authorities (LONGNJ)

By Barbara Ramirez

Longview (TX) News-Journal, May 31, 2006

Longview fire official says victim faced federal firearm, drug charges

A Longview man died Monday night while making a bomb he intended to use in retaliation against federal agents, local fire officials said.

James Charles Torrence, 38, who faced possible jail time for multiple federal indictments from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the Drug Enforcement Administration, died in his North Longview home while putting together one of two homemade bombs.

Torrence made the bombs to retaliate against authorities with both federal law enforcement agencies, whom Torrence believed had built a case against him, according to Brian Howell, Longview Fire Department assistant fire marshal. Documents inside the home listed names of several bureau and administration agents, Howell said.

The Longview Fire Department responded to Torrence's home in the 200 block of Rowe Avenue shortly before 8:30 p.m. The home is about one mile south of Judson Middle School.

Fire officials determined a bomb had exploded inside the home, and agents with the ATF were called, Howell said.

He added that, inside the home, they found a substance that could be methamphetamine. They also found illegal weapons, including a machine gun and a pistol with a silencer. A second pipe bomb also was found.

Howell said Torrence had turned one of the home's three bedrooms into an office and used the office to build the bombs.

While putting the second pipe bomb together, the bomb exploded, instantly killing Torrence, Howell said.

Fire officials took the second bomb to a field behind the home to detonate it. Neighbors within a 300 foot radius of Torrence's home were ordered to evacuate, Howell said.

Some of Torrence's neighbors said Monday that loud noises often came from his home, and they believed the noises might have also been explosions.

Howell urged Longview residents to report all suspicious noises and activities to police and other authorities.

"We don't really have pockets (of people making homemade bombs)," Howell said. "But, we never really know who's going to be doing it. This could've been a lot worse."

U.S. Attorney Matt Orwig told The Associated Press that Torrence had agreed to plead guilty to being a felon in possession of a firearm and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine. He said Torrence was set to enter the plea June 7, and the drug charge carried a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison up to life.

"He would've gotten out of prison as an old man, if he got out at all," Orwig said.

Torrence's girlfriend, whose name has not been released, told authorities she wasn't aware of her boyfriend's activities. She was inside the home at the time of the explosions but was not injured. A more extensive interview with her is planned, Howell said.

The ATF and the Longview Fire Department spent nearly eight hours ridding the house of dangerous materials, Howell said.

MAN DIES BUILDING BOMB (TYLERT)

By Megan Middleton, Staff Writer

Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph, May 31, 2006

LONGVIEW - Authorities believe a man who died in an explosion Monday night in a north Longview home was in the process of making a pipe bomb he may have planned to use against people he thought "snitched" on him in a federal court case.

Longview Assistant Fire Marshal Brian Howell said by phone that the man who died was James Charles Torrence, 38, of Longview.

The explosion occurred in Torrence's home at 220 Rowe Avenue in Longview, Howell said. Authorities got the call about the explosion around 8:20 p.m. Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0031519

"When you're putting a pipe bomb together like that, a lot of things that you do could cause it to go off," Howell said. "We really won't know if it was friction on the gun powder, static electricity or premature ignition of an ignition source. It's one of those things that during assembly, for whatever reason, it went off."

Although Torrence's girlfriend was also in the home at the time, no one else was injured in the explosion, Howell said. She was the one who called 911.

The room in which the explosion occurred suffered some damage, Howell said. There was no damage to any other homes.

Torrence suffered injuries to his head, chest, abdomen and multiple extremities, Howell said. It will not be clear what specifically caused his death until the autopsy is complete.

Howell said it is believed Torrence was making pipe bombs to retaliate against individuals he believed "snitched" on him in connection with a federal case against him. Howell said the individuals Torrence allegedly planned to use the bombs against actually were not related to the case. He told the Tyler Morning Telegraph he does not believe Torrence was targeting law enforcement agents.

Tom Crowley, a public information officer for the Dallas division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), said via phone that authorities discovered bomb-making literature, firearms and additional bomb-making material inside Torrence's residence.

Suspected methamphetamine and a second pipe bomb were also found, Howell said.

The Bossier City Bomb Squad was called in after the second device was discovered, Howell said. Eventually, that device was moved outside, placed in a hole and set off remotely. Before it was detonated, though, about 15 to 20 residents in the neighborhood were evacuated from their homes around 3:30 a.m.

"When you're dealing with a homemade explosive, you really don't know," he said. "First of all, we didn't know what was in there and secondly, you don't know how well it's built and the actual explosion that you'll get resulting from it."

He said Torrence's home was searched and anything dangerous or illegal was removed.

Torrence was likely acting alone in making these bombs, Howell said, noting Torrence seems to have been a "paranoid" man. He had installed cameras in the front of his house as well as a sensor, which would alert him if someone was in the driveway. He also had guns placed throughout the house.

"He was very paranoid," Howell said. "He had even been doing target practice down his hallway in the house with a (pistol). He could have caused a lot of damage and hurt a lot of people. We were very fortunate."

Howell said neighbors said that they had heard explosions coming from the home before. He urged people to report suspicious activity ahead of time.

"Somebody should have called 911 when they first heard the other explosions, and maybe this all could have been avoided," he said. "Obviously it's illegal to do this ... The first responders going in there to check on him and render aid could have been killed by the second device, had it gone off while they were there."

He said that device was on a shelf right beside Torrence. It was in a plastic case with arming and initiating devices.

"It was intact, ready to go," Howell said. "Depending on what the triggering mechanism was and how it worked, it could have been set off by the possibility of radio signals, somebody bumping the shelf next to it, knocking it over, reaching over moving it or pulling it."

Crowley said officials with the ATF have taken evidence from the residence that will eventually be sent to a lab in San Francisco. He said officials are looking to see what type of devices Torrence was putting together.

Howell said the investigation is wrapping up, aside from receiving test results.

"We're glad nobody else is going to be hurt because of this," he said. "Fortunately, the only one who did get hurt was the one making the bomb."

FEDERAL INDICTMENT

Torrence was facing an indictment on several federal drug- and gun-related charges, Matt Orwig, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Texas, confirmed.

Torrence had entered into a plea agreement on charges of felon in possession of a firearm, which carries with it a penalty not to exceed 10 years in prison, and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine, which carries with it a penalty of not less than 10 years and up to life in prison, Orwig said.

A plea hearing was scheduled for June 7 for him to formally enter his guilty plea in court.

Orwig said by phone Torrence was "facing a lot of time" in prison.

In reference to the explosion and Torrence's death, Orwig said, "Every life is precious, and we're all sad that it happened. At the same time, I think it's very fortunate that no one else was injured and that a plan to use that bomb never materialized."

Pottersville Church Fire Called Suspicious (GLENSFPS)

By Don Lehman

Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star, June 2, 2006

Federal officials called in as part of investigation

POTTERSVILLE -- Christ Church Episcopal on Route 9 was destroyed by a suspicious fire late Tuesday, a blaze that came two weeks after two burglaries at the church in which religious phrases were scrawled inside the building, officials said.

"We believe, at this point, the fire was deliberately set," Warren County Sheriff Larry Cleveland said.

Investigators from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the state Office of Fire Prevention and Control, the Warren County Office of Fire Prevention and the Warren County Sheriff's Department were on the scene, sifting through the charred remnants throughout much of the day Wednesday.

The church's walls remained standing in places, but part of the roof had collapsed.

Pottersville Fire Chief Guy Swartwout said a cause had not been determined, but the area of origin appeared to be in the southeast corner of the building, which church officials on their Web site called the "sacristy."

A sacristy is a room in a church where sacred items are kept.

Cleveland said the fire started inside the building.

ATF was brought in because federal law requires the agency be notified when a church fire occurs where the cause is not clearly identifiable, said Warren County Fire Coordinator Marvin Lemery. That statute was put in place after a spate of arson fires at southern churches in the late 1990s.

"Anything where there is something that looks like it could be the least bit suspicious (at a church), you need to notify ATF," he said. "That (burglary history) was enough to say we should get these guys in to look whether this was done to cover a burglary or there was something else going on."

During the May 11 and 13 burglaries, the person or persons who went in the church scrawled religious phrases and stole religious items, officials said.

Church leaders had put digital surveillance cameras in the building to try to catch whoever was responsible for the break-ins. Investigators located the cameras in the rubble Wednesday and were working to recover images from them, officials said.

A witness reported seeing a person in front of the church about 10:30 p.m., authorities said.

The fire was called in by a passer-by around 11 p.m. Tuesday, Swartwout said. When firefighters arrived, the blaze had engulfed much of the building, he said.

"There was a lot of fire, and it had gotten way ahead of us," Swartwout said. "Church buildings are notorious (for fast spread of fire) because of their big, open spaces."

The building dates back to the 1920s. An addition was added to the back of the building last year, Swartwout said.

Much of Pottersville is dominated by Word of Life Bible Institute, a religious school and retreat that is not affiliated with Christ Church Episcopal.

Christ Church Episcopal's pastor, the Rev. Robert Limpert, did not return a phone call for comment and would not discuss the fire with Post-Star news partner WNYT-TV NewsChannel 13 at the fire scene Wednesday.

He was interviewed by sheriff's investigators at the fire scene for nearly 90 minutes Wednesday.

It could not be determined Wednesday where the church planned to hold its Sunday services.

Pottersville firefighters were assisted by their counterparts from Horicon, Chestertown and Riverside.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Compromise On Immigration Bill (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, June 1, 2006

President Bush pressed a passionately divided Congress on Thursday to reach election-year compromise on immigration legislation that provides a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants already in the country.

With his speech before business leaders and members of a government-sponsored civilian volunteer group, Bush hoped to build momentum for Senate and House negotiators to resolve difficult disputes. The two houses have passed sharply different versions of the legislation. To achieve one of his top domestic priorities of the year, Bush will have to bring around conservatives in his own party.

DOJ_NMG_0031521

"It's a difficult task," Bush pointedly told Congress in remarks at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

The House bill generally is limited to border enforcement, making all illegal immigrants subject to felony charges and cracking down on employers who hire illegals. The Senate version includes more money for border security, creates a guest worker program to bring in new foreign workers, and provides a shot at citizenship for many of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

"The American people expect us to meet our responsibility and deliver immigration reform that fixes the problems in the current system," Bush said. "All of the elements of this problem must be addressed together, or none of them will be solved at all."

Bush also will travel to several cities next week — Artesia, N.M., Laredo, Texas, and Omaha, Neb. — to pitch his immigration approach, the White House announced Thursday.

There is skepticism that a compromise can be reached in a year when most of Congress is up for re-election, and many believe Republicans could be at risk of losing their control over one or both chambers.

The president sought in his speech to provide a roadmap to lawmakers on the negotiating teams. He spoke more specifically about legislative provisions that he supports than he has previously.

He said any measure must include a temporary worker program and the opportunity for eventual citizenship. The Chamber has supported Bush's approach, which would provide cheap labor for many jobs.

Though Bush acknowledged that illegal immigration has put pressure on U.S. schools and hospitals, spawned more crime and caused other problems, he also stress immigrants' importance to American society and the practical benefits of establishing a guest worker program.

"They are part of American life and they're vital to our economy," he said. "And yet they're beyond the reach and protection of American law."

He took on — albeit gently — those in the Republican Party who advocate a get-tough-only approach and staunchly oppose either a guest worker program or a path to citizenship.

"Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this country illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country, and that any plan to allow them to stay equals amnesty, no matter how many conditions we impose," Bush said. "Listen, I appreciate the members that are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that. Yet I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic."

The president ticked through other provisions he considers crucial for a bill to be effective.

He asked Congress to provided additional funding and the legal authority to end "once and for all" the country's much criticized "catch and release" policy, in which illegal immigrants from countries other than Mexico are ticketed and freed. He said the practice has been ended for key Central American countries, but additional detention space and legal changes are needed to expand that.

Bush also embraced several changes that would make it easier for employers to verify that their workers are legal, including:

_Allow immigration officials to be notified when an employer is notified by the Social Security Administration that the name of one of their workers does not match the worker's Social Security number.

_Require that all employers use a now-optional government program called Basic Pilot to verify employees' Social Security numbers and check them against other federal databases. Both the House and Senate bills include such a requirement

And he endorsed stiffer penalties for companies that fail to check an employee's identification and knowingly hire an illegal immigrant. "We're not going to tolerate it in this country," the president said.

'Unscrupulous' Firms Are Faulted (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

President Bush told the nation's most prominent business group yesterday that "unscrupulous" employers have contributed to the illegal immigration crisis in the United States by knowingly hiring undocumented workers, and called for steep new penalties on those exploiting the shadow economy.

As part of his emerging public campaign for the immigration legislation pending in Congress, Bush visited the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to emphasize his focus on enforcement and to combat the conservative complaint that his immigration proposals add up to amnesty for millions of foreigners violating U.S. immigration law.

"Businesses that knowingly employ illegal workers undermine this law and undermine the spirit of America," the president said during a speech against a backdrop of U.S. flags, images of the Statue of Liberty and the slogan "Comprehensive Immigration Reform." "And we're not going to tolerate it in this country." Although most businesses abide by the law, he said, "there are some unscrupulous folks who want to take advantage of low-cost labor."

Bush's speech came hours before his administration reached an agreement with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, has criticized Bush's plan to dispatch 6,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican line to bolster overwhelmed Border Patrol agents, but he agreed yesterday to contribute 1,000 troops as long as the federal government picks up the full cost.

The president has tried to straddle a difficult political divide in the fight over immigration. For years, he has been promoting a guest-worker program that would allow millions of illegal immigrants already in the country to stay temporarily under certain conditions. He has also embraced a Senate plan that would offer a path to citizenship for many illegal immigrants if they have been here for years, pay back taxes, pay a penalty, learn English and maintain a crime-free record.

At the same time, under withering criticism from within his own party, Bush has lately offered tough rhetoric and the National Guard plan to demonstrate his commitment to enforcing the law and to stop new waves of illegal immigrants from crossing the border. The Guard troops would stay until the government can hire an additional 6,000 Border Patrol agents. The House has passed legislation that focuses almost exclusively on enforcement and has resisted the Senate bill.

Bush used the occasion yesterday to press both sides in Congress to come up with a deal. He suggested that he is willing to concede some of what he wants. "The House and Senate bills will require effort and compromise on both sides," he said. "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

The chamber was an important setting for that message because corporate America has been among the leading forces backing Bush's guest-worker plan and the Senate approach, seeing the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants as a vital part of the U.S. economy.

Bush noted that the government is working to make it easier for businesses to check the status of would-be workers. He said both House and Senate bills would require employers to use a new online verification system called Basic Pilot. But he said the penalties for violating the law are too light, noting that a business that fails to check an employee's identification faces a fine as low as $100, and that one that knowingly hires an illegal immigrant faces a fine as low as $250.

"You might as well pay a speeding ticket," Bush said. He added: "We got to increase the penalties. If we want to be smart about work site enforcement, we got to say to somebody who's breaking the law, there's going to be a cost, and it's more than $250."

Bush Tries To Regain His Footing On Once-rock-solid Conservative Base (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Whether President Bush is talking about a get-tough border policy or the importance of judicial restraint — he discussed both Thursday — he is sure to throw in an appeal these days to wavering conservative supporters.

Bush and his aides are playing up items such as tighter borders and judges who “administer the law” rather than make it, seeking to reconnect with conservative Republicans whose support has shrunk in recent polls — and whose votes will be critical in this fall's congressional elections.

Bush used to be able to count on overwhelming support from Republicans and conservatives, but the Iraq war and a variety of other issues have eroded that backing.

A May 5-7 USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found Bush's approval among Republicans at 68%, down from 85% in early January. Among conservatives — who also include some Democrats and independents — Bush's support fell to 52%, from 73% in January.

Now the White House is on a campaign to get that support back. Some examples:

On Thursday, the White House staged a special Rose Garden swearing-in for Brett Kavanaugh, recently confirmed by the Senate for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The White House fought a three-year battle to confirm Kavanaugh. He has been a priority for conservatives but anathema to some Democrats, who noted his role as an aide to independent counsel Ken Starr during the impeachment of President Clinton and said he was too partisan to be a judge.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., described him as a “political pick being pushed for political reasons.”

Another White House event will occur next week when Bush will talk about the importance of a constitutional amendment that would bar gay marriage by defining marriage as being between a man and a woman, a major issue for social and religious conservatives.

The president is scheduled to renew his call for a line-item veto, arguing it will help him rein in the runaway federal spending that has been another nagging source of conservative discontent. Bush has also challenged the GOP-controlled

Senate over extra money in a special spending bill for the costs of wars and hurricanes. The House passed a $92.2 billion measure, but the Senate added about $14 billion. “If they bust the $92.2 billion, I'm going to veto it,” Bush said Thursday.

Bush's backing for a “comprehensive” overhaul of immigration laws infuriates some conservatives because it includes proposals to allow illegal immigrants to work here temporarily and would permit some to seek citizenship. Recently, though, Bush has emphasized tougher border enforcement and a crackdown on companies that hire illegal immigrants, both strongly supported by conservatives. In a speech Thursday to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce here, Bush said, “We don't have full control of this border. And I'm determined to change that.”

Says Republican strategist Rich Galen: “What (the Bush administration is) doing is reaching back out to the people who elected them in the first place.”

GOP consultants say renewing conservative support could help Bush raise his approval rating, which hit the lowest point of his presidency — 31% — in early May. It could also make a difference this fall, when conservative turnout will be crucial to Republican hopes of retaining Congress.

Republican pollster Bill McInturff says his polling shows that rank-and-file conservative Republicans still support Bush by about 80%. He acknowledges that vocal “radio talk show conservatives” — those who listen to Rush Limbaugh, Sean Hannity and others — are angry with the president over immigration and other issues.

McInturff says Bush needs to reach out to conservatives on border security. “The public needs to be more assured that more is being done to stop illegals from entering the country, and penalizing employers who hire them,” McInturff says.

Democratic strategist Jenny Backus says she has noticed Bush's new “dance moves” with conservatives. She adds that worries about White House leadership on issues such as the Iraq war cross ideological lines, and Bush may not be able to win back his core supporters if he can't fix that.

“The (conservative) base cares about Iraq, too,” Backus says.

A key test for Bush is whether conservative Republicans show up at the polls this fall. GOP strategist Tom Edmonds says that while most disillusioned GOP conservatives won't vote for Democrats, they could “sit on their hands” and rob GOP candidates of the votes they need to win.

“Time is on our side,” Edmonds says. “We don't need to make wholesale changes. We just need to kind of get our act together.”

GOP consultant Charles Black says that despite all Bush's political problems, the president remains a potent fundraiser.

“In some places, we will have to outspend our opponents,” he says. “We just have to make sure everyone has enough money to do that.”

Bush Chides Party Members On Immigration (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 1 — Beginning a public relations offensive intended to prod divided Congressional Republicans into overhauling the nation's immigration laws, President Bush rebuked conservative opponents of his plan on Thursday and warned that there is "no excuse" for delay.

With Congress set to return to Washington on Monday after a one-week recess, some Republicans have suggested they may fare better at the polls in November if the House and Senate wait until after Election Day to reconcile their vastly different immigration bills.

But Mr. Bush made clear in a speech at the United States Chamber of Commerce that he did not want Congress to wait. Next week, the president will take his case for what he calls "comprehensive immigration reform" on the road, with appearances in New Mexico and Nebraska.

"The House and Senate bill will require effort and compromise on both sides," Mr. Bush told a friendly audience gathered at the chamber's headquarters, across the street from the White House. "It's a difficult task. Yet the difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it."

Whether Mr. Bush can bring his party's warring factions together remains to be seen. On one side are conservatives who support the House bill, which declares illegal immigrants felons and would have them deported. On the other are those, like the president, who prefer the Senate version, which would open the way for many of the estimated 11 million people living in the United States illegally to become citizens.

In his speech, Mr. Bush took aim at House members who brand the Senate bill amnesty, though he did not mention any by name. "Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country," he said. The lawmakers are "are acting on deeply felt principles," he said, but added, "I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic."

Bush Shuns Republicans' Stand To Return Illegals (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

President Bush yesterday rejected House Republicans' stance that illegal aliens must return home, calling it "wrong and unrealistic" and saying many will have to be allowed to stay.

Speaking to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a block from the White House, Mr. Bush also directly challenged businesses to hire only legal workers, and said those that don't should be prepared to face increased fines. In addition, he said both the House and Senate will have to compromise, but said voters expect a bill and he said that bill should tackle both enforcement and a pathway to citizenship for illegal aliens.

"The difficulty of this task is no excuse for avoiding it," he said.

Mr. Bush was making his first in-depth comments since the Senate passed its broad immigration bill last week, setting up a showdown over immigration policy with the House, which passed an enforcement bill in December.

Last Friday, and again on Sunday, Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said he cannot accept any approach that allows illegal aliens to stay in the country with the government's approval.

"The words 'path to citizenship' is a buzzword for amnesty. We ought to be honest -- it is amnesty," Mr. Sensenbrenner, a key House negotiator, said on NBC's "Meet the Press" program. He contends that more enforcement against employers would make it hard for illegal aliens to get jobs, encouraging them to go home.

But Mr. Bush dismissed that argument.

"Listen, I appreciate the members are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that. Yet I also believe that the approach they suggest is wrong and unrealistic," he said.

He said his own plan to allow illegal aliens with "a home, a family and a clean record" to stay is the "rational middle ground" between amnesty and the House Republicans' approach.

The president plans to travel to New Mexico, Texas and Nebraska next week to stress his plans for border security and push lawmakers to pass a bill.

Mr. Bush drew praise yesterday from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, a key Democrat on the issue. He said Mr. Bush was "right on the mark" in telling Congress to get a broad bill done.

But Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, demanded the president do more to distance himself from the House bill.

Mr. Bush does differ with the Senate on one key provision -- the Senate bill creates a pre-immigrant visa, under which some illegal aliens and future foreign workers would be on a path to citizenship. While Mr. Bush supports that for illegal aliens, he has consistently opposed that for future workers.

"Temporary workers must return to their homes at the conclusion of their stay," he said yesterday.

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, praised that stance, saying a "future temporary-worker plan must be just that: temporary."

Bush Presses Lawmakers To Pass Immigration Bill (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush urged House and Senate lawmakers to come together and merge competing immigration bills.

"It's a difficult task, but the difficulty of the task is no excuse for avoiding it," Bush said in a speech at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Thursday. "The United States Congress needs to pass a comprehensive bill."

The Senate passed immigration legislation last week, a measure that would establish a temporary guest-worker program and allow millions of illegal immigrants to eventually gain citizenship. It faces a difficult future, however, as House and Senate lawmakers must overcome numerous differences in conference. Many House Republicans are strictly opposed to giving illegal immigrants any path to citizenship, an idea many view as amnesty.

In recent days, however, immigration has taken a backseat with Congress on a week-long recess and other issues, like Iran and the resignation of Treasury Secretary John Snow, garnering attention.

Focusing further on the issue, the president will travel to the border area next week, making stops at law enforcement facilities on Tuesday in Artesia, N.M., and Laredo, Texas. The following day, he'll discuss immigration at a Catholic charities center in Omaha, Neb.

DOJ_NMG_0031525

Mr. Bush's plan for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws would give undocumented workers a path to citizenship, create a guest worker program, make employers accountable for hiring illegal workers, and heighten security along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico by boosting the size of the Border Patrol and using high-tech surveillance methods.

"The need to secure this border is urgent," Mr. Bush said, outlining his plan to send National Guardsmen to the Southwest to assist the Border Patrol while 6,000 new agents are trained. "They're going to be a complement to the Border Patrol," which will remain in charge of law enforcement, Bush said.

Addressing some critics, Bush said his immigration proposal doesn't create an "automatic" path to citizenship. Instead, he said there's a "rational middle ground" between amnesty and trying to deport the 12 million illegal immigrants now in the U.S.

Mr. Bush also touted the economy, called for "fiscal sanity," and repeated his threat to veto a pending emergency spending bill if it exceeds his spending limit.

"This economy of the United States is strong and we intend to keep it that way," he said. "The best way to balance the budget is to keep pro-growth economic policies in place and be wise about how we spend your money."

Illegals' Tax Deal Could Kill Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The long-fought Senate immigration bill that opponents say grants amnesty to 10 million illegal aliens is unconstitutional and appears headed for certain demise, Senate Republicans now say.

A key feature of the Senate bill is that it would make illegals pay back taxes before applying for citizenship, a requirement that supporters say will raise billions of dollars in the next decade.

There's just one problem: The U.S. Constitution specifically prohibits revenue-raising legislation from originating in the Senate.

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," according to the "origination clause" in Article I, Section 7.

Republicans -- including the bill's supporters -- say this will kill the bill, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist says he's offered a simple solution. He wants to attach the immigration bill to a tax bill that has already passed the House. It would then proceed as planned to a "conference committee," where negotiators from the House and Senate hammer out differences between the two chambers' immigration bills.

"This is a procedural issue that we could overcome," said Carolyn Weyforth, spokeswoman for Mr. Frist.

But Minority Leader Harry Reid won't go along with that fix. His office said yesterday that the concerns raised by Mr. Frist and House Republicans are "technical in nature" and can be ignored.

"If Republicans are serious about enacting comprehensive immigration reform, I've got a deal for them," spokesman Jim Manley said. "All they have to do is nothing. Just let the House and Senate bills go to conference and let the conferees work their will."

The bill as written, however, will never make it to conference, Republicans say. Under House rules, any member can introduce a "blue-slip resolution" to return the legislation to the Senate. And although there are plenty of House conservatives eager to kill the Senate bill any way they can, Hill staffers say it would likely be done based on "policy-blind constitutional issues."

"If there is a blue-slip issue, it is not about policy," said one House aide familiar with the matter. "It's about procedure and the House's prerogative to uphold the United States Constitution."

There is some debate about whether the constitutional ban on Senate revenue bills pertains only to bills whose primary purpose is to raise money or whether it also applies to bills that do so incidentally.

Republicans say that because the concerns already have been raised, they expect the bill to be returned to the Senate.

They point to a 2002 report written by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service that reveals how broadly the House interprets the origination clause.

"In 1992, the House returned to the Senate a bill (S.884, 102nd Congress) to require the President to impose economic sanctions, including a ban on certain imports, against countries which fail to eliminate large-scale driftnet fishing," according to the report. "In 1999, the House returned to the Senate a bill (S.254, 105th Congress) effectively banning the import of certain assault weapon attachments."

The policy of the House, according to the report, has been to interpret "any meaningful revenue proposal" as subject to the origination clause.

To skirt the ban, Republicans say, the Senate easily could agree to attach the immigration bill to the House-approved tax legislation. They see Mr. Reid's refusal to fix the problem as an attempt to scuttle the bill, and thus deny the Republican Congress a "victory" for passing immigration reform before this fall's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0031526

"We can solve this constitutional issue if Harry Reid would drop his obstructionism and allow the comprehensive immigration legislation to move past the Senate," Ms. Weyforth said.

Senate Border Bill Steps On House Turf (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — A procedural glitch is adding new, and possibly significant, hurdles to the drive in Congress to approve sweeping changes to immigration policy.

The problem stems from the Senate bill that would create a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for many of the illegal immigrants in the U.S. Participants in the guest worker program would pay income taxes; illegal immigrants would, as part of the legalization process, be required to pay back taxes and new fees.

The Constitution, however, gives the House sole authority to originate bills that include revenue measures — and it allows any House member to object if a Senate bill does so.

Late last week, Senate aides said they received word from the House committee with jurisdiction over revenue issues that it would use that constitutional power to block further consideration of the Senate bill.

This problem is stalling efforts to appoint a House-Senate conference committee that would try to reach a compromise on the final form of immigration legislation.

Those negotiations were expected to difficult at best. But unless the procedural stumbling block is resolved, the talks won't even start.

Although the impasse may prove to be a minor problem, it could provide a way for House members who staunchly oppose the Senate's legalization measures to block any compromise efforts. That could mean no overhaul of immigration policy would emerge from Congress this year.

Senate leaders are trying to determine how to move forward.

"We went into the [Memorial Day] recess at a stalemate," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Word of the problem was spreading on Capitol Hill as President Bush on Thursday renewed his push for an immigration bill. In a speech in Washington, he stressed that although he recognized the difficulty in crafting a measure, compromise was necessary — particularly in determining how to treat longtime residents who entered the United States illegally.

The president's remarks came a week after the Senate passed its wide-ranging bill. The House measure, approved in December, contains no provisions for a guest worker program or a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. It would make illegal presence in the country a felony, and would intensify border security.

As the Senate edged toward passing its bill, Senate aides received word that House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield) would block it because of its revenue-producing sections.

This practice is known as blue-slipping because Thomas would officially notify the Senate of his intentions on a slip of blue paper.

Thomas did not respond to requests for comment, and committee aides declined to elaborate on the dispute.

The Joint Committee on Taxation and the Congressional Budget Office estimate that the Senate bill provisions would increase federal revenue by about $66 billion from 2007 to 2016.

The potential for a House objection stemming from these provisions did not come up during senators' lengthy negotiations over their bill earlier this year, a Senate Judiciary Committee aide said.

Last week, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) proposed a technical way of skirting the problem: attaching the Senate's immigration bill to an existing House tax bill, Frist aides said.

After various legislative maneuvers, the two chambers could separate the tax and immigration measures and try, behind closed doors, to negotiate on a final immigration bill.

The Frist plan faces two hurdles. It requires a House vote to take effect, which would give the House members opposed to the Senate bill a chance to vote it down.

More immediately, Senate Democrats disagree with Republican assertions that Frist's plan is the only way to go forward. Minority Leader Reid has refused to approve the plan, blocking Frist from proceeding.

"We can solve this challenge if Harry Reid would agree to this solution," said Frist spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth.

In a sign of the mistrust among leaders in both parties that has characterized much of the immigration debate, Weyforth attributed Reid's stance to a desire to thwart any resolution of the issue until after the November elections.

Many Republicans suspect Democrats would prefer such a delay so that they can keep criticizing the House's enforcement-only approach.

DOJ_NMG_0031527

"With the president talking about immigration reform today, it amazes me that Reid is stalemating the entire bill," Weyforth said.

Manley, Reid's spokesman, dismissed Weyforth's assertion. And he said that if Frist was seriously committed to overhauling immigration policy, he would persuade House GOP leaders to allow the immigration bill to proceed to a conference committee.

Manley said Reid questioned the need to add the Senate's immigration bill to the tax measure, especially in light of the complications that might cause.

"We can get this done without resorting to extraordinary measures if all the parties were committed to getting it to conference as quickly as possible," he said.

Bush has said he wants an immigration bill sent to him quickly, a point he reiterated Thursday.

"The American people expect us to meet our responsibility and deliver immigration reform that fixes the problems in the current system, that upholds our ideals and provides a fair and practical way forward," he said.

He also repeated his disagreement with those lawmakers — mostly Republicans — who had said they would oppose any compromise bill that included legalization provisions.

"Some members of Congress argue that no one who came to this country illegally should be allowed to continue living and working in our country, and that any plan that allows them to stay equals amnesty, no matter how many conditions we impose," Bush said. "Listen, I appreciate the members are acting on deeply felt principles. I understand that."

But he called their approach "wrong and unrealistic."

"There's a rational middle ground between granting an automatic path to citizenship for every illegal immigrant and a program that requires every illegal immigrant to leave" the country, he said.

"The middle ground recognizes there are differences between an illegal immigrant who crossed the border recently, and someone who has worked here for many years, who's got a home, a family and a clean record," Bush said.

The Senate bill would allow illegal immigrants who have been in the country five years or more to remain, continue working and eventually become legal permanent residents and citizens after paying back taxes, paying at least $3,250 in fines and fees and learning English.

Those who have been in the United States more than two years but less than five would be required to go to a point of entry at the border and file an application to return; those who have been in the country less than two years would be required to leave.

Senate Bill Would Add 20 Million Legal Immigrants, Report Says (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

The nation's population of legal immigrants would increase by nearly 20 million over the next decade if the recently passed Senate immigration bill becomes law, and taxpayers would spend more than $50 billion to operate a new guest-worker program and pay for extra welfare, Social Security and public health-care costs, according to a Congressional Budget Office report.

But the cost of absorbing the newcomers would be offset by a boost of $66 billion in federal revenue from income taxes and payroll taxes generated by the temporary guest-worker program, along with fees that immigrants must pay to participate, the report said.

By 2016, about 8 million immigrants would enter the United States as temporary guest workers, and 11 million immigrants who now live in the country illegally would become permanent legal residents under provisions of the bill.

The report, the first definitive look at the impact of the Senate bill, was commissioned by the Senate Finance Committee and was submitted on May 16, nine days before the measure was passed. The study has been embraced by the Bush administration and the bill's supporters, but opponents said crucial omissions greatly lowered its population and cost estimates.

Critics said the report does not take into account the 950,000 newcomers who enter the country legally under current immigration law, bringing the 10-year total of new immigrants to about 30 million. Some say that number will double by 2026.

The report also does not consider the possibility of future mass illegal border crossings that might occur in spite of technological enhancement and increased personnel along the Southern border, according to critics.

An explosion of immigrants is one reason that House Republicans say they are strongly opposed to the Senate bill, and have vowed to fight it when members of the two chambers meet for negotiations in a congressional conference. Supporters of the Senate's approach, which is backed by President Bush, say they will stand firm.

"We can build miles of fences, but the fact remains that immigrants will still come because employers need workers and immigrants want jobs," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who fought for a guest-worker program. "It's far better for American jobs and wages to have a practical, common-sense policy of legal immigration, than to continue leaving millions of immigrants underground and underpaid."

Will Adams, a spokesman for Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who opposes granting residency to illegal immigrants, called legal immigration "the soft underbelly of the Senate bill." It is overlooked in the debate, he said, "but when it's exposed, the public is outraged."

Robert E. Rector, a senior research fellow in domestic policy studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the bill "is horrendous." Assisting tens of millions of low-income workers with less than a high school education would lead to costs in welfare, health care, housing and other areas that far exceed the half-billion dollars the government already pays each year, he said.

"Once [illegal immigrants] become legal, they are going to receive welfare that's vastly disproportionate to the taxes that they're going to pay," Rector said. High school dropouts, immigrants or not, earn about $22,000 yearly and pay far fewer taxes than middle-class Americans. "There's no way they can contribute to the cost of educating their children. The cost they impose on government . . . far exceeds anything they bring in in terms of tax revenue."

The budget office report, compiled with help from the Joint Committee on Taxation, disputed that account, as did others who took issue with Rector's belief that the Senate bill would increase the immigrant population by 60 million.

Earlier, Rector predicted an even higher number: 100 million. He updated the figure after an amendment to the bill capped the yearly number of guest workers at 200,000 per year.

Alan Reynolds, a senior fellow for the libertarian Cato Institute, said Rector's estimates "are preposterous." He accused Rector of compounding numbers to reach an alarming total and not taking into account that most immigrants who would become legal citizens already live in the country.

"They're basically saying, 'Gee, if we keep illegals illegal, then we would have fewer legal residents,' " Reynolds said.

A report released yesterday by the National Foundation for American Policy also said Rector "overstated the numbers." Stuart Anderson, executive director of the foundation, said most "new entrants" who would become legal residents currently live in the United States. In 20 years, the net total of new entrants would be about 47 million.

Rector is supported by other groups, including the Center for Immigration Studies and NumbersUSA, two opponents of increased immigration. He said his concern about the number of immigrants is outweighed by the cost.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, 750,000 immigrants would be eligible to receive food stamps, and 1.3 million would be eligible for some form of Medicaid, in addition to other benefits.

The cost of providing food stamps, Medicare, Medicaid and visa fees for guest workers would total $5 billion between 2009 and 2016. An additional $6.5 billion would be needed for new residents who unite with families. Providing services to illegal immigrants who become permanent legal residents would cost $10 billion more.

Schwarzenegger To Order Troops To Border (AP-Y2)

By Aaron C. Davis

The AP, June 1, 2006

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger agreed Thursday to send the California National Guard to the Mexican border, ending a 17-day standoff with the Bush administration.

The two sides had been at odds over whether California Guardsmen would join the effort to bolster the Border Patrol and who would pay for it.

They reached an agreement under which California will contribute about 1,000 Guardsmen for border duty and the federal government will pick up the full cost, Schwarzenegger said.

"It is not my preference to send the National Guard, but there's an important need to protect the border," he said.

However, in a separate act that was not part of the agreement with the federal government, Schwarzenegger will sign an executive order that ends the California National Guard's participation on Dec. 31, 2008, state officials said.

Schwarzenegger intends for the mission to be carried out mostly by troops who volunteer for six- to 12-month assignments. The Bush plan called for sending Guardsmen on border duty instead of their annual two-and-three week training exercises.

The state would have to pay for normal training sessions, while long-term assignments are funded by the federal government.

Altogether, President Bush has proposed sending 6,000 National Guardsmen to the U.S. border with Mexico. The overall cost of the multiyear deployment has been put at more than $1 billion.

In California, National Guard officials have said the mobilization could begin immediately.

A planning force could reach the border within days and the full deployment could be in place by July 15, but California Guard officials said they would not send anyone until Congress approves funding for the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0031529

Schwarzenegger said he would sign a memorandum of understanding between the federal government and the governors of the four southern border states. It serves as a federal promise to repay the cost of the deployment.

It also establishes rules of engagement prohibiting Guardsmen from handling detainees, but allowing them to carry guns. The rules are similar to those the California Guard follows when deploying to a riot, officials said.

The document also contains a provision allowing the border governors to decline to participate in any part of the mission they deem inappropriate.

Schwarzenegger's decision ended an awkward period for the Republican governor. He held out longer than Democratic governors in Arizona and New Mexico before saying he would send troops.

He also had risked alienating voters in a state that has repeatedly backed a tough approach on immigration — although his reluctance to send troops had been seen as popular among Hispanics.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano signed an agreement Thursday for her state to participate in Bush's plan, with 300 Arizona National Guard soldiers set to take part beginning in mid-June.

National Guard troops will be used for engineering, road and fence building, transportation, logistics and surveillance, reconnaissance and port-of-entry duties but not direct law enforcement.

Gov. To Send 1,000 National Guard Troops To The Border (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Despite some misgivings, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Thursday he would send 1,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican border as part of President Bush's plan to curb illegal immigration.

Schwarzenegger said the mission would begin July 15 and end no later than Dec. 31, 2008 — a deadline, he said, that ensures the Guard won't be locked into an open-ended commitment.

Schwarzenegger, speaking at a news conference in the Capitol, also said the Guard would rely on volunteers for the assignment and that troops would be spared the riskiest duty, involving arrest and detention of people crossing the border illegally. About 700 Guard troops have expressed interest thus far, he said.

They will fix trucks, repair roads, operate cameras and perform other logistical duties, freeing U.S. Border Patrol agents for potentially more hazardous work.

Stints at the border would last from six months to a year — reflecting Schwarzenegger's conviction that Bush's plan to rotate troops in and out every two weeks made little sense.

Amid a bitter debate over illegal immigration, Schwarzenegger seems to be staking out a middle ground.

He is striving to deflect accusations that he is "militarizing" the border, emphasizing that most Guard troops will be unarmed and a step removed from the front lines. At the same time, the governor does not want to be seen as ignoring Bush's call to shore up a border that Schwarzenegger has derided as dangerously porous.

The governor is expected to sign an agreement with the federal government spelling out the terms of the operation. Dubbed "Operation Jump Start," the agreement specifies that the federal government would cover costs that may run to $96 million a year, state officials said.

As of Thursday night, Schwarzenegger, the Pentagon and governors in other southern border states were working out details of the agreement. Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano agreed to deploy 300 National Guard soldiers from her state to the border beginning in mid-June, the Associated Press reported.

Maj. Gen. David Rataczak, the Arizona National Guard adjutant general, said some of the Arizona troops will go to the border with their units for weeks-long annual training, while others will go as volunteers for longer stints.

As of now, the president's $1.9-billion request to finance his plan for increased border security is pending in Congress.

Bush laid out his plan to shore up the border in a nationally televised speech May 15. He said he wanted 6,000 National Guard troops to aid in border security.

Schwarzenegger quickly voiced doubts about the plan. He questioned whether it would make a real difference and worried that the state might not be repaid.

At his news conference Thursday, the governor said that over the last two weeks he had struck a satisfactory compromise with the Bush administration.

"The mission that I will assign to our California National Guard will be significantly different from the plan laid out by President Bush," Schwarzenegger said. "We will assist in a manner that protects our troops and uses our men and women in the most effective and appropriate way possible."

One key was setting a date by which the operation would end, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031530

As Bush structured the plan, the governor was free to cooperate or opt out, according to state Guard officials. Should the president try to extend the deployment, Schwarzenegger said, he would use his authority as commander of the California guard to resist.

"Well, I'm the commander in chief, so I can take back the National Guard at any time that I want," the governor said. "That is the most important thing, that there is control over that. And like I said, we are doing this, may I remind you, reluctantly. I mean, it's not my preference to send the National Guard to do this mission."

But it was necessary, he said, "to help the federal government to secure our borders … "

State Democratic leaders said that committing Guard troops is a mistake.

Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles), who was briefed on the plan by the governor, predicted that Latin America would find the move offensive.

Nuñez said he also feared the commitment would stretch thin a National Guard that is crucial to California's recovery in the event of an earthquake or other natural disaster.

"When you deploy the National Guard to the southern border — but you don't do the same to the northern border — then you send a message that the problem is Latin America," he said. "This doesn't send a message of friendship. It sends a message of antagonism to our friends in the south. I don't think it will be well-received."

Most Guard troops won't be armed, though local commanders will be free to authorize firearms if they determine soldiers are in jeopardy, Guard officials said.

They also said there should be enough Guard troops to respond to natural disasters — despite the commitment of troops overseas and, now, at the border.

Of the 20,000 California National Guard troops, about 2,200 are overseas. Assuming 1,000 go to the border, that still leaves plenty of troops to respond to disasters, Guard officials said.

Nuñez said he was not convinced. The Assembly speaker said the governor and Guard officials "seem to feel confident we have enough manpower in the National Guard to respond to a natural disaster. I'm not totally convinced that's the case."

Immigration Figures At Polls (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- To Brian Bilbray, the "greatest ethics scandal in America" isn't about Washington lobbyists or the bribery conviction of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, formerly this area's unbeatable congressman.

Mr. Bilbray, a former Republican House member seeking Mr. Cunningham's vacant seat, is fighting what he calls the scandal of illegal immigration. He hopes that tough talk on the campaign trail about securing borders and cracking down on employers who hire illegal workers will bring enough supporters to the polls on June 6 to help him defeat a challenge from Democrat Francine Busby. A local school-board member, she takes a softer line on the issue, supporting proposals to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens and create new guest-worker programs.

Voters in this district near the Mexican border are "furious at everyone in Washington for ignoring this problem," Mr. Bilbray says.

Ms. Busby emphasizes the need for changes in ethics rules that would unravel Washington's "pay to play" system. Immigration "is not the only issue, nor is it the most important issue affecting people's lives," she says.

More is at stake in the Bilbray-Busby showdown than one congressional seat. If Ms. Busby wins Tuesday, she would take over what has long been a Republican district. Such a shift could portend a wave of Democratic wins this fall, just as Republicans are fighting to hang on to control of the House and Senate amid dismal approval ratings for President Bush.

The race also is shaping up as an early test for how immigration and scandal could play out this year in the polls, and which issue may get greater traction with voters.

With the San Diego runoff just days away, polls show a close race. SurveyUSA, a nonpartisan market-research firm, reported a dead heat -- 45% for Mr. Bilbray and 45% for Ms. Busby -- in May. Ms. Busby acknowledges an uphill battle in a district where 44% of voters are registered Republicans, and less than 30% are Democrats. Victory, Ms. Busby says, "would take just a tectonic shift."

Mindful of the broader implications, national party organizations are pouring money into the race, largely for negative television ads. One ad sponsored by the National Republican Congressional Committee calls Ms. Busby a "liberal" and says she supports "amnesty" for illegal immigrants. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has launched a campaign to highlight Mr. Bilbray's work as a lobbyist in recent years, and votes he missed as a lawmaker while he went on trips to "hang out with special interests."

DOJ_NMG_0031531

In a tacit admission that Mr. Bilbray's immigration position may be more popular in the district, Ms. Busby and her backers are trying to blur the candidates' differences on the issue. He opposes allowing illegal immigrants to become citizens, which he calls "amnesty." Ms. Busby says because the citizenship comes with hurdles, it doesn't amount to amnesty.

Ms. Busby says the barrage of commercials, even negative ones, have boosted her name recognition. On a recent walk outside her campaign headquarters in Encinitas, a coastal, Democratic-leaning enclave north of downtown, she was stopped by several people who asked if she was Francine. "We're pulling for you," said one wetsuit-clad surfer climbing the stairs from the beach.

While Mr. Bilbray enjoys the advantage of running in a strongly Republican district, he faces the danger of his party fracturing along different fault lines. Because he favors abortion rights and has supported gun control, he's fighting an impression among some Republicans that he's too moderate.

His main draw for the conservative base is his credibility as a hard-liner on immigration. He has supported legislation eliminating automatic citizenship for U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants. One of his lobbying clients was the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that wants to limit both illegal and legal immigration.

But he still faces a challenge to his right from William Griffith, an independent candidate on Tuesday's ballot, who is running as a "conservative alternative" to Mr. Bilbray. While Mr. Griffith has little chance of winning -- he got just 1% of the vote in the April special election, compared with 15% for Mr. Bilbray -- he may peel off some conservative Republican voters. Mr. Griffith has picked up endorsements from the local Minutemen activist group and the American Independent Party, both of which are pushing for a crackdown on illegal immigration.

And yet, if Mr. Bilbray steers too hard against immigration, he may risk losing moderate Republicans. Earlier this week, Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) canceled a visit to San Diego for a Bilbray fund-raiser. Mr. McCain supports a Senate immigration bill that would allow millions of illegal immigrants in the U.S. to eventually become citizens. Mr. Bilbray opposes that measure, and Mr. McCain didn't want to distract from the candidate's campaign message, according to a statement sent to the Bilbray campaign by Mr. McCain's political action committee. Mr. McCain still endorses Mr. Bilbray, the statement said.

On Tuesday night, Mr. Bilbray met with a handful of members of the local chapter of the Republican National Hispanic Assembly and faced some probing questions. Todd Garcia VanBoxtel, vice chairman of the group, said he was concerned that mass deportations of illegal immigrants would create an "uproar" by separating families and disrupting neighborhoods.

In response, Mr. Bilbray sounded a softer tone than he often does on the campaign trail. "You're going to have displacement," he said. But he also predicted the House and Senate dealmakers would find a "moderate, middle ground" in their negotiations, including removing a provision in the House bill that would make illegal immigrants felons. "We're not going to be punitive to immigrants, and we're not going to reward illegal immigrants," he said. An avid surfer, Mr. Bilbray tempered his remarks with tales of traveling to Mexico's beaches and growing up near the "frontera."

Mr. Bilbray seemed to have walked the tightrope just right. Mr. Bilbray "probably didn't have enough votes to get an endorsement when he walked in" to the meeting, Mr. Garcia VanBoxtel later said. But the group ended up supporting the Republican candidate and plans a mailing to 1,000 Hispanic households urging them to vote.

"What impressed us was his affection for travel in Mexico ... and his love of the people... Obviously he didn't tell me necessarily what I wanted to hear, but he had firsthand knowledge of the situation and that won us over," Mr. Garcia VanBoxtel said.

118 Aliens Arrested In Raid Of 'Safe House' In Arizona (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

The U.S. Border Patrol arrested 118 illegal aliens at a "safe house" in Rio Rico, Ariz., just north of the U.S.-Mexico border, in a raid this week by a unit of undercover agents that has targeted alien smugglers and those who help them.

The team, known as the Disrupt unit, raided the house near Interstate 19 after receiving a tip about "suspicious activity." The agents took the illegals into custody and seized four vehicles. Twenty-three houses used by smugglers to stash illegal aliens awaiting transportation to cities throughout the U.S. have been uncovered by the team since October.

Created by former U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) Commissioner Robert C. Bonner as part of the Arizona Border Control Initiative, the team has focused on southern Arizona, where more than half of the 1.15 million illegal aliens apprehended last year were caught -- about 1,700 arrests a day in that state.

Mr. Bonner, who retired in November, described the Disrupt team as part of a "full-court press to reduce the number of illegal aliens crossing our borders, and to detect and arrest those engaged in illegal cross-border activity."

Working with investigators from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the team targets and seeks to disrupt the criminal organizations that smuggle foreigners into the United States.

"The community is the second set of eyes and ears for not only the United States Border Patrol, but for all law enforcement," said Jose L. Maheda, a Border Patrol spokesman in Nogales, Ariz.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar told a Senate subcommittee last month that the detection and disruption of alien and drug smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border was a top priority and that efforts to identify and dismantle these criminal organizations have resulted in an increase in violence aimed at his agents.

Chief Aguilar said that nearly 200 agents had been assaulted since Oct. 1, the start of the fiscal year, and that the number of agents assaulted during fiscal 2005 was more than double that in fiscal 2004.

"This line of defense does come at a price, and our dedicated agents face significant risks," Chief Aguilar told the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on terrorism, technology and homeland security. "As we continue to bring larger areas of the border under operational control, we can expect spikes in border violence as border criminals discover they can no longer operate with impunity and are prevented from using the border for their criminal activities."

The owner of the Rio Rico house, Diva Boreale, told reporters that she and her husband were "surprised" by the raid because she had no idea the residence -- which was rented out -- was being used to house illegal aliens.

Mrs. Boreale said "trash, covers, pillows and clothes" were just some of the items left by the illegals and their smugglers. "The house looks damaged."

Two Billboards Join Colorado Debate On Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

DENVER -- Two prominent billboards criticizing sanctuary policies for illegal aliens were uncovered here yesterday in the latest salvo in Colorado's simmering immigration debate.

The first billboard shows three military helmets atop rifles and has the message, "Mr. President, Mr. Governor, Mr. Mayor; they did not die for ILLEGAL SANCTUARY."

The second purports to welcome illegal aliens to Denver, which has policies forbidding authorities from asking about immigration status.

"Welcome to SANCTUARY CITY ... Relax, you made it! Brought to you by Executive Order 116," the black-and-white billboard says.

The 48-by-14-foot billboards are the brainchild of Denver radio talk-show host Peter Boyles, who frequently criticizes national immigration policies on his popular KHOW-AM morning show.

He broadcast yesterday's show at a rally featuring Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, and Jim Gilchrist, founder of the national Minuteman Project. As work crews uncovered the first billboard, the crowd of about 150 people cheered, while a lone protester held a sign that said, "No Billboards for Bigots."

The anti-sanctuary messages come as the immigration issue rises to the forefront of this year's state election. Activists are gathering signatures for a ballot measure that would deny state services to illegal aliens, and the Republican gubernatorial candidates are sparring over who is tougher on protecting the border.

The military-themed sign is a replica of a New Mexico billboard erected by Bob Park, a former Border Patrol agent who became frustrated with government policies that he said provided better medical care to illegal aliens than to military veterans.

Mr. Boyles' organization, Billboard Colorado, plans to erect at least one more billboard with a similar anti-illegal-entry theme. The signs, which cost $18,500 per month, are funded mainly by contributions from radio listeners and other Coloradans, Billboard Colorado spokesman Mike McGarry said.

"We've been deluged with contributions coming from all over the state," Mr. McGarry said. "We're getting $2 and $5 contributions from self-described little old ladies in their 80s where the return address is from a nursing home. This was truly a grass-roots effort."

Polly Baca, president of the Latin American Research and Service Agency in Denver, said she was "amused" by the billboard campaign, adding that most people would find the messages sarcastic and obscure.

"I find it rather interesting that they would put up billboards that most people can't understand," said Ms. Baca, who opposes the proposed ballot initiative. "When they say 'sanctuary,' does that mean a wildlife sanctuary? There are probably a handful of people who understand these messages, and they've probably already made up their minds on the issue."

Imam Agrees To Be Deported (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. – A Seattle-area mosque leader who was investigated for possible ties to terrorist groups agreed Thursday to accept an order of removal from the United States, federal officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0031533

Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed appeared in immigration court here, and Immigration Judge Victoria Young ruled that he had no legal basis to remain in the United States, according to a news release from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

During the hearing, Immigration and Customs lawyers presented evidence that Mohamed has Kenyan citizenship. Young ordered him deported to Kenya or, if that cannot be done, to Somalia, the agency said.

Mohamed was an imam of the Abu-Bakr Mosque in Seattle's Rainier Valley area.

He was arrested Nov. 14 at Seattle-Tacoma International Airport as he returned from a trip to Dallas. Federal officers said he lied to obtain legal asylum status after coming to the U.S. in 2000.

He has been detained by ICE without bond since his arrest, as agency attorneys argued that his ties to terrorist organizations in the horn of Africa made him a national security risk.

Among other things, federal agents believed he came to the country to help raise money for the Ogaden National Liberation Front, which wants an independent state for ethnic Somalis in Ethiopia, FBI Special Agent David Rubincam said during a February hearing in the case.

The outcome of the case "underscores ICE's commitment to protecting the integrity of our nation's legal immigration system," said Dorothy Stefan, the agency's chief counsel in Seattle.

Mohamed's defense attorney could not immediately be reached for comment after business hours Thursday.

Seattle Imam Ends His Effort To Stay In U.S. (SEAPI)

By Tracy Johnson, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 2, 2006

Mosque leader, held for 6 months, ordered deported to Kenya

A Seattle mosque leader who has been accused of funneling money to terrorist groups -- allegations that angered his many supporters in the local East African community -- gave up his fight Thursday to stay in the United States.

An immigration judge ordered that Abrahim Sheikh Mohamed, who isn't charged with any terrorism-related crimes, be deported to Kenya.

Mohamed has been locked up since his arrest Nov. 14 on immigration violations, and nearly six months of confinement -- much of it in isolation -- weighed heavily on his decision to accept deportation, according to his lawyer, Hilary Han.

"He's lived in the United States for almost six years. He has many ties here, and this is a place where he has been able to be safe," Han said. "This was not an easy decision for him."

Mohamed was accused of lying about being a member of a minority clan and his country of origin, among other things, in order to gain asylum. Federal immigration prosecutors say he is a citizen of Kenya and not war-torn Somalia.

With his fingerprints, authorities obtained several identity and passport-application documents that show he is from Kenya, according to Dorothy Stefan, regional chief counsel for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

"We are gratified by the outcome of this case. It underscores ICE's commitment to protecting the integrity of our nation's legal immigration system."

Han said that while Mohamed applied for such documents in Kenya, he is a native of Somalia and likely would have been able to prove it -- though he has now waived that chance. His deportation hearing had been scheduled for later this month.

Mohamed told Immigration Judge Victoria Young through a Somali interpreter Thursday that it was "a very difficult time" for him but said he was willingly giving up his efforts to stay.

Young ordered him deported to Kenya but left Somalia as an alternative if the Kenyan government won't take him.

Six members of the Abu-Bakr Mosque attended the hearing but declined to comment about their friend's situation.

Mohamed had led prayers as imam of the Rainier Valley mosque for five years before federal agents arrested him last fall at Sea-Tac Airport, where he'd just arrived on a domestic flight.

In February, more than 200 people rallied in front of the mosque while Mohamed sought to be freed on bond.

But during his bond hearing, FBI agents and other witnesses testified that he had ties to terrorism and was raising money for a radical Islamic holy war.

A man who ran an African restaurant near the mosque said $50,000 to $100,000 was raised each week for al-Itihaad a-Islamiya, a Somali terrorist organization to which he said Mohamed belongs.

The man also claimed that "jihad training" took place regularly in a nearby parking lot, where young people with BB guns were taught how to shoot people and blow up buildings.

Mohamed's supporters called such allegations ludicrous. They painted a picture of a peaceful leader who worked to keep Somali children on productive paths, and Han argued that some of the government's witnesses had grudges or other reasons to lie.

In March, Young concluded Mohamed was a threat to national security and denied his request to be freed on bond.

Han said Mohamed's decision to agree to be deported had nothing to do with the terrorism allegations.

An FBI spokeswoman said she could not discuss whether there was an ongoing criminal investigation of Mohamed.

Aziz Junejo, who hosts a local cable TV show on Islam, said it was "a very sad day" for the Muslim community. He said he has known Mohamed for several years and believes the man gave up his fight "to keep his dignity and respect."

"If one of our leaders was involved in terrorism, we wouldn't want him as a leader," Junejo said. "There's just no evidence of that."

Fill-in Assigned For Immigration Judge Blasted By Appeals Court (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) Another judge has been assigned to fill in for an immigration judge recently criticized by an appeals court for his handling of asylum cases, the court administrator said.

The Executive Office for Immigration Review, which manages the nation's immigration courts, has assigned a judge from Arlington, Va., to fill in for Judge Donald V. Verlise following an unexplained two-week absence.

Elliott Edwards, the administrator for the immigration court of the Philadelphia region, said Ferlise's absence was not due to illness, and the arrangement would continue for an indefinite period.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in April that Ferlise, 62, a former prosecutor, prejudged cases and bullied asylum-seekers, denying them their right to fair hearings. The Philadelphia City Council last month called for his removal.

Calls to Ferlise at home and at his office were not returned.

Washington attorney Ralph Conte, who said he was defending Ferlise but declined to say why he had been retained, referred questions to the Justice Department, which declined comment on what a spokesman called a ``personnel action."

A 2000 study published by the San Jose Mercury News ranked Ferlise as among the 10 toughest asylum judges in the country, saying he had granted 74 of 715 asylum requests between 1995 and 1999.

IRS Ruling Imperils 'Gift Fund' Charities For Home Buyers (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon And Kirstin Downey

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

A ruling by the Internal Revenue Service threatens to extinguish a fast-growing -- but controversial -- charitable industry that has funneled hundreds of millions of dollars in cash to first-time home buyers for their down payments.

The unexpected IRS edict throws into question a practice that has helped boost national home ownership rates to a near-record 69 percent in the past six years.

Almost 200 charities, such as AmeriDream, based in Gaithersburg, and Nehemiah Corp. in California, have acted as cash conduits between home sellers and buyers.

Under the system, sellers provide cash to the charities, which then give it to home buyers for their down payments. The sellers, who pay the charities a service fee, often recoup their money by charging a higher price for the homes -- usually 2 or 3 percent more, or an amount equal to the down payment, says a Government Accountability Office study.

Federal authorities have raised concerns, because the mortgages are insured by the Federal Housing Administration. When a home buyer defaults, the FHA loan fund suffers. Home buyers receiving assistance from the charities were more than twice as likely to default or become delinquent in their payments as those who used FHA loans without the charities' assistance, according to a GAO study last year.

Although the system has helped hundreds of thousands of low-income households buy their first homes, it is riddled with abuse, according to the IRS and a variety of government studies. The IRS called the programs "scams" in its ruling last month and said that by providing down payments, the charities actually inflated home prices, making it more likely that homeowners would default on their loans.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, who is pushing for charitable reform measures, blasted the down-payment assistance charities and praised the IRS ruling.

"Unfortunately, this sector of charities is riddled with individuals who believe their role is to help themselves, not to lend a helping hand," he said. "Some so-called charities need a wake-up call that their business is charitable work."

The IRS's "revenue ruling," issued May 4, states that charities that dole out cash to home buyers that comes from sellers do not qualify as tax-exempt organizations because they benefit private interests, such as builders and other home sellers. The

IRS expects to begin revoking some charities' tax-exempt status as it finishes audits, said Marvin Friedlander, chief of the IRS's exempt-organizations technical branch. The IRS also could assess the organizations millions of dollars in income taxes if it decides they are for-profit organizations, not charities.

Executives at the charities say they have helped renters who would not otherwise have been able to buy homes because they were unable to afford the down payment. They dispute the GAO study and disagree with the IRS findings.

Last week, a coalition of the charities asked the Treasury Department to suspend the IRS ruling and solicit public comment before issuing a final decision.

"This could have a sweeping impact on the whole housing industry," said Ann Ashburn, chief executive officer of AmeriDream, the nation's second-largest down-payment assistance charity, and the coalition chair.

The IRS action has also roiled the real estate industry, which depends on the charities as a way to move cash-poor home buyers into the housing market. The charities say they move $500 million a year from sellers to buyers -- money that would disappear if many down-payment assistance charities were put out of business.

"Almost anybody building for the first-time home buyer is using these programs," said David Ledford, staff vice president for housing finance and housing policy with the National Association of Home Builders. "Builders are concerned about what would happen not just in the future but for buyers who have already qualified and are going through a sale but who have not closed yet."

Among those who have benefited are Beverly and Kevin Queen, who used $2,500 they received through the AmeriDream down-payment program to move their five children out of an Anacostia apartment to a four-bedroom single family home they bought in Fort Washington in 2000. The only cash the couple had at the time, Beverly Queen said only half-jokingly, "was the $5 holding our bank account open."

Their brick-front home sits on a half-acre backing up to farmland. "This is what I wanted," said Beverly Queen, 44.

The Queens said they have faced no problems keeping up with their mortgage payments.

But consumer advocate Allen Fishbein, director of housing and credit policy with the Consumer Federation of America, said some borrowers have been financially damaged when they fell behind on their mortgages but could not sell the houses because they paid inflated prices.

"Our concern is that people who became homeowners will have trouble making payments," which he said could cause them to lose their homes and wreck their credit.

The IRS has discovered other irregularities in the down-payment charities. Although the organizations are meant for home buyers of modest means, the IRS has found that affluent home buyers have improperly taken advantage of them -- even using the "gift funds" to buy vacation residences, Friedlander said.

The charities have also lavished perks on themselves, according to the IRS. Recent audits of 15 of the largest down-payment organizations have raised questions about extravagant pay to executives, problematic ties to for-profit companies and inflated prices to low-income buyers that the charities were purporting to help, Friedlander said.

As a result, the IRS has widened its investigation to include an additional 170 charities -- virtually all of the down-payment assistance charities that use seller funds.

The "gift fund" mechanism was devised by Don Harris, a Sacramento lawyer and minister who in the late 1990s found a loophole in the rules governing FHA mortgages that generally forbade home sellers from helping customers directly with down payments. He devised the idea of establishing a charity as a go-between for buyers and sellers.

The group Harris started, then called Nehemiah Home Ownership, gave buyers cash for the down payment on an FHA mortgage, generally 3 percent of the purchase price. The sellers then paid the charity an equal amount toward the down payment plus a service fee, typically 0.75 percent of the down payment.

Harris got a ruling from HUD approving the arrangement, and others copied Nehemiah's concept. Within a few years, a multibillion-dollar charitable industry was born, with about 200 nonprofits offering the service. In all, the industry says, it has given down payments to 625,000 households.

These loans make up an increasing amount of the FHA's volume. In 2006, about 28 percent of households receiving FHA loans got their down payments from the charities, up from 1.7 percent in 2000.

Ex-Norristown Councilman Pleads Guilty (PHI)

By Jeff Shields

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 2, 2006

A former Norristown councilman whose criminal activity inspired a four-year corruption investigation pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion charges.

DOJ_NMG_0031536

Ernest W. Scott Jr., 56, admitted in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia that he hid more than $142,000 in income from his auto tags business between 1999 and 2001. He is scheduled for sentencing Sept. 8; federal guidelines call for a sentence of 12 to 18 months in prison.

He is the third Norristown official to be convicted or plead guilty in the last six weeks in a series of indictments resulting from the U.S. Attorney's investigation. Ex-Mayor Ted LeBlanc was convicted on bribery and tax evasion charges April 18, and former municipal administrator Anthony Biondi pleaded guilty to corruption charges May 12. Scott is currently serving a 6 1/2- to 20-year state sentence. In 2003, Scott, then a member of the Norristown municipal council, admitted to running a corrupt organization that included issuing fake insurance cards and dealing marijuana.

The Montgomery County District Attorney's wiretap evidence from Scott's case was handed over to federal investigators in late 2002. The U.S. Attorney's Office used it to launch a wide-ranging probe that produced indictments against Scott and the man who prepared his taxes, as well as LeBlanc, Biondi, and four businessmen who were awarded contracts with Norristown.

Arthur Farquharson, who prepared Scott's taxes, is serving a 42-month sentence on conspiracy, tax evasion and other charges. Scott and Farquharson "often laughed" about the false tax returns they were filing, prosecutors said in court documents.

Strip Club Owner In Las Vegas Pleads Guilty To Tax Evasion (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 2, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A strip club owner pleaded guilty Thursday to a felony tax evasion charge but avoided any mention of organized crime as the government ended a decade-long federal probe of whether the club was linked to the mob.

Rick Rizzolo, owner of the Crazy Horse Too, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to conspiracy to defraud the government, pledged to sell the club, and agreed not to contest some $17 million in fines, forfeitures and restitution.

The financial settlement includes a $10 million payment to Kirk Henry, a tourist from Olathe, Kan., whose separate civil lawsuit alleges he was paralyzed when he was beaten by club employees in 2001.

The club, using the corporate name The Power Company Inc. and represented by Rizzolo's lawyer, Tony Sgro, pleaded guilty to racketeering and will bear the brunt of the financial penalties.

Under the terms of the deal, the company acknowledged that employees had padded customers' bills and used threats and force to compel customers to pay disputed charges.

Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for Nevada, called Thursday's deals an efficient way to achieve what he called a primary goal of the investigation - to strip Rizzolo of club ownership and bring closure to Henry and his family "for the brutal and tragic extortionate attack at the club."

The plea deal allows the government to veto a sale if the buyer is a close relative or business partner with Rizzolo, a felon or has proven ties with organized crime.

"The corporate plea to racketeering charges acknowledges the serious threat that the Crazy Horse Too has presented to the community," Bogden said.

The plea agreement requires Rizzolo to divest his interest in the white-pillared, Roman-themed club just off the Las Vegas Strip. It prohibits him from owning any other adult entertainment business in the U.S.

Rizzolo, 47, is expected to be sentenced to no more than 16 months in federal prison, prosecutors said. U.S. District Judge Philip Pro set sentencing for Sept. 15.

Rizzolo declined comment as he and Sgro left the courtroom.

"It's a relief to have it behind us," Sgro said.

Rizzolo remained free without bail following his conviction.

The pleas came a day after 16 current and former club employees pleaded guilty to federal charges. Fourteen pleaded guilty to felony tax evasion for failure to report income from tips given to dancers and shared among club employees.

One club manager, Robert D'Apice, 51, pleaded guilty Wednesday to a racketeering charge. A former waitress, Paula McBride, 28, pleaded guilty to perjury. All remain free pending sentencing. None is expected to get more than 16 months in prison. None of those who pleaded guilty this week case admits direct responsibility for the September 2001 beating that left Henry paralyzed from the chest down.

Henry's lawyer, Donald Campbell, did not immediately respond Thursday to requests for comment.

Club executives long denied allegations of ties to organized crime, kickbacks to cab drivers for delivering tourists to the door, and roughing up patrons who protested allegedly inflated credit card bills.

The federal probe of the Crazy Horse Too dates at least to 1995, when Sgro said the FBI submitted documents to obtain authorizations for wiretaps. Las Vegas police raided the club in late 2001, following Henry's injury, and the FBI and local police raided it again in February 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0031537

"Buffalo" Jim Barrier, the flamboyant owner of a neighboring car repair shop who has often clashed with Rizzolo and club employees, called the pleas the end of a "reign of terror" dating to the 1980s.

"It's better than nothing," said Barrier, who said he summoned police after watching one patron beaten to death outside the club in 1995. "It was hard to stop him, but he's a convicted felon."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's New Team Scores A-list Names (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - These are hardly the waning days of the Bush White House, but in some ways, time is running short for major new policy initiatives. And in the inevitable changing of the guard, as top appointees move on, it might seem a tough sell to lure A-listers onto the team. The pay isn't much to write home about, especially for those used to a healthy private-sector paycheck, and the administration remains deeply unpopular with much of the public.

But something has happened on the way to the makeover of Team Bush: The president has managed to bring in some first-string players, at a time when two-term White Houses are typically moving to the bench, analysts say. Exhibits A and B are Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, tapped to take over Treasury, and FOX TV commentator Tony Snow, the new press secretary. Joshua Bolten, the new chief of staff, is also getting high marks for his energetic retooling work - including helping snag his former colleague, Mr. Paulson - and setting his sights on upgrading the White House's communications and domestic policy shops.

"The conventional wisdom - which is sometimes right - is that it gets more and more difficult to hire from the outside," says Stephen Hess, a veteran of the Eisenhower White House and a Brookings Institution scholar. "Time is short, it's not as much fun, policy has already been made. People give up big things to do government service, not just money, but going through confirmation. So you usually just get people from within, and you wind up with the Peter Principle - people rising to their level of mediocrity."

Mr. Bolten's promotion-from-within belies that principle. But in that case, analysts say, it was probably wise for President Bush to bring a familiar face into the chief of staff hot seat - someone with whom he is already personally comfortable and who knows the president.

The Treasury slot is one that Mr. Bush has struggled to fill to his liking from Day 1. His first pick, Paul O'Neill, had a propensity for straying from the company line, and the current secretary, John Snow, failed to convince the public that the economy is strong. As Treasury secretary, Paulson would fill one of the four principal Cabinet slots - the others being State, Defense, and Justice - but under Bush, the Treasury job has not been viewed as a power center. Paulson signed on only after much wooing, and reportedly only after receiving assurances that he would have access to Bush and serve as more than just a cheerleader for the economy. Still, why would someone at the top of the financial world worth a reported $700 million take that leap?

"Paulson's an older guy, probably close to retirement anyway," says Bruce Bartlett, an economist who served under Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. "And there's a certain prestige and cachet - not literally, but figuratively - to sitting in Alexander Hamilton's chair."

The Treasury job also entails lots of global travel and no shortage of serious policy issues, including budget and trade deficits and the rise of China. Party loyalty is another likely factor; Paulson has donated and raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for Bush and other Republicans.

For all the new Bush appointees, too, entering the fray while the president is at a low point means there's no place to go but up. For an outsider like Tony Snow, jumping in now means he is free of the uncomfortable questions his predecessor, Scott McClellan, faced over various controversies, including the Valerie Plame scandal - the case of the CIA employee whose exposed identity has entangled top White house officials. Early on, Mr. McClellan said things that later proved to be untrue.

The early reviews on Mr. Snow have been positive - at least as an articulate, telegenic public persona for an administration under fire.

"Snow had a presence right away," says Paul Light, a public-policy professor at New York University.

How much Snow can prove to be the "full-service press secretary" he says he intends to be remains an open question. For now, that involves fiddling with reporters' malfunctioning tape recorders on the podium during briefings. But will he improve the press corps' access to officials and information? Bush's communications strategy has already been evolving for some time: He has been more open to taking potentially hostile questions in public forums, and more willing to admit mistakes. When USA Today broke the story about data mining of phone calls, Bush was out responding within hours.

"They're all good appointments," Professor Light says, referring to Paulson, Snow, and Bolten. But "I don't think they reshuffle the deck in terms of public approval so late in the term."

Among other recent personnel changes, many have involved old faces taking new assignments: US Trade Representative Rob Portman is now budget director, replacing Bolten. Mr. Portman's deputy, Susan Schwab, has been tapped for the top trade job. Political guru Karl Rove lost his policy portfolio, which was taken over by Joel Kaplan, former deputy budget director. Michael Hayden was easily confirmed to replace Porter Goss at the CIA, after an initial burst of controversy over General Hayden's role in secret surveillance programs from his days running the National Security Agency.

But another recent appointee who would never have gained much notice outside the Beltway did cause a flap. Two days after Karl Zinsmeister was announced May 24 as Bush's domestic policy director, it was revealed that he had doctored some quotes in a profile of himself posted on the website of the magazine he edited, The American Enterprise. Mr. Zinsmeister later told The Washington Post that what he did was "foolish."

Talk continues that Bolten might retool the White House's congressional liaison office and bring more change to the communications team. But discussion that Bush might bring a "graybeard," perhaps a former senator, into the White House as a senior adviser to help improve relations with Congress and project an image of stability has died down. Still, some analysts suggest the retooling so far may not be enough for Republicans eager for major change - especially heading into a tough campaign season.

"I don't think it's the shake-up the Republicans were longing for," says Light. "But it may be enough to stop further conversation for more shake-up."

A Global Warming Believer In Bush Cabinet (AP-Y2)

By John Heilprin

AP2, June 1, 2006

Henry Paulson may find the tightrope he'll be walking as President Bush's Treasury secretary will span a wider gulf than in his current twin jobs as chairman of Goldman Sachs and The Nature Conservancy.

Both the Wall Street powerhouse and the world's richest environmental group look at global warming as a dire threat requiring government-mandated reductions in carbon dioxide and other gases that trap heat in the atmosphere like a greenhouse.

Bush doesn't.

In fact, the president has rejected the Kyoto international global warming treaty that was negotiated during the Clinton administration. And that's the rub for staunch supporters of Bush's environmental policies.

"You do not want someone serving as a Cabinet officer who has a habit of indulging his environmental hobby at the expense of his financial responsibilities," said Tom Borelli of the Free Enterprise Action Fund, a mutual fund set up partly to debunk climate science that accepts the idea of global warming.

Steve McCormick, president of The Nature Conservancy, said Paulson won't shy from sharing his views on global warming in Bush's Cabinet.

"He is unhesitant in expressing his opinion when he thinks it's the right thing to do," McCormick said. "I'm sure that if there's an opportunity for Hank to provide his point of view on this issue, he will take advantage of it."

Paulson, nominated Tuesday by Bush to succeed John Snow at Treasury, took an early interest in nature. He was raised as a Christian Scientist on an Illinois farm, where he still keeps five acres and has let raccoons have the run of the house. Before college he wanted to become a forest or park ranger. Instead he opted for a business career, getting an MBA from Harvard.

He and his wife, Wendy, are both skilled birders. At their house in Illinois, they've raised birds, dogs, cats, raccoons, flying squirrels, lizards, snakes, mice, turtles, frogs and a tarantula.

"Environment is my passion," Paulson told Charlie Rose in a PBS interview in 2004.

At Goldman Sachs, he arranged for a handler with a leather glove to bring in captive-bred birds of prey to show off each year. The handler would come from The Peregrine Fund, another conservation group on which he serves on the board.

In New York, he often stops in Central Park, close to where the couple lives, to go bird-watching while on his way to work. Wendy Paulson volunteers as an environmental education teacher at public schools in Harlem. She also is board chairman of Rare, an international environmental nonprofit group.

Environmentalists normally critical of Bush believe they may have an advocate with access to the president's ear.

"It isn't every day that the Sierra Club finds itself welcoming a nomination to George W. Bush's Cabinet while ultraconservatives decry the move," said Carl Pope, the Sierra Club's executive director.

DOJ_NMG_0031539

"But on issues like global warming, Hank Paulson appears to favor managing risk rather than cooking the books," Pope said. "It is heartening that someone of Mr. Paulson's stature in the financial world is willing to say that immediate action must be taken to combat global warming."

Last year under Paulson's direction, Goldman Sachs issued an eight-page position paper on environmental policy, saying it accepts a scientific consensus, led by United Nations climate experts, that global warming poses one of the greatest threats this century.

Like Bush, the Goldman Sachs statement endorsed a market for businesses to buy and sell rights to emit greenhouse gases, saying it will spur technology advances by companies "that lead to a less carbon-intensive economy." But, it added, "Voluntary action alone cannot solve the climate change problem," a position contrary to the Bush administration's view.

The Nature Conservancy, under Paulson's direction, likewise supports a mandatory approach. It supports legislation by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., to cap U.S. greenhouse gases at 2000 levels, within five years. The Senate defeated the measure last year.

William Reilly, who headed the Environmental Protection Agency in President George H.W. Bush's administration and now chairs the World Wildlife Fund, said Paulson is "very much at home in the outdoors."

Paulson became chairman of The Nature Conservancy in 2004 after The Washington Post a year earlier raised questions about tax breaks claimed by the group's benefactors and private side deals on conservation easements.

He quickly assuaged lawmakers' concerns while also promoting conservation to Asia's business leaders and working with Chinese government officials to set land aside for parks.

"He has a reputation of being a very hands-on and supportive chairman," Reilly said of Paulson's work on behalf of environmentalists. "He was personally very generous and helpful in congressional relations the past year or so."

Paulson's Résumé With China Could Become An Asset For Bush (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Few U.S. business leaders have courted China as assiduously as Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, and those ties could prove crucial as the administration deals with China's emergence as an economic powerhouse.

Mr. Paulson says he has traveled to China more than 70 times in the past 15 years, rubbing shoulders with the country's political, financial and academic elite, both as chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and as a director of the Nature Conservancy, an environmental group.

Mr. Paulson's ties could be pivotal as the U.S. tries to navigate its delicate relationship with China -- a country that puts a premium on loyalty among its foreign friends and where personal credibility counts for more than a corporate title.

"The biggest impediment to a healthy U.S.-China economic relationship has been misgivings about motives, a sense of insecurity about what the other side intends," says Daniel Rosen, principal at China Strategic Advisory and an adviser for international economic policy under President Clinton. Mr. Paulson, he says, "is going to make a big difference in U.S.-China economic relations."

As founding chairman of the advisory board of the School of Economics and Management at Tsinghua University, one of China's top colleges, Mr. Paulson, 60 years old, has established a personal rapport with former Chinese Premier Zhu Rongji, the first dean of the school. The two men sat together at the first two board meetings that Mr. Paulson attended and watched the 2004 U.S. presidential-election returns together on TV in Beijing.

Mr. Paulson's work with the Nature Conservancy brought him together with former Chinese President Jiang Zemin, who spent more than an hour talking about global finance and environmental issues with Mr. Paulson in 2001.

Mr. Paulson's efforts have paid off both for his business and his interest in conservation.

In 2004, Goldman Sachs became the first Wall Street firm to gain Chinese approval to set up a joint-venture investment bank. The bank also has won underwriting business on some of China's largest initial public offerings of stock in the past decade.

Goldman helped underwrite the 2000 IPO of PetroChina Co., in what was then the country's largest stock-market listing, and it was a co-manager of yesterday's Bank of China IPO. In 1998, Chinese leaders invited the Nature Conservancy to work on conservation efforts in Yunnan Province, a region the size of Taiwan that is a favorite project of Mr. Paulson's.

The U.S. has a widening trade deficit with China, which has been a source of friction as the two countries become increasingly interdependent. China is one of the biggest holders of U.S. debt and produces low-cost goods on which the U.S. has come to rely. At the same time, China is transitioning to a market-oriented economy from a socialist one, has a poor human-rights record and maintains relations with nations hostile to the U.S., including Iran and North Korea.

If confirmed, Mr. Paulson would have to deal with China's currency and its value relative to the dollar. Critics complain China manipulates the yuan, keeping the value artificially weak so that it can produce goods more inexpensively and give Chinese companies an advantage in the world market. So far, the Bush administration has resisted efforts to brand China a manipulator, preferring to encourage the country to let its currency strengthen.

Some economists and analysts say Mr. Paulson's appreciation of the immense problems Beijing faces in holding together an economy so powerful yet so vulnerable might temper his approach to the currency issue. At the same time, Mr. Paulson has said publicly that China's leaders recognize the need for a "mutually beneficial" economic and trade relationship, saying in a 2004 television interview PBS's Charlie Rose in 2004 that its leaders are "smart enough to recognize if it's not mutually beneficial it's not going anywhere."

Chinese analysts say that while personal knowledge of China will be a plus, they aren't counting on Mr. Paulson to give Beijing an easy ride. "It is unwise to rely on some personal ties," says Mei Xinyu, a researcher with a think tank under the Ministry of Commerce. "If there is some friction between China and the U.S., I believe he will put the U.S. national interests as a priority," he says.

Mr. Mei says Mr. Paulson's experience in China "would help him to become a better coordinator between the two countries." But he worries that his engagement with China might end up as a liability. "Maybe we should not even bring up his China ties," says Mr. Mei. "If he feels too much pressure from Congress, he might have to adopt unfavorable measures just to show his position."

Bush's Lie (WP)

By Dan Froomkin

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

It's not necessarily a huge deal in itself, but with credibility a paramount issue for the White House these days, it's worth noting that when asked about Treasury Secretary John Snow's future last week, President Bush could easily have ducked the question, or told the truth -- but instead, he chose to lie about it.

Lying is probably the one word mainstream journalists are the most averse to using when recounting what the president said -- even when they know he's not telling the truth. The act of lying requires not just the presentation of false information, but an intention to deceive. Reporters -- and, particularly editors -- are notoriously resistant to ascribe such volition without ironclad evidence.

But there's really no other way to describe what Bush said Thursday. Press secretary Tony Snow's widely-quoted explanation that Bush's statement was in some way "artfully worded" is just plain wrong.

It may not have been an important lie. And there are some mitigating factors: It was, after all, a personnel matter and there was some possibly legitimate concern about the financial markets. But it couldn't be more clear that Bush was being intentionally deceptive.

Here's the transcript of last Thursday's joint press conference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair. Bloomberg White House correspondent Richard Keil, who Bush calls "Stretch," asked the president the following question:

"Has Treasury Secretary Snow given you any indication that he intends to leave his job any time soon?"

Keil also tacked on a question about the economy. But Bush responded to his first question first: "No, he has not talked to me about resignation. I think he's doing a fine job."

At Tuesday's press briefing , spokesman Tony Snow (no relation) confirmed that Bush had offered John Snow's job to Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson several days before the press conference, and the spokesman didn't deny that Bush and his treasury secretary had talked about it.

So was Bush being intentionally deceptive?

Tony Snow's response: "No, he said, 'He's not talked to me about resignation.' That does not mean that there were not other discussions. I mean, it was artfully worded. . . . [T]he one thing you do not want to do in a situation like this is to start speculating about changes before the changes are ready to be made. Those do have impacts on markets, and you have to be responsible and cautious in the way you deal with them."

Several White House correspondents dutifully reported Snow's explanation -- but neglected to note that it doesn't wash.

First of all, Bush's direct answer to the question of whether John Snow had given him any indication that he intended to leave his job was, "No." Hard to get around that.

DOJ_NMG_0031541

And what was supposedly so artful about Bush saying "he has not talked to me about resignation"? The spokesman acknowledged that Bush and Snow had some discussions, and that over some period of time Snow "had made it clear that he wanted to move on."

So is the White House claiming that Bush was on solid ground because, in the direct Bush-Snow discussions, the word "resignation" literally didn't come up? That they talked about Snow's desire to leave and his succession, but not his "resignation"?

In the best-case scenario -- and if you ignore the "No" at the beginning of Bush's statement -- Tony Snow's description of what the president said as "artful" rests on hair-splitting wordplay at least as preposterous as any Clintonian parsing. Worst-case scenario, the spokesman was just spinning like a top -- and the press corps, by and large, bought it.

A History of (Not) Lying

How hard is it for reporters to call what Bush says a lie? Consider Dana Milbank 's near-legendary front-page Washington Post story from October 2002, headlined: "For Bush, Facts Are Malleable."

Milbank wrote that some of Bush's statements "were dubious, if not wrong"; that Bush's "rhetoric has taken some flights of fancy"; that he was guilty of "distortions and exaggerations"; that he had "taken some liberties," "omitted qualifiers," and made assertions that "simply outpace the facts."

But you won't find the word lie in there anywhere. It just won't get by the editors.

Mitigating Factors

One potentially mitigating factor to Bush's lie is that pretty much everyone in the room knew he was lying.

That very morning, Edmund L. Andrews had reported in the New York Times: "John W. Snow has signaled his readiness to step down as Treasury secretary, possibly by the end of June, or as soon as the White House has a candidate to succeed him, say Republicans with ties to the administration."

So here's how Peter Baker and Paul Blustein chose to report on the Bush statement in The Washington Post: "Bush, when asked about the Treasury secretary at his news conference last night, indicated only that he had not spoken directly with Snow and quickly changed the subject to positive economic indicators."

Justified?

One could also argue that it was just an innocent lie, intended simply to temporarily cloak an ongoing personnel matter -- or a justified lie, intended to avoid market disruption.

But the fact remains that Bush and his aides inevitably anticipated a question about Snow would come up. So his response was not an accident.

In other words, here is proof that when Bush feels it is justified, for one reason or another, he is more than capable of lying in response to a direct question, rather than just ducking it.

The obvious follow up question for the White House: When else is lying justified? In times of war, for instance, the commander in chief actually has a responsibility not to divulge secrets that would aid the enemy. But how widely does Bush envision that responsibility? Does it extend to lying, rather than just being discreet? What assurance can Bush give that he's not lying about all sorts of other things?

This is not an incident in a vacuum.

Internet Reaction

Blogger Steve Benen writes: "In the grand scheme of things, examples of Bush's mendacity are so common and disturbing, lying about replacing his Treasury Secretary probably doesn't rank very high. It is, however, an interesting example of the White House spinning a fairly obvious falsehood."

The liberal Think Progress blog has a video clip of the exchange. You can see Bush rubbing his mouth as Keil asks his question. Is that a tell? It's also at 26:44 in the official White House video .

Philadelphia Inquirer reporter Dick Polman headlines his blog post on the subject: "Maybe it all depends on what the definitions of 'no' and 'leaving' and 'resignation' are."

John Dickerson writes in Slate that Bush "could have simply said yes," but instead "answered in a way that was not--to use a White House term--reality-based. . . .

"We allow presidents a measure of obfuscation because in public they must give nuanced answers in some sensitive areas like national security. On personnel matters like this one, the public's right to know is not done grave harm when a president is less than candid. . . .

DOJ_NMG_0031542

"In this case, though, the president jumped over the menu of bland dodges available to him and picked the least truthful statement short of 'Secretary Snow is staying.'"

Dickerson writes: "When a person hears a question, dissects it, and fashions an answer on the spot that deceives, it suggests a lot of practice and comfort with fibbing. This is a problem area for Bush: Fifty-six percent of the country does not find him trustworthy, according to recent polls .

But Dickerson, formerly a White House correspondent for Time, can't quite bring himself to call it a lie: "A hat is artful. A toupee is a lie. Bush's answer was toupee-like. Even if it was technically true that Bush had not talked to Snow about 'resignation,' the president knew his confected statement was deceptive. I'm reluctant to call it a lie, but the president abused our trust."

About That Hire

Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey write for Newsweek that "there is one area where Bush has regained some momentum in his troubled second term: his hiring practices."

Mike Allen writes for Time: "Tuesday's announcement that Goldman Sachs chairman Henry Paulson, who holds the world's most prestigious investment banking job, had agreed to be nominated for Treasury Secretary was a thrilling coup for a White House that has had little cause for rejoicing lately. . . .

"Aides said Bush convinced his quarry that he would have a seat and voice at the table, and the President seemed to underscore that during his Rose Garden announcement by saying that Paulson 'will be my principal advisor on the broad range of domestic and international economic issues that affect the well-being of all Americans.'"

But Daniel Kadlec writes for Time that "there is no guarantee that Paulson can live up to his reputation as a get-it-done boss. 'We'll have to see if he signed a pre-nup,' says Ethan Harris, chief economist at Lehman Brothers. That's a pointed reference to the limited role that Snow was allowed to play in shaping economic policy under Bush, who has preferred to keep his own counsel and that of Vice President Cheney and top adviser Karl Rove. Snow was widely seen as a pitchman for policies that others wrote."

Iranian Turnaround

Michael A. Fletcher and Glenn Kessler write in The Washington Post: "The Bush administration offered for the first time yesterday to join European talks with Iran over its nuclear program, but only if the Iranian government suspends efforts to enrich uranium and reprocess spent nuclear fuel, which the administration calls part of a covert attempt to make bombs. . . .

"The Bush administration previously refused to engage in direct talks with Iran on its nuclear program, preferring to let three European Union nations -- Britain, France and Germany, known as the E.U.-3 -- conduct negotiations. But Germany lately has increasingly urged Washington to deal with Tehran directly, as have a growing roster of foreign policy experts and at least two U.S. senators."

In a news analysis for The Post, Kessler calls it "perhaps the biggest foreign policy shift" of the Bush presidency, coming from "an administration stocked with officials who have made little secret of their desire to overthrow the government in Tehran."

David E. Sanger writes in the New York Times: "During the past month, according to European officials and some current and former members of the Bush administration, it became obvious to Mr. Bush that he could not hope to hold together a fractious coalition of nations to enforce sanctions -- or consider military strikes on Iranian nuclear sites -- unless he first showed a willingness to engage Iran's leadership directly over its nuclear program and exhaust every nonmilitary option."

But wait. Here's what I suspect is the real story, deeper in Sanger's article: " '[Vice President Dick] Cheney was dead set against it,' said one former official who sat in many of those meetings. 'At its heart, this was an argument about whether you could isolate the Iranians enough to force some kind of regime change.' But three officials who were involved in the most recent iteration of that debate said Mr. Cheney and others stepped aside -- perhaps because they read Mr. Bush's body language, or perhaps because they believed Iran would scuttle the effort by insisting that the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty gives it the right to develop nuclear fuel. . . .

"In the end, said one former official who has kept close tabs on the debate, 'it came down to convincing Cheney and others that if we are going to confront Iran, we first have to check off the box' of trying talks."

You know what this reminds me of a bit? That Blair-Bush summit in the weeks before the invasion of Iraq. Bush came out of the meeting ostensibly seeking a second United Nations resolution. But in fact, as Don Van Natta Jr. wrote for the New York Times in March, Bush was so dead-set on war that he was secretly talking about "ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire, or assassinating Mr. Hussein."

Haditha Watch

DOJ_NMG_0031543

Thomas E. Ricks writes for The Washington Post: "The U.S. military investigation of how Marine commanders handled the reporting of events last November in the Iraqi town of Haditha, where troops allegedly killed 24 Iraqi civilians, will conclude that some officers gave false information to their superiors, who then failed to adequately scrutinize reports that should have caught their attention, an Army official said yesterday. . . .

"President Bush, in his first public comment on the Haditha incident, said yesterday that if an investigation finds evidence of wrongdoing, those involved will be punished. 'I am troubled by the initial news stories,' Bush said after a meeting with Rwandan President Paul Kagame."

The investigation "is likely to be explosive on Capitol Hill, because it focuses on questions that have haunted the Bush administration and the U.S. military since the scandal over abuse at Abu Ghraib prison emerged two years ago."

Here's the text of Bush's remarks.

Zinsmeistered

Zachary A. Goldfarb wrote in The Washington Post on Tuesday: "Karl Zinsmeister, President Bush's new domestic policy adviser, acknowledged he did something wrong when he took a newspaper profile of himself, altered quotes and text, and then posted it on a Web site without noting the changes."

For links, see the very end of my Friday column . One of the quotes Zinsmeister altered was his assertion that "People in Washington are morally repugnant, cheating, shifty human beings."

The Washington Post editorial board yesterday coined a new term for doctored: "Zinsmeistered."

"White House press secretary Tony Snow said Mr. Zinsmeister wanted 'to set the record straight' but did so in an 'unartful' way. Other terms -- perhaps even some of Mr. Zinsmeister's own adjectives -- come to our mind."

Taheri Watch

Paul Kiel writes for TPM Muckracker: "Two weeks ago, Amir Taheri published an op-ed in Canada's National Post about an Iranian law that forced Jews to wear a yellow stripe. The story, reminiscent of Nazi Germany, quickly provoked outrage, but was just as quickly revealed to be a total fabrication . It also ran in the New York Post .

"Apparently this is just the sort of reliable advice that President Bush needs. Yesterday, Taheri had a face-to-face with the President as one of a small group of 'experts' on Iraq that visited the White House.

"According to Press Secretary Tony Snow, the experts were invited to the White House for their 'honest opinions' on Iraq."

New Staff Secretary

Bush swears in White House Staff Secretary Brett Kavanaugh to the U.S. Court of Appeals this afternoon in the Rose Garden. Yesterday, he announced Kavanaugh's replacement: Raul F. Yanes, currently the general counsel for the White House budget office, formerly senior counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and before that an associate counsel at the White House, also under Gonzales.

So not exactly new blood.

Yanes, in fact, was one of two White House lawyers coordinating the initial White House response to the investigation into the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Marriage Amendment Watch

Fred Barnes writes in the Weekly Standard about how a Senate vote on the proposed amendment to the Constitution to restrict marriage to a man and woman is coming up next week.

"And President Bush, despite his wife Laura's admonition that the marriage issue ought to be kept out of politics, plans to host a pro-amendment event at the White House and speak out in favor of the amendment."

Barnes writes that Bush "will appear on June 5 in the Rose Garden before a gathering of amendment supporters and, a White House official says, 'strongly support' the amendment. The president has rarely mentioned the amendment in the past. The choice of the Rose Garden as a venue means he is raising the marriage amendment to a higher level on his agenda, his wife's advice notwithstanding."

Missing Man

Matthew Mosk writes in The Washington Post: "President Bush shuttled into Maryland last night to help the state Republican Party raise more than $1 million for a number of high-profile 2006 races, but only one of the state's two marquee Republican candidates joined him.

DOJ_NMG_0031544

"Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. stood on a riser shoulder to shoulder with the president, but the party's leading candidate for an open U.S. Senate seat in Maryland, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, was absent. Steele had a scheduling conflict, campaign spokesman Doug Heye said."

Here's the text of Bush's remarks.

No New Contrition

My Friday column was largely about how the regrets Bush expressed in his press conference didn't really reflect any new contrition -- in spite of the continuing insistence by the press corps that it was some sort of watershed moment.

Several readers e-mailed me to call my attention to one thing I missed. Here's Richard Wolffe of Newsweek with Keith Olbermann on MSNBC later that night: "But of course, it is very rehearsed, everything from the mannerisms you saw, the upwards glance up at the ceiling for inspiration. And for me, the big giveaway was at the end of that answer--I don't know if you could see it on camera, but the president flashed a big grin to those of us sitting in the front rows. It didn't seem that he was quite as contrite as his performance."

And yes, you can actually see that grin at the 51:40 mark of the White House video .

Predictions Redux

David S. Broder writes in his Washington Post opinion column: "In its September 2004 issue , Washington Monthly magazine invited 16 smart political observers -- a mix of Republicans, Democrats and independents -- to write short essays predicting what would happen if George Bush won a second term.

"The answers, understandably enough, were all over the lot. But no one suggested that one-third of the way through his second term Bush would have suffered the political and policy reverses that he has actually experienced. . . .

"The one commentator who got it exactly right was Kevin Drum , who runs the magazine's blog. 'What do we have to look forward to if George W. Bush is elected to a second term?' he asked. 'One word: scandal.' "

Worst Ever?

David Lightman writes for the Hartford Courant: "A Quinnipiac Poll released today gives President Bush one more reason to be concerned about his approval numbers: Lots of voters not only think he's doing a lousy job, but they rate him as the worst president since World War II.

"And to add to the sting: They say Bill Clinton was one of the best."

Here are the complete results .

Secretary, Protect Yourself (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

To: Henry Paulson, Treasury secretary-designate

So you decided to take the job, after all. It's no surprise that they wanted you. As the joke that's making the rounds puts it, they're so desperate they're scraping the top of the barrel. But most of us are surprised that you accepted.

No doubt you received assurances that like Robert Rubin, but unlike your predecessors in this administration, you'll get to be a real Treasury secretary. And you probably believe that those assurances can be trusted, if only because the Bush people currently need you a lot more than you need them.

But Paul O'Neill, who received tremendous acclaim from the news media when he was appointed Treasury secretary, must have believed the same thing. The fact is that you'll be treated well as long as you are perceived as someone who adds credibility with people outside the administration, and not a moment longer. Yet I'm sure you're already under pressure to say things that will fatally undermine your credibility.

Before we get to the specifics, you need to disabuse yourself of any illusion that this administration rewards loyalty. Nobody was more loyal than Larry Lindsey, President Bush's first top economist. Yet when Mr. Lindsey blurted out an inconvenient truth — that the Iraq war was likely to cost a fair amount of money (although we now know that his estimate was only a small fraction of the true cost) — he was fired.

And not just fired; he was fired in as insulting a fashion as possible, including snide remarks about his personal appearance. (White House aides made a point of telling reporters that Mr. Bush complained about Mr. Lindsey's failure to exercise.)

So what are you being asked to do that will undermine your credibility? Right now, I'd guess, you're being pressed to support the administration's illusions about how the economy is doing.

Americans are very unhappy with the state of the economy. According to Gallup, only 4 percent of the public considers the economy "excellent," and only 25 percent considers it "good." And there's good reason for this unhappiness. Although profits and C.E.O. compensation have soared, most workers are significantly worse off than they were a year ago.

The official line, however, is that it's a great economy, but that Americans for some reason aren't hearing the good news (just like they aren't hearing the good news from Iraq). Mr. Bush — who, by the way, isn't the affable guy you may have thought you met — doesn't seem as if he realizes that the economy isn't all that good; in his public appearances he seems peeved that he isn't getting credit for a great economy. And he expects you to explain to working Americans that the trouble they're having paying their bills is just a figment of their imagination.

Moreover, if past experience is any guide, you won't be pressured just to spin on the administration's behalf, you'll be pressured to lie.

Look at what happened to Edward Lazear, the chairman of the president's Council of Economic Advisers. Last month Mr. Lazear and another member of the council published an op-ed article in The Wall Street Journal containing this astonishing assertion: "The president's tax cuts have made the tax code more progressive, which also narrows the difference in take-home earnings."

Now, you can play games with the meaning of the word "progressive," but by any measure the Bush tax cuts have made differences in after-tax earnings wider, not narrower. And just like that, any credibility that Mr. Lazear, a well-regarded academic without a prior reputation as a political hack, may have brought to the job was gone.

What will they ask you to lie about? Maybe you'll be asked to declare that we're on track toward a balanced budget. Or maybe you'll be asked to lie about environmental policy. Some of the administration's right-wing supporters opposed your selection because you are known as a supporter of action against global warming, so the political types might want you to throw them a bone by endorsing the administration's failure to do anything about the threat.

Right now, you're being flattered. You have a natural urge to be a team player. But if you play the game your new bosses want you to play, your credibility with the public will evaporate in no time at all. And when you're no longer useful to your new friends, you'll be tossed aside.

President Celebrates Judge's Swearing-in (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Associated Press, June 1, 2006

President Bush hosted a Rose Garden swearing-in ceremony Thursday for long-stalled judicial nominee Brett Kavanaugh, a White House lawyer who once worked for independent counsel Kenneth Starr's investigations of President Clinton.

Kavanaugh won Senate confirmation to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit late last month on a 57-36 vote after a three-year wait. It was a victory for Bush's drive to place a more conservative stamp on the nation's courts.

Presidents usually are not present when new judges take their oaths. But Kavanaugh, whose nomination was opposed by Democrats, has worked at the White House for the past five years — in the White House counsel's office and as staff secretary.

"I call upon the United States Senate to meet its responsibility to give every nominee a fair hearing and a timely up or down vote," Bush told the 120 guests, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

Bush highlighted Kavanaugh's background, saying he had clerked for judges Walter Stapleton and Alex Kozinski on the appeals court and for Justice Anthony Kennedy at the Supreme Court, who gave him the oath.

"Thirty-one years ago today, a young Anthony Kennedy took the oath to be a court of appeals judge," Kavanaugh said. "Since then he has taught all of his law clerks that the Constitution of the United States is a compact between generations that must be preserved and revered and cherished and passed on. I feel that lesson very powerfully today."

In addition to clerking for judges, Kavanaugh was a partner in a national law firm, worked in the solicitor general's office and was an associate independent counsel under Starr. Kavanaugh worked on both the long-running Whitewater case and the 1998 Clinton impeachment case.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has called Kavanaugh a political operative who is the least experienced and most partisan appointee to the court in decades.

Democrats also highlighted the American Bar Association's recent downgrading of its rating of Kavanaugh from "highly qualified" to "qualified." Bush countered, saying that in three separate evaluations, all 42 ABA reviewers rated Kavanaugh as "well-qualified" or "qualified" to serve on the federal bench.

Senator Reid Admits Erring On Ethics Rule (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0031546

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 1 — Senator Harry Reid's office acknowledged Wednesday night that he had misstated the ethics rules governing his acceptance of free boxing tickets and had decided to avoid taking such gifts in the future.

Mr. Reid, a Nevada Democrat, is the Senate minority leader. His office said that Mr. Reid still believed it was "entirely permissible" for him to accept ringside seats for three professional boxing matches in 2004 and 2005 from the Nevada Athletic Commission but that he had decided to avoid doing so again.

The Associated Press reported Monday that Mr. Reid had accepted the free seats from the Nevada commission as it was trying to convince him that there was no need for a federal boxing commission. Mr. Reid voted to set up a federal commission, but the measure was never enacted.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, joined Mr. Reid for one of the fights and decided to reimburse $1,400 for his seat.

Senate ethics rules warn against taking gifts if the giver may be trying to influence official action.

Mr. Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said Wednesday night that Mr. Reid "misspoke when he said the rule applies only to senators who represent the state agency."

Several ethics experts criticized Mr. Reid's rationale that he felt obligated to take the tickets to ensure that boxing was being properly conducted in his home state.

"He is no more obligated to go to boxing matches than he is to a Celine Dion concert in Vegas," said Melanie Sloan, a former Justice Department prosecutor and head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

Hastert Is Longest-serving GOP Speaker (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, June 1, 2006

Rep. Dennis Hastert, who vaulted out of political obscurity when Newt Gingrich resigned as speaker of the House more than seven years ago, on Thursday became the longest-serving Republican speaker in history.

Hastert, 64, surpasses fellow Illinoisan Joseph "Uncle Joe" Cannon, a pugnacious politician who ruled the House from November 1903 until the Democrats regained the majority in March, 1911.

"The House has achieved unprecedented success under his leadership," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., noting GOP successes in Medicare, education and tax cut legislation. "It's no wonder Denny has become the longest-serving Republican speaker in history."

A former high school history teacher and wrestling coach, Hastert was elected to Congress from a heavily Republican district west of Chicago in 1986. A low-key conservative with ties to former GOP leader Bob Michel, also from Illinois, Hastert was appointed chief deputy whip in 1995 after the Republicans, under new House Speaker Gingrich, gained the majority in the House for the first time in four decades.

Gingrich abruptly resigned as speaker in 1998 after Republicans fared poorly in the midterm elections. The heir apparent, Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., shortly thereafter admitted to an extramarital affair and resigned his seat.

The Republican rank-and-file, looking for a change from the high-profile Gingrich, bypassed better-known but more controversial people, including then-Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, and Whip Tom DeLay, R-Texas. They chose Hastert as their next leader, in January 1999.

The longest-serving speaker is Democrat Sam Rayburn of Texas, who served more than 17 years, with two breaks when Republicans were in power, from 1940 through the early 1960s. Like Cannon, Rayburn has a House office building named after him. The longest-serving speaker without a break was Thomas "Tip" O'Neill, D-Mass., House leader from 1977 through 1987.

Medicare Posts 30 Procedures' Prices (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, June 2, 2006

How much Medicare pays for hip replacements, cardiac surgery and 28 other procedures in each of the nation's counties went online Thursday, in the government's first effort to post hospital price information for consumers.

The move comes as employers and others who pay the nation's $1.9 trillion health care tab encourage patients to be more like savvy shoppers when it comes to medical care, currently a difficult prospect because so little comparative information on cost and quality is available.

DOJ_NMG_0031547

That the federal government, the nation's largest purchaser of health care, is posting such information on its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services website is important, employer groups say.

"The days of medical costs and the difference in health care quality being invisible to consumers are over," says Peter Lee of the San Francisco-based Pacific Business Group on Health, although he says it may still take time to get truly useful consumer information.

Officials at Medicare, which serves about 43 million elderly and disabled people, say releasing the data is a first step in what they hope will be a broad effort by both the government and the private sector to publish price and quality information. The cost data join some hospital quality data on Medicare's website. In the private sector, a few insurers have made limited cost and quality information available to their members.

"Our ultimate vision is that patients will be able to compare hospitals and physicians on cost, quality and consumer satisfaction," said Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt.

Even so, the cost data posted by Medicare won't be useful to most consumers, because:

·The data show the range of what Medicare pays for procedures in each county, not what those with private insurance or the uninsured might pay.

·They do not show hospital-specific price data.

·They do not show what an individual Medicare member pays, although savvy beneficiaries could estimate based on the program's typical co-payments and deductibles.

The newly released data, however, do give consumers hospital-specific information on how many of each of the 30 procedures or treatments each hospital did in 2005. That's important because studies have shown that, in general, the more experience a facility has with a procedure, the better the outcome for the patient.

Data expected to be released later this year will include countywide cost ranges for various procedures paid for by Medicare in outpatient surgery clinics and doctors' offices.

Even though the information is Medicare-specific, Leavitt said it may prove useful for the uninsured, who could use it as a baseline for negotiating with hospitals on the cost of their care.

Tee Times And Ringside Seats: Congress Likes Its Freebies (USAT)

USA Today, June 2, 2006

At a trial unfolding this week, jurors have been treated to some enlightening testimony about the way Washington works. A former aide to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, recounted how he, Ney, lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others went on a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002 aboard a Gulfstream jet arranged by Abramoff.

The trip, documented in photos of the group in front of a jet and on the famed St. Andrews golf course, is now a major liability for the congressman from Ohio, who's under investigation and faces a tough re-election bid. It also provides a window on the sorry state of congressional ethics.

If the golf junket was legal at all, it would have been because it employed two commonly used ruses for skirting ethics rules: the special interest-funded vacation dressed up as a fact-finding mission, and the use of a private jet at a fraction of its true cost.

Here's how Ney's aide, Neil Volz, described the system when he worked on Capitol Hill: "I was given tickets to sporting events, concerts, free food, free meals. In return I gave special treatment to my lobbying buddies."

The testimony and the photos do not make for a pretty picture.

So what is the response from Congress? Well, not much. In separate "lobbying reform" bills crawling through the legislative process, the House of Representatives and Senate leave many of the loopholes allowing members and their staff to accept gifts from lobbyists well above the stated $50 limit. These include sham trips, bargain rates on jets, and premium seats for major sporting events and concerts.

Neither bill would create an office capable of enforcing the few ethics restrictions that do exist.

Perhaps the most comical element of the legislation is the single limit the House version would place on members flying on private jets. The lobbyist whose employer provided the jet would not be allowed to be on board. That would allow the House member to enjoy his indulgence in peace. But don't think for a moment that the lobbyist would have any trouble getting face time.

The legislation has one objective: to make it appear as if a scandal-racked Congress is doing something in an election year. But the fact is that many members of Congress feel cruelly cheated by the $165,200 annual salary they have voted for themselves and harbor a sense of entitlement to supplement their incomes with freebies.

How else to explain behavior like that of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., After it was revealed that he had accepted ringside boxing tickets from the Nevada Athletic Commission over a two-year period in which the commission was trying to influence pending legislation, Reid first said he saw no problem. Then, on Wednesday, he said he did nothing wrong but wouldn't do it again.

In fact, there is a problem in his behavior, and in that of many of his colleagues. Perhaps the biggest, however, is that so few seem to see that there is a problem.

OTHER NEWS:

Economy Appears To Be Decelerating (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy is cooling from the torrid pace of earlier this year, with home construction, housing price gains and manufacturing activity starting to slow, according to government and private data released Thursday.

Factories are paying more for materials. Labor costs are rising more slowly than previously estimated — bad news for workers who have seen wages lag but a signal that inflation pressures aren't mounting.

Economists said the reports add credence to the Federal Reserve's prediction that the economy will slow in the second half of the year but added it's not yet clear where inflation is headed.

"It creates a real dilemma for the Fed, because it can see growth slowing, and it can believe at some point in the future slowing growth is going to bring inflation down again, but how long can it wait?" said Nigel Gault of Global Insight.

"The markets have gotten much more nervous … the way ahead is much less clear," Gault said.

The Fed is debating whether to keep raising rates to combat inflation or take a breather to assess the impact of 16 rate increases since mid-2004. The Fed has raised its target for short-term rates to 5% from a historic low of 1%.

Core inflation, which excludes food and energy, is slightly above the Fed's 1%-2% comfort zone.

In a sign of the slowdown, construction spending dipped 0.1% in April, as residential construction dropped by 1.1%, the largest decline in more than two years, the Commerce Department said. Commercial real estate is booming as housing slows.

So far, the housing slowdown is moderate. The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight says average home prices rose 12.5% from the first quarter of 2005 to the same period in 2006.

Price appreciation in the first three months of 2006 was 2%, or an annualized rate of about 8.1%. While that's still robust, it shows the heady price gains of the past several years could be tapering off as interest rates rise.

"Housing prices (are) still growing stronger than some might have expected," said OFHEO acting Director James Lockhart. "Price growth is moderating in some parts of the country, particularly in areas where prices have been rising the most."

In a separate report, the Labor Department said productivity, or output per worker, rose at a healthy annual rate of 3.7% January through March. Salaries and benefits inched up 1.6%, after falling 0.6% in the fourth quarter of 2005. Wage gains had been estimated at a 2.5% clip.

The private Institute of Supply Management said manufacturing activity expanded less quickly in May than in April, while prices paid surged to the highest level since Hurricane Katrina hit last year.

Data Indicate Economy Is Cooling (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Readings on home prices and manufacturing activity offered fresh evidence that the economy is cooling after a blazing start to the year.

Home prices rose 2.0% in the first quarter, the slowest such pace in two years, according to the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. As with other data suggesting a moderate slowdown in the housing market, the Ofheo report shows that the rate of appreciation has gradually declined since peaking last year. Still, the rate of growth in house-price appreciation has retreated only from extraordinary highs, and in the first quarter prices were 12.5% more than a year ago.

A second report showed that the manufacturing sector experienced slower growth. The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said its index of manufacturing activity fell to 54.4 in May from 57.3 in April.

Lower readings on new orders, production and employment contributed to the decline, which left the index at its lowest point in nearly a year.

Together, the figures point to an economy shifting into a slower period of expansion after a robust first quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0031549

"The rate of growth is slowing a little bit but we have to realize that we're coming from a first quarter when growth was very strong," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the ISM index and also serves as Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director. "At the end of the day, business spending is staying quite strong and the consumer is the wild card."

Because consumer purchases drive most economic growth, one of the major concerns among economists has been that the softening housing market and high gas prices will cause consumers to curtail their spending. Yesterday's Ofheo report alleviated some concerns on the housing side.

"These data show average housing prices still growing stronger than some might have expected," said James Lockhart, the office's acting director. If prices keep rising, consumers can continue tapping the equity built up in their houses to fuel other forms of spending.

Ofheo is considered the best authority on house prices because it best tracks the changing value of individual homes over time. Its index incorporates data from refinancings as well as purchase transactions. When refinancing data are removed, the index showed purchase prices up 10% in the first quarter compared with a year earlier.

Other measures have shown even less appreciation, and economists at UBS Securities LLC noted that the Ofheo index doesn't include condo and co-op prices, which have experienced some of the sharpest pullbacks.

Regardless of the measure used, however, a consistent theme of gradual cooling in the housing market emerges. "Increasing sales inventories are apparently giving buyers greater bargaining power, while increasing interest rates are dampening demand," said Patrick Lawler, chief economist at Ofheo.

In other signs of the housing slowdown, the Commerce Department said construction spending dropped 0.1% in April as residential home building fell 1.1%. Separately, the National Association of Realtors said its pending-home-sales index, a measure of future activity in the sector, was at 111.8 in April, down 3.7% from March and 11.7% from a year ago.

The ISM reading of 54.4 in May still points to growth for manufacturers, but several components provided reasons for concern. The new-orders index, a barometer of future production, fell to its lowest point in a year.

The employment index fell to 52.9 in May from 55.8 in April, raising more concerns about future growth. The index for prices, an indicator of potential inflationary pressures, jumped to 77.0 last month, its highest mark since the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina late last summer.

Other data released yesterday offered a more comforting signal on inflation. The Labor Department revised upward to 3.7% its measure of nonfarm business productivity in the first quarter, as output jumped 6.5% and hours worked rose 2.7%. Unit labor costs rose 1.6% during the first quarter.

1st-Quarter Home Prices Rise, But At Slower Pace (WP)

By Sandra Fleishman

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

U.S. home prices continued to rise in the first quarter of the year, but in another sign of a cooling market the pace slowed from the last quarter of 2005, according to a report released yesterday.

Home prices nationally were 12.5 percent higher in the first quarter than a year earlier, according to the survey released by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. In 2005, the average home price jumped about 13.3 percent.

The typical home's value, though, rose only 2 percent in the first three months of 2006, an annual rate of 8.1 percent. That is about a percentage point below the rate from the fourth quarter of 2005 and the lowest quarterly rate of increase since the first quarter of 2004.

Also, for the first time since late 2002, average home prices fell for the quarter in two states, Iowa and South Dakota.

"These data show average housing prices still growing stronger than some might have expected," said James B. Lockhart III, acting director of OFHEO, which regulates mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. "They do indicate, however, that price growth is moderating in some parts of the country, particularly in areas where prices have been rising the most."

In the Washington area, price growth slowed but still far exceeded the national rate. The District, which is counted as a state in the report, came in fifth in the nation, with 20.8 percent growth for the 12 months and 1.5 percent for the quarter. That compares with about 23.4 percent growth in 2005.

In the market that includes the District, Northern Virginia, and Prince George's, Charles and Calvert counties in Maryland, and Jefferson County in West Virginia, the average home price increased 21.8 percent for the 12 months and 2.4 percent for the quarter. In the Montgomery County-Frederick County market defined by the Census Bureau, it was up 18.4 percent for the 12 months and 2.5 percent for the quarter.

For the fourth quarter of 2005, prices in those two markets had increased at annual rates of 24 percent and 20 percent respectively.

Economists said the data were consistent with previous reports of slowing sales of new and existing homes and rising inventories. Many blame rising mortgage rates and a five-year run-up in prices for hurting affordability and sales.

"We've seen substantial home price appreciation in the last five years, particularly on both coasts, that has begun to pinch affordability, especially for first-time home buyers," said Frank E. Nothaft, chief economist for Freddie Mac. As mortgage rates have moved up for the past six months, housing starts, single-family home sales and prices have moderated, he said. "It's clear that it peaked somewhere during the fall of 2005."

Freddie Mac reported yesterday that rates on 30-year, fixed-rate mortgages averaged 6.67 percent, up from 6.62 percent last week. Rates have not been that high since June 2002.

The OFHEO survey is considered the best gauge of prices because it compares prices of the same houses sold or refinanced over time.

Part of the reason prices have held up is that even though homes are taking longer to move, sellers are holding out for their asking prices, said Patrick Lawler, OFHEO chief economist, and "largely they are getting them."

Prices continued to rise the most in vacation areas, such as Arizona, Florida and the Pacific Northwest, although the growth is also slowing there, Lawler said.

The slowing in prices doesn't surprise Donna Evers, head of Evers & Co. Real Estate Inc. in Northwest Washington. She said "prices have more or less leveled off" as the inventory of homes for sale has grown.

Inventory, Evers said, has reached numbers not seen since 1999. But she said sellers should not worry: "1999 was a boom year."

Why Those Pay Hikes Are Not Going Very Far (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, June 2, 2006

BAINBRIDGE TOWNSHIP, OHIO - As a restaurant manager at Zeppe's Pizzeria, Kym Costello says she's earning good money selling pizzas, subs, and some of the best French fries on the east side of Cleveland.

As a college student who drives 35 miles to class each day, she's also spending a lot - and she reckons her income is not keeping pace with the rising costs of living.

It's a common quandary in today's economy.

On average, American paychecks are rising, as employers offer higher salaries to attract and retain staff. At the same time, inflation has been heating up, burning a bigger hole in consumers' pockets.

The result is a dynamic that's challenging for workers and potentially risky for the economy.

Some analysts say now is the time for workers to enjoy an overdue improvement in their living standards. But others fear a wage-price spiral, in which pay raises ripple into the costs of goods and services, making no one better off.

"Wages are accelerating. I think that's a good thing," says Ken Mayland, president of ClearView Economics in Pepper Pike, Ohio. "But what the [Federal Reserve] will worry about is that these wage increases will just get caught up in more price increases."

That hasn't happened yet. But once a spiral starts, it can be hard to stop, experts say. Concern has risen in recent weeks. Two gauges of inflation have edged up beyond the Federal Reserve's comfort zone - with higher than 2 percent annual growth in "core" prices, which exclude food and energy.

Meanwhile, wages seem to be picking up, although a report Thursday suggested some softening of the trend. The Department of Labor said hourly compensation - which includes benefits as well as wages - rose at a 5.3 percent pace in the first three months of the year, but fell at a 0.9 percent annual pace in the final quarter of 2005.

The Labor Department's April jobs report, released a month ago, showed the sharpest rise in average hourly earnings during the current economic expansion: a 3.8 percent jump from the same month a year earlier.

Fed policymakers will be watching the May jobs report, due out Friday, for further signals on whether they need to boost short-term interest rates for the 17th time when they meet June 28 and 29. A weaker-than-expected number on job creation, for example, could temper worries that a tight labor market is fueling inflation.

"The Fed has a lot of credibility as an inflation fighter now," says Dr. Mayland. "But if it does anything to reduce that credibility, then the economy would pay the price of that for a long time."

Long-term interest rates, for example, could rise as investors demand a premium to cover expectations of higher future inflation.

Still, it isn't necessarily inflationary when wages rise faster than prices. Rising "real" (inflation-adjusted) wages are the norm in a healthy economy.

DOJ_NMG_0031551

Employers typically cover the cost of pay raises by improving productivity. A reduction in corporate profits, now at record levels, is another way to pay for wage hikes. It's when pay raises lead to price hikes, and then to expectations of further gains in wages and prices, that a spiral gets going. Some current straws in the wind suggest that the risk is real enough:

· An April survey of small businesses found that more are raising prices - and about the same number say they are hiking wages.

· Companies are working harder to fill positions. With the unemployment rate down to 4.7 percent nationwide, a survey of 100 human-resource executives in April found that one-fourth of them reported a "severe" shortage of workers, according to Challenger, Gray & Christmas, an outplacement firm based in Chicago.

· Expectations of inflation have risen, according to consumer surveys and signals embedded in bond prices on Wall Street. This is important because such expectation can, by itself, help fuel inflation.

Still, not all signs point toward higher inflation.

By some measures, the labor market does not appear to be overly tight. The number of new jobs added each month hasn't been far in excess of the number of new workers entering the labor force, for example. A nationwide index of help-wanted ads has fallen in all nine regions tracked by the Conference Board in New York.

Meanwhile, consumers remain very sensitive to prices, as interest-rate hikes and flatter home prices dampen their spending power.

"Everything is in the hand of the consumer," says Rajeev Dhawan, director of the economic forecasting center at Georgia State University's J. Mack Robinson College of Business in Atlanta.

Consumer spending is much needed here in Ohio, where the pace of job creation is among the slowest in the nation. Ohio has just 0.5 percent more jobs now than it did a year ago, compared with job growth of 1.5 percent nationwide.

But at Zeppe's Pizzeria, with a "drivers wanted" sign in the window, business is brisk enough to support some raises.

"My pay here has gone up a lot since I started," says Ms. Costello, who is majoring in chemistry at Lake Erie College in Painesville, Ohio.

If the economy runs smoothly and the Fed does its job just right, she and other workers stand to benefit from more raises as the job market strengthens. Living standards should rise.

That would be a welcome reward for workers. Average hourly earnings, at $16.68 last month, are below the peak they reached in 2003, after adjusting for inflation. "It's been remarkable how little the wages have moved" as the current expansion has gained traction, says John Challenger, president of Challenger, Gray & Christmas.

Statistics for compensation, which is a broader measure of pay, appear to be brighter because benefits are included. But today's workers are reaping smaller rewards from rising productivity than they did in the past. In the 1960s and 1970s, hourly compensation grew 1.9 percent a year, adjusted for inflation.

From 1985-2004, real hourly compensation grew just 1.3 percent a year, even though per-hour output was rising at a similar pace of more than 2 percent.

One reason for the gap, economists say, is globalization, which has put downward pressure on American wages. Several billion workers are now part of a global labor market.

As labor has lost clout, investors have gained. More of the gains from productivity go to shareholders, in the form of higher profits, rather than to workers.

Now an important question is how much worker clout will bounce back.

Salaries at small businesses have risen for eight consecutive months, according to SurePayroll, a Chicago-area firm that processes paychecks nationwide. The April rise alone showed a salary gain of 0.93 percent over March.

Worker output has been improving, up to a 3.7 percent annual pace, according to the first-quarter number released by the Labor Department Thursday. That could bode well for noninflationary wage growth, as long as there's no recession. "I'm optimistic," Mayland says.

Stocks Surge As Inflation Fears Ease On Factory Data, Falling Oil Prices (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

As June replaced May, hope replaced fear, and stocks moved strongly higher.

A fresh batch of economic reports spurred hopes that inflationary pressure might be easing, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average, which has been under pressure for almost a month, rose 91.97 points, or 0.82%, to 11260.28. It is up 5.1% this year.

Investors shifted money to stocks they had fled. The Nasdaq Composite Index, whose beleaguered technology stocks had pushed it into the red for 2006, surged 1.88%, or 40.98 points, to 2219.86. It is up for the year again, by 0.7%.

DOJ_NMG_0031552

Chain stores reported strong May sales, belying an earlier lukewarm report from Wal-Mart. The reports softened fears that high gasoline costs were stifling consumer spending.

A wide variety of commodity prices fell, including oil and gold, easing inflation fears. Crude-oil futures fell 95 cents to $70.34 a barrel, while gold fell $14.90 to $627.60 a troy ounce.

A report on May manufacturing activity was lighter than expected, easing fears that a hot economy would force the Federal Reserve to push short-term interest rates higher at its meeting June 28 and 29. New jobless claims for last week came in stronger than expected, also helping calm inflation fears.

"The inflation scare has settled down a little bit," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at Greenwich, Conn., brokerage firm Execution LLC. "As long as there are no negative surprises on some of the economic numbers, I think the market is still in decent shape."

The reduced inflation fears pushed bond prices higher, sending yields lower. Falling yields help hold down a variety of market interest rates, which also was good news for stocks.

Investors now will be examining this morning's much-awaited May hiring report, looking for signs of inflationary pressure in this indicator, which is said to be much-watched by the Fed.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, whose 3.1% May decline was its worst monthly drop in two years, rose 1.23%, or 15.62 points, to 1285.71, up 3% for 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.20%, or 0.43 point, to 214.74.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.42 billion shares, as 2,566 stocks rose and 720 fell.

Bond prices gained. The 10-year Treasury note rose 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 5.108%. The 30-year bond was up 12/32 to yield 5.201%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 112.70 yen, up from 112.54, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2799 from $1.2816.

Economic Reports Push Stocks Higher (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 2, 2006

NEW YORK — After a dismal May, stocks rose sharply in the first day of June trading.

The spark: a batch of economic reports that flashed benign inflation readings, which data-watching investors interpreted as a sign the Federal Reserve will have some more wiggle room in deciding whether to raise its target for short-term interest rates when it meets in late June. A strong retail sales report for May, bucking the cautious comments from Wal-Mart earlier in the week, also gave stocks a boost Thursday.

The Dow Jones industrials climbed 91.97 points, or 0.8%, to 11,260.28. Broader stock indicators surged. The Standard & Poor's 500 index gained 15.62 points, or 1.2%, to 1285.71; the Nasdaq composite surged 40.98 points, or 1.9%, to 2219.86, returning to positive territory for 2006.

“People are finally starting to realize that there is some value in the market (after the May swoon),” says Chris Orndorff, head of equities at Payden & Rygel.

Ever since the Fed noted in the minutes of its last meeting that it would make its decision on rates based on incoming economic data, investors have closely monitored economic reports for any hints as to what the Fed might do.

Signs of a slowing economy in the form of an increase in the number of first-time jobless claims last week and a dip in a closely watched manufacturing index was viewed positively, as it indicates the Fed's 16 rate increases since June 2004 are causing the economy to moderate. An upward revision in first-quarter productivity was also viewed as non-inflationary.

“The market is re-examining its decision to sell off last week,” says Timothy Vick, senior portfolio manager at Sanibel Captiva Trust.

Textron climbed $3.24 to $94.17 after the maker of products ranging from Bell helicopters to E-Z-GO golf carts said it would sell its fastening systems operation for $630 million in cash to a private equity firm as part of a plan to exit slow-growing businesses.

·Movado jumped $4.42, or 24%, to $23.11. The luxury watchmaker said its first-quarter earnings more than doubled on solid sales growth.

·Chicago Bridge & Iron added $1.78 to $24.26. Although the construction and engineering firm posted a lower quarterly profit, its sales came in sharply ahead of targets.

Economy Holds Good News — For The Rich (USAT)

By Julianne Malveaux

USA Today, June 2, 2006

The American economy grew by 5.3% in the first quarter of 2006, and the unemployment rate, at 4.7% in April, is the lowest it has been in years, prompting Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez to say that this year, "the American economy hit the ground running."

But if the news is so good, why is the stock market skittish, and why did consumer confidence dip 6% last month? Why isn't the economic good news trickling down? The White House may be concerned that the news isn't trickling up, either.

Goldman Sachs' chairman, Henry Paulson, has been nominated to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow, some say because Snow couldn't sell the Bush administration's economic policies on Wall Street.

As well respected as Paulson is, can the deficit hawk flip-flop enough to sell our growing deficit to Wall Street? Perhaps he'll spin it by saying the deficit will mandate spending cuts, but that's not good news to those folks who still need a safety net and government help with education, housing, retirement and health care.

The average American has not experienced much good economic news lately. The wealth gap is growing. Median family income has been dropping. Meanwhile, gasoline prices are up 36% from a year ago. With interest rates rising, those with adjustable rate mortgages face higher payments, and residential rents also are nudging up. Incomes are not keeping pace with inflation, and the job market is weak.

New York Times writer Louis Uchitelle describes workers as "disposable Americans," and daily headlines about layoffs — recently reports surfaced that Walt Disney Studios will lay off up to 10% of its workers — reinforce the sense of job insecurity.

There don't seem to be many breaks out there for those at the bottom.

The $5.15 hourly minimum wage has not been raised in a decade. The most recent tax cut legislation that extends breaks on capital gains and dividends will provide the bottom 40% of taxpayers with less than $20 in tax cuts over a three-year period. In contrast, more than two-thirds of the benefits of the tax cut will go to the top 5% of our nation's earners.

Snow is passing the Treasury secretary baton to Paulson because he couldn't "snow" America with economic happy talk. Paulson might be able to make a more convincing case to Wall Street, but who will make the case for a shared economic growth that trickles down far enough to benefit working people and the poor?

Freakoutonomics (NYT)

By Charles R. Morris

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

LAST month saw one of the sharpest drops in consumer confidence since the recessions of 1979-1982. But those were truly dreadful times. Oil prices tripled, rates on home mortgages shot into the mid-teens, the stock market was a disaster area and unemployment rates reached double digits.

Over the past three years, by contrast, American economic performance has been almost glittering. Inflation is still low, while employment and productivity have all been rising strongly. True, stock markets are clearly nervous, and the sharp upsurge in gas prices is adding to consumer skittishness. But the reaction still seems inconsistent with the economy's underlying strengths.

There are parallels with another historical period, however, that suggest the deeper currents of uneasiness.

Pan the camera back to Pittsburgh, July 1877. The Pennsylvania Railroad yard, stretching along the city's riverfront, is a raging inferno, set afire by angry mobs of railroad workers. A contingent of state militiamen, trapped in a burning railroad roundhouse, fight their way through the flames with a Gatling gun.

Over the next few weeks riots rage throughout the country. In Chicago, newspaper headlines declare that "howling mobs" control the city. In New York, The Sun demands a "diet of lead" for rioters. Unrest in San Francisco explodes into a vicious anti-Chinese pogrom. The same period marks the glory years of the rural Granger movement and the Roman-candle growth of the Knights of Labor. American Populism puts down permanent roots.

Historians long attributed the turmoil to a "great depression of the 1870's." But recent detailed reconstructions of 19th-century data by economic historians show that there was no 1870's depression: aside from a short recession in 1873, in fact, the decade saw possibly the fastest sustained growth in American history.

Employment grew strongly, faster than the rate of immigration; consumption of food and other goods rose across the board. On a per capita basis, almost all output measures were up spectacularly. By the end of the decade, people were better housed, better clothed and lived on bigger farms. Department stores were popping up even in medium-sized cities. America was transforming into the world's first mass consumer society.

But why did people feel so miserable? Partly they were confused by prices, which were dropping sharply. Farmers thought falling grain prices meant they were getting poorer, without noticing that the price of everything else was falling too. Farmers' terms of trade — the price differences between what they sold and what they bought — actually racked up solid gains in the 1870's.

But ordinary people still had good reason to be terrified, just as ordinary people do today. Midwestern 1870's factory farms — thousand-acre spreads with 70-horse plowing teams — quickly dominated world markets but also wiped out the much smaller grain farmers of New York. Globalized grain markets were more volatile: good weather on the Russian steppes could ruin an American grower's year. Farmers found themselves caught in the coils of grain futures markets.

After the Civil War, artisanal local manufacturers usually enjoyed comfortable mini-monopolies. But with the rapid spread of the railroads and the telegraph, new department stores and mail-order catalogs pressured local producers and middlemen with mass-produced goods, a precursor to the Wal-Mart era. In the mid-1880's, the Bloomingdale's catalog promised that orders would arrive within two weeks in virtually the whole of the United States, including large swathes of territory reachable only by wagon-train a decade before. The productivity shock was comparable to that from the Internet in our own day.

Before the Civil War, America was perhaps the most egalitarian society in the world. But the unbridled entrepreneurialism of the 1870's gave rise to the robber barons. Even if ordinary people were doing better in the 1870's, the yawning gap between the very rich and everybody else fanned resentments. Interestingly, wealth inequality in today's America is roughly the same as in the Gilded Age.

The sharply increased social and geographic mobility of the 1870's set people adrift from traditional sources of security in families and villages. In our own day, the destruction of employer-employee relationships, the erosion of pension protection and employee health insurance may be creating a similar loss of moorings.

If one counts only the size of houses and cars, and the numbers of electronic gadgets stuffed into rec rooms, Americans are probably better off than ever before. But as the 1870's suggest, economic well-being doesn't come just from piling up toys. An economy has psychological or, if you will, spiritual, dimensions. A conviction of fairness, a feeling of not being totally on one's own, a sense of reasonable stability and predictability are all essential components of good economic performance. When they were missing in the 1870's, in the midst of a boom, the populace was brought to the brink of revolt.

N.Y.'s Hevesi Apologizes For Bush Remark (AP-Y2)

By Adam Goldman

AP2, June 1, 2006

State Comptroller Alan Hevesi publicly apologized Thursday for a "beyond dumb" remark about a fellow Democrat "putting a bullet between the president's eyes."

Hevesi hastily called a mea culpa press conference hours after putting his foot in his mouth at the Queens College commencement.

In the videotaped speech, Hevesi describes Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., as, "the man who, how do I phrase this diplomatically, who will put a bullet between the president's eyes if he could get away with it."

At the news conference, a contrite Hevesi said he was trying to convey that Schumer has the strength and courage to stand up to the president.

"I do speak extemporaneously," he said. "And I've never said anything like this."

Hevesi apologized to Bush and Schumer and said he is "not a person of violence."

"I am apologizing as abjectly as I can. There is no excuse for it. It was beyond dumb."

Hevesi, a longtime professor of government and politics at Queens College before becoming comptroller, said he hadn't been in touch with the White House but hoped his apology reached President Bush.

A White House spokesman did not immediately return a telephone message seeking comment Thursday. But one Republican seized on Hevesi's words.

"Threats against the president are no joke and this incident raises real concerns about Alan Hevesi's fitness to hold public office," GOP comptroller nominee J. Christopher Callaghan said during his acceptance speech at the Republican state convention on Long Island.

Schumer spokeswoman Risa Heller said the senator was satisfied with Hevesi's apology.

"Comptroller Hevesi was trying to make a point. He went way too far and it was inappropriate and wrong," Heller said. "He has apologized to both the senator and the president and we believe that ends the matter."

Republicans Fear Waning Political Fortunes (NYT)

By Michael Cooper

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y., June 1 — Twelve years ago, when they gathered at their state convention, Republicans were so hungry to retake the governorship that party bosses led by Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato brokered a deal to spare George E. Pataki a primary against his fiercest opponent.

But when the Republicans met here on Thursday to choose a new candidate for governor, the party found itself dispirited and deeply divided. Last-minute efforts by Governor Pataki, a lame duck, and other party leaders to avoid a potentially damaging primary fell apart. And the leadership's favored candidate for governor, William F. Weld, finished a distant second, earning a spot on the primary ballot but failing in his bid to be the party's designee.

It was a largely gloomy gathering, except for the rambunctious partisans of John Faso, a former assemblyman who pulled off an upset when he became the party's designee with 61 percent of the vote. If the Democrats seemed to taste victory at their gathering in Buffalo earlier this week and let their excitement spill over at their many breakfasts and receptions and parties, many Republicans here said privately that they feared their 12-year run of good fortune was coming to an end. Empty chairs pocked many of their events.

Many Republicans, from state senators to consultants to county chairmen to a former Pataki administration official, said privately that some of the blame lay with Governor Pataki. They used phrases like "train wreck" to describe the party and "lack of leadership" to describe the governor's stewardship of it.

Anthony Scannapieco Jr., the Republican chairman of Putnam County, where the governor lives, lamented: "The governor lay back for a long time. I don't know where his thoughts were, maybe they were in Washington, but he lay back for a long time."

Robert Smith, the chairman of the Onondaga Republican Party, complained that the state party chairman, Stephen J. Minarik III, had tried to foist the Weld candidacy on the rank and file. "I feel abandoned by the hierarchy of our party," said Mr. Smith, a Faso supporter. "I think this is a complete testament to the leadership of Mr. Minarik."

Governor Pataki, for his part, tried to rally the troops Tuesday afternoon. He showed the convention a glitzy, campaign-style video about himself (complete with images of the twin towers burning) and tried to make the case that the Republicans could run on his record and win.

"We are in the process of putting together a great ticket," he said in a speech, as some delegates drifted out of the Hofstra Arena. "We have a record that people can run on, because this is a better state than it was 12 years ago."

But the candidates running to succeed Governor Pataki painted a bleak view of the state of the state after 12 years under him. While Mr. Faso praised the governor's leadership, both he and Mr. Weld complained in speeches that New Yorkers were leaving the state in record numbers, that taxes were too high and that the state spent too much.

And Mr. Weld, stressing his independence and outsider status, said, "I haven't cut secret deals with Dennis Rivera, or Randi Weingarten or the trial lawyers lobby," referring to two union leaders who endorsed Governor Pataki in 2002 and an organization that recently contributed $50,000 to his national committee.

It got so bad that J. Christopher Callaghan, the party's nominee for comptroller, found himself insisting "I detect a pulse" from the stage and delivering a mild rebuke. "We've gone from blaming Democrats to blaming each other," he said. "I've got a hunch this is not a winning strategy."

Even the setting of the convention, Long Island, was a reminder of how bad things have gotten for Republicans in New York. The Democrats took over Nassau and Suffolk County governments this year for what party officials say is the first time. Since Mr. Pataki took office in 1994, he has been the only Republican elected to a statewide post. And statewide, Democrats have seen their edge in voter registration grow by 600,000 votes over the past decade, according to Board of Elections figures.

"It's like Dutch elm disease," said Nelson Warfield, a Republican strategist who was Bob Dole's press secretary in 1996. "The great Republican trees are dying."

He continued: "In the last dozen years, the Republican Party has largely become all about Pataki. The governor never focused on trying to establish a farm team within the party, and now, as his era ends, it is apparent that the party has not prospered under him."

This week party leaders made a last-ditch attempt to avoid a primary by trying to broker a Weld-Faso ticket. Mr. Faso rejected their bid to have him step aside and run for lieutenant governor instead.

After all, Mr. Faso had stepped aside once before. In 1994, he was persuaded to pull out of the comptroller's race so Herbert London, who was popular with Conservatives, could campaign for that post instead of challenging Mr. Pataki in a bid for governor. There was no such deal this year.

DOJ_NMG_0031556

Some tried to adopt a philosophical tone. "Ebb and flow, ebb and flow," said James Ortenzio, the Manhattan chairman, who supports Mr. Weld. "Twelve years, and the other party has some energy, has some vigor. But I think we need this. I think this is required revamping. Catharsis can occur. Don't know."

N.Y. Republicans Set Up Faso-Weld Primary (AP-Y2)

By Michael Gormley

AP2, June 1, 2006

State Republicans on Thursday designated former Assembly minority leader John Faso as their candidate for governor but gave enough support to former Massachusetts Gov. Bill Weld for a spot on the primary ballot.

Faso became the party designee by receiving more than 50 percent of the weighted vote after negotiations that went into the early morning and included Gov. George Pataki, said state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik.

Faso, who had lost a December straw poll, came away Thursday with 59.5 percent of the weighted vote to Weld's 40.5 percent.

"Today we begin a battle for the hearts and minds of our fellow New Yorkers," Faso said. "Our message is clear: We need to cut taxes, we need to create jobs and we need to restore opportunity, and we need to reform New York state's government."

Weld questioned the value of the party designation in a primary campaign. "I suppose it would be nice, but my campaign would be unaffected," he said Thursday.

Republican leaders, meeting this week in their state convention on Long Island, had been hoping to avoid a primary campaign, which could hamper and divide fundraising at a time Democrat Eliot Spitzer has large leads in early polls.

Democrats on Tuesday gave their overwhelming support to Spitzer, a two-term attorney general with a national reputation for his Wall Street investigations.

Faso and Weld have both declined to seek the lieutenant governor spot, a possibility some Republicans thought would create political balance. Weld, the former two-term Massachusetts governor and Reagan administration prosecutor, is considered more socially moderate than Faso, who opposes abortion and gay marriage.

"Pragmatically, the state is moderate to left statewide on social issues," Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno said. "If you put them together, you have one viable ticket."

N.Y. Republicans Send Faso, Weld To Governor Primary (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Greg Bensinger

Bloomberg, June 1, 2006

June 1 (Bloomberg) -- Former New York Assembly Minority Leader John Faso won backing from a majority of Republican convention delegates for the party's nomination for governor today, defeating former Massachusetts Governor William Weld.

Weld still qualified for the Sept. 12 Republican primary ballot, with 38.8 percent of the delegates' vote at Hofstra University in Hempstead to 61.2 percent for Faso, and said he would stay in the race. Weld needed 25 percent to avoid having to get on the ballot through petition signatures. Faso's majority support makes him the party's designated choice.

Either Republican would face an uphill battle in the November general election against the Democratic front-runner, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, according to recent polls. Republican Governor George Pataki is stepping down after serving three terms.

``Spitzer's ahead in the polls and ahead in the money and that does present some big challenges for Faso or Weld," said John Spencer, designated the Republicans' preferred candidate in the U.S. Senate race yesterday. ``We do have a problem with voters downstate in facing Spitzer and we're going to have to motivate our base if we're going to win."

Spitzer, 46, who built a national reputation with investigations of Wall Street, won the Democratic Party's designation by acclamation two days ago at a convention in Buffalo.

Divergence

Both Republican candidates have called for more fiscal restraint to keep taxes lower and encourage business investment. They diverge on social issues, with Weld supporting legalized abortion and gay rights and Faso opposing them.

DOJ_NMG_0031557

``Eliot Spitzer's problem is that he has allied with the big government special interests who have already placed their bets with millions and millions of dollars in his campaign," Faso said in a speech to the convention. ``You can be sure they want something for their money, and it's not tax cuts."

In response, Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson said, ``The sort of shrill, partisan accusations that we heard today have nothing to do what Eliot Spitzer has said, how he has governed, or where he plans on taking the state."

Weld, 60, the Massachusetts governor from 1991 to 1997 and current head of a New York City investment firm, had been endorsed by state Republican Chairman Stephen Minarik. Faso, 53, drew support from county leaders around the state.

Conservative Backing

Faso, a lawyer from New York's Hudson Valley, also has the endorsement of the state Conservative Party, which has backed every successful statewide Republican candidate for the past 30 years.

Weld has been dogged by questions about his presidency of Decker College a Kentucky trade school, which fell into bankruptcy a month after he resigned. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating the school for fraud.

Republican State Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno said Faso's win ``was a very decisive vote." Without saying whether he would ask Weld to withdraw, Bruno described Faso as ``the nominee."

Weld said he would stay in the race. ``This is the first day of the rest of the campaign," he told reporters. ``I will predict with some assurance that I will win the primary." Faso said, ``I would certainly like to avoid a primary, but if we have one, so be it."

Polls

Among New York Republican voters, Faso led Weld 30 percent to 21 percent in a May 10 Marist poll, with 49 percent undecided.

A May 17 Quinnipiac University survey showed Spitzer leading both Faso and Weld by at least 49 percentage points. The poll also ranked Spitzer as the most popular statewide officeholder, with a job approval rating of 66 percent.

Spitzer led his Democratic opponent, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi, by 73 percent to 13 percent in the Quinnipiac poll. Suozzi, 43, needs to collect 15,000 petition signatures to qualify for the primary ballot.

In a Jan. 15 filing, the most recent date available, Spitzer reported he had $19 million in the bank compared with Weld's $2 million and Faso's $1 million. Suozzi reported raising more than $5 million. The next filings are due July 15.

Faso said he faced a big challenge in catching up on fundraising So Spitzer. ``We have to fundraise this evening when I leave here, and will raise from ever person I can see."

Other Races

Republican delegates also put two candidates for lieutenant governor on the primary ballot. A majority made Faso's choice, C. Scott Vanderhoef, 57, the designee. His opponent is Weld's running mate, New York Secretary of State Chris Jacobs, 39. The lone Democratic candidate is State Senate Minority Leader David Paterson, 52.

The unopposed Republican choice for comptroller is Saratoga County Treasurer Christopher Callaghan, 59. He will face Democrat Alan Hevesi, 66, who is seeking re-election to a second term, in November.

War Handicaps Senators In '08 White House Race (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

With Iraq looming yet again over an American presidential campaign, senators considering a White House race are at a disadvantage over governors who might run, forced to explain their votes — and in some cases, alter their views — on an increasingly unpopular war.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, both prospective 2008 candidates, have encountered hecklers protesting their support for the Iraq war. Both responded with hints of recalibrations in the way they discussed the issue, with Mrs. Clinton telling Democrats who nominated her on Wednesday for a second term to "stand with me" in pressing the White House and Iraqis to develop a plan that would permit American troops to come home.

Two other prospective Democratic presidential candidates, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, say they regret voting for the war. Both have called for setting a deadline to withdraw American troops, a position that analysts say enjoys strong support among Democrats who are active in primaries and who were wary of both men for their pro-war votes in 2004.

"I think I was wrong to vote for the war," Mr. Edwards said in an interview. "Bush made this mess that we are in now. My view is what America needs to do now is make it clear that we are going to get out."

DOJ_NMG_0031558

By contrast, governors are finding considerable maneuvering room when it comes to Iraq. And they are taking advantage of it for now, while realizing that their lack of foreign policy experience is a disadvantage in an election that could focus on international affairs.

Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, a Democrat, declined to say in an interview how he would have voted on the war.

"I'm not going to get into that; this isn't about what happened in the past," Mr. Vilsack said. "If we're looking at the elections of 2006 and 2008, I think it's important to look to the future and learn from whatever mistakes we made in the past."

Mark Warner, a former Virginia governor and another likely Democratic presidential contender, said he did not support setting a deadline for troop withdrawal.

"We have been put in this extraordinarily difficult situation," Mr. Warner said. "My sense is going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan. So I have not been one of those people who say that come heck or high water, we are going to leave by a fixed date."

Mr. Warner spoke empathetically of his potential rivals who as senators voted for the war.

"I don't think any U.S. senator, regardless of party, if they had known there weren't W.M.D., that we were going to get selected leaks, I don't think anybody would have voted for it," he said. "Second-guessing people who made a valiant attempt at judgment is not where I am at."

On the Republican side, Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts applauded the invasion and said the United States should stay until the situation was settled. But he was critical of Bush administration management of Iraq, including the lack of sufficient troops to help secure the country to and the Abu Ghraib torture scandal.

"As the president and Tony Blair said, knowing what we know today, would we have managed the postconflict effort differently?" Mr. Romney said, referring to the British prime minister. "Of course."

Asked if he had voiced those concerns before public opinion turned against the war, and Mr. Bush himself acknowledged the shortcomings, Mr. Romney responded: "I haven't spoken out on this topic until relatively recently. I can't pull you quotes back from that time."

The prospective candidates are planning now as if the war will be as big an issue in 2008 as it was in 2004. If anything, the politics surrounding the war are likely to become more volatile with disclosures about alleged killings of Iraqi civilians by marines in Haditha, a case that has prompted comparisons with the My Lai massacre in the Vietnam War.

"I think it's going to get worse before it gets better," Mr. Kerry said in an interview.

As Mr. McCain saw when he was hooted down at a speech at the New School in New York, this issue could be a problem for candidates from both parties. Opposition to the war is no longer confined to Democrats; it is also on the rise among independents, who are the heart of Mr. McCain's appeal in a general election.

Both Mr. McCain and Mrs. Clinton have, to varying degrees, shifted their tone in talking about the war as they find themselves on the frontier of public opinion. Mr. McCain has given three speeches over two weeks affirming his support for the war, but he used conciliatory language as he noted its high costs and declared that "Americans should argue about this war."

When Mrs. Clinton was heckled by war protesters last week, she said that she stood by her support for the war, but added that she was beginning to see circumstances where the United States would be able to withdraw.

An adviser said this could prove to be the start of an evolution that would lead to Mrs. Clinton's increasingly distancing herself from the conflict.

Governors have historically had an advantage over members of Congress in presidential elections; no sitting member of Congress has been elected to the White House since John F. Kennedy in 1960. Some officials in both parties suggest that the 2008 contest could break that pattern if the debate focuses largely on the candidates' credentials to manage difficult foreign policy issues.

Some of the highest-profile governors and former governors who are thinking of running for president, including Mr. Romney and Mr. Vilsack, have in recent months made trips to Iraq.

Mr. Vilsack said in an interview that he thought it was a mistake to set a deadline for troop withdrawal, but that the United States had to make clear to Iraqis "how they should not rely on the United States."

Democratic analysts said Mr. Warner and Mr. Vilsack had more flexibility in resisting party members' pressure for withdrawal because they lacked the baggage of having supported the war in the first place.

On this issue, Mr. Warner and Mr. Vilsack are closer to some of the probable Republican candidates than to Mr. Kerry and Mr. Edwards. "We should stay in Iraq until the Iraqis are able to maintain their own security," Mr. Romney said, rejecting the idea for a deadline.

In calling for a deadline, Mr. Kerry said that having one would give Iraq the impetus to take responsibility for dealing with a war that had devolved into an unmanageable civil strife.

"There's nothing that our troops can do — nothing — to resolve the fundamental differences between the factions," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031559

Mr. Kerry derided Mr. McCain for his continued support for the war, saying: "He's dead wrong. I think it's the wrong war in the wrong place. We've paid a huge price for this in the Middle East."

Kerry Attacks Bush Over Iraq Policies (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) harshly criticized the Bush administration for "disdaining diplomacy" in favor of a confrontational and unilateral foreign policy that has hurt the United States' standing around the world and made it less safe.

In a speech Thursday in Los Angeles, the former (and perhaps future) Democratic Party presidential candidate warned that the mistakes of Iraq must not be repeated in the current standoff with Iran.

"War is the ultimate failure of diplomacy," Kerry told a gathering of the Pacific Council on International Policy. "Yet our current leadership has arrogantly discarded this basic principle…. All too often they disdained diplomacy as little more than an inconvenient detour on the chosen path to armed conflict."

The result, he said, was an ill-advised rush to war in Iraq that alienated other governments and diminished sympathy for the U.S. generated by the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. America's current isolation, and the presence of thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq, is "playing right into Iranian hands…. The Iranians are delighted," Kerry said.

Emphasizing that a nuclear-armed Iran would be "a very serious threat to the U.S. and our allies," Kerry contended that the most conservative estimates are that Tehran is at least five years away from developing atomic weapons.

"There is time for diplomacy to work here," he said, but added that negotiating with Iran is "an uncertain proposition at best."

Kerry spoke before news broke of the agreement between six major powers, including the U.S., to offer an incentive package for Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions. He hailed Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent offer of direct negotiations with Iran, but said any talks "must be more than an effort to check the box on diplomacy as they move toward a confrontation."

The 21-year veteran of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee also had harsh words for the Iraqi government. The sight of politicians haggling over Cabinet seats in the midst of an undiminished insurgency is "a disgrace, and this administration ought to get tough," he said.

He proposed intense U.S. pressure to force consensus, either by withholding reconstruction funds or threatening a unilateral withdrawal of troops.

Kerry, who voted to give President Bush authorization to use force against Saddam Hussein in 2002, said he would attach an amendment to this summer's defense appropriations bill calling for a total withdrawal of U.S. combat troops by the end of this year. But he acknowledged that the idea would be unpopular. "I know I'm not going to get the majority of my own caucus."

On domestic issues, Kerry predicted that rising public dissatisfaction with the Bush administration could translate into huge gains for Democratic candidates in November's midterm congressional elections.

"There is something bubbling up in America that I believe is going to be reflected in the polls," he said.

As for his own political ambitions, Kerry would say only that he is "thinking very hard" about another presidential run in 2008.

"And I'm thinking about it a lot earlier than I'd like to because it's clear there are several other people also thinking about it," he said

Ex-C.I.A. Officer In New Book Talks (NYT)

By Motoko Rich

The New York Times, June 1, 2006

The $2.5 million book deal that Valerie Plame Wilson, the former Central Intelligence Agency officer whose identity was publicly disclosed three years ago, negotiated with Crown Publishing Group last month has fallen through.

Ms. Wilson, who could not agree on terms with Crown, is now in exclusive negotiations with Simon & Schuster, which originally had lost an auction for the book to Crown.

Although no contract has yet been signed with Simon & Schuster, David Rosenthal, the publisher, said, "We are optimistic about these talks."

When Crown announced the deal last month, Steve Ross, senior vice president and publisher, said the book had a working title of "Fair Game" and would be published in the fall of 2007. He said at the time that the book would be the "first airing of her actual role in the American intelligence community, as well as the prominence of her role in the lead-up to the war."

DOJ_NMG_0031560

Yesterday, Tina Constable, a spokeswoman at Crown, said, "We had a difference of opinion on some of the contract terms, and we agreed to release each other from any publishing obligations."

Elyse Cheney, Ms. Wilson's agent, declined to comment on the nature of the disagreement.

This is not the first time that Crown has lost a deal with a former member of the C.I.A. It originally agreed to publish a book by George J. Tenet, a former director of central intelligence. That deal too fell apart, and now Mr. Tenet's book will be published by HarperCollins in February 2007 as "At the Center of the Storm."

Two Important Rulings On AIDS (NYT)

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

Federal judges in New York and the District of Columbia have declared unconstitutional a 2003 rule that limits the way U.S. health groups spend their privately raised money if they want to get federal money for international AIDS work.

Under this sweeping edict, nonprofits that want government support must sign a pledge saying they oppose prostitution and will not spend any money — public or private — on programs the government does not approve of. Many groups are wary of signing, not because they favor prostitution, but because it is an offense to free speech, and because they are worried about harming vital programs aimed at teaching prostitutes about condom use.

In the New York case, one of the plaintiffs challenging the prostitution pledge, Alliance for Open Society International, told the court it was constrained from fully participating in an AIDS conference that included a discussion of the proper legal regime for prostitution. Another group, Pathfinder International, said it feared it would lose public money for other projects if it used private money to collaborate with overseas groups that have a track record of engaging prostitutes in AIDS prevention.

The plaintiff in the second case, DKT International, a nonprofit family planning and AIDS prevention group that works in 11 countries, saw one of its federal grants canceled after it declined to sign the pledge. It said it refused to sign because it was concerned about stigmatizing and alienating sex workers whom the program was trying to reach.

The judges in both cases found that extending the requirement to privately raised money went too far, violating the First Amendment.

It remains to be seen whether the government will now stop trying to impose the pledge on other groups. We also don't know how many groups will now feel emboldened to rescind pledges they have already signed. And, lamentably, the restriction still stands when it comes to spending federal dollars. Still, by declaring that government may not use its spending clout to compel or coerce private speech, the new decisions have vindicated an important constitutional principle, while removing at least one impediment for health groups trying to reach a high-risk community, and save lives.

Another $10 Billion (WP)

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

THE GENERALS in the global battle against HIV-AIDS are meeting at the United Nations this week, five years after another U.N. summit promised an intensified push against the crisis. The target of mobilizing $7 billion to $10 billion per year has been met: Last year low- and middle-income countries spent $2.5 billion of their own money and an additional $5.8 billion from donors on AIDS treatment and prevention and the care of orphans. But that money has bought less than expected. Rather than hitting the "three by five" target of getting medicines to 3 million people by 2005, the world has put only about 1.4 million people on treatment -- a big improvement on the 240,000 who were receiving drugs in 2001 but still well less than half of the number who need medicines immediately. Equally, better-financed prevention efforts have succeeded in driving down infection rates among young adults, notably in Kenya, Uganda, Zimbabwe and Haiti. But last year there were 4.1 million new infections worldwide. The plague is still advancing.

The summiteers in New York therefore confront a daunting problem. The latest U.N. estimate, which may prove as optimistic as the last one, is that fighting the disease will soon require $20 billion to $23 billion a year, more than twice the current spending. What's more, this is not a temporary commitment: Once people go on antiretroviral treatment, they need medicines for years; caring for orphans is also a long-term proposition. Assuming that some of the extra resources will be provided by middle-income countries, the rich world may need to reach into its taxpayers' pockets for an extra $10 billion a year. Official development assistance, which has already jumped by more than two-thirds in real terms between 2000 and 2005, would have to grow by a tenth or so.

Moreover, the effect of that money will be limited unless the world expands its commitment to other development efforts. Donor-financed AIDS programs can suck nurses and doctors out of the rest of the health system, so an increase in AIDS spending requires a parallel increase in general health investment. AIDS flourishes in poor societies because illiteracy and penury make people vulnerable; success against the virus depends partly on broader progress. As President Paul Kagame of Rwanda told The Post on Wednesday, there's no use in giving someone antiretroviral drugs if he has no food.

DOJ_NMG_0031561

The imperative to raise extra money for AIDS and other development objectives raises an institutional issue. To carry out its commitments of five years ago, the world created the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, which has raised and spent an impressive $5 billion; the question is whether this venture should be the vehicle for the next step-up in AIDS funding. The fund's critics, notably the Bush administration, rightly say that it has suffered from poor management, that it has occasionally given money on the basis of poor grant proposals and that it has indulged grantees whose performance should have led to a suspension of disbursements. But rather than snipe at the fund, the critics should work to improve it. The fund's structure provides a way of sharing the financial burden globally. The quality of its grants has recently gone up. And centralizing AIDS finance simplifies the administrative burden on stressed officials from poor countries. The fund's entrepreneurial leader, Richard Feachem, has announced that he will leave when his term expires this year. The priority should be to find a replacement who is pushy enough to raise extra money and savvy enough to solidify the institution's management.

Russia, China Endorse Package To Push Iran (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- Russia and China endorsed a package of incentives and penalties Thursday designed by Western nations to push Iran to suspend its nuclear program.

Few details of the agreement were forthcoming, and British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett, who announced the deal in muted language, cautioned that negotiators wanted to present the package to the Iranians before making it public.

But diplomats close to the issue said incentives were similar to past proposals, including helping Iran obtain a civilian nuclear reactor. The term "sanctions" was noticeably absent from discussion, but diplomats strongly signaled that Iran would be subject to the full array of Security Council punitive measures should it refuse the offer.

"We have agreed to a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussion with Iran," said Beckett, flanked by top officials of the five permanent United Nations Security Council members and European Union foreign minister Javier Solana in the ivy-lined garden of the British Ambassador's Vienna residence.

"We are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities as required" by the International Atomic Energy Agency. "And we would also suspend action in the Security Council. We also agreed that if Iran decides not to engage in negotiations further steps would have to be taken in the Security Council."

Western powers believe that Iran is pursuing the capability to produce a nuclear bomb, but Tehran insists that it seeks only the technology to enrich uranium for civilian purposes.

Iran was circumspect in its first public comments on the offer. "Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions, but (we) won't give up our (nuclear) rights," said Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki in a statement read on state television. "We are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold a dialogue about common concerns."

Iran will have "weeks not months" to decide whether it is willing to negotiate and suspend its enrichment-related activities, Western diplomats said. They added that the demand will be a tough one for the Muslim nation, and will include a categorical requirement for Iran to stop all research and development activity, including even "dry run" operation of centrifuges used to enrich gaseous uranium, a senior state department diplomat said.

In addition, Iran would have to answer outstanding questions from the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, the IAEA, which has been seeking to learn the full extent of Tehran's nuclear activities. Tehran also would have to abide by additional IAEA regulations, including more extensive inspections of nuclear-related facilities.

Whether Iran agrees to resume negotiations or refuses, there is sure to be months, if not years of diplomacy ahead, diplomats said.

The absence of specifics in Thursday's announcement appeared aimed at minimizing the likelihood that the proposal would be the subject of public debate before the Iranians had a chance to hear it explained by the Europeans, who will likely present the package to Tehran in the next few days. Diplomats hope that if the package is laid out privately, its seriousness will be clear and the Iranians will be hard put to dismiss it.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov, speaking to Russian press after the meeting, said, "Nobody will be going into details now. In the first place, this (proposal) should be given to Iran. Then we will look at the reaction of the Iranian side."

Lavrov urged Iran to take the offer seriously.

"We count on Tehran meeting these proposals in a constructive manner," Lavrov said.

U.S. diplomats were clearly pleased by the Russian endorsement. "These are conditions (set by) six countries. ... We are very satisfied," said a senior state department official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the discussions.

DOJ_NMG_0031562

Russia and China are key to any future sanctions on Iran because they hold veto power on the Security Council. Both countries also are major trading partners with Iran.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who on Wednesday announced the U.S. was willing to join Europeans in direct talks with Iran if it suspends its nuclear activity, arrived in Vienna Thursday. She spent more than eight hours meeting with leaders on the proposal, which is a five- to six-page document.

Diplomats close to the negotiations said all parties had agreed to the incentives side of the proposal, but that penalties would be drawn from a list. Also undetermined was the timing of the penalties, which diplomats said would depend on how the Iranians respond.

The incentives under discussion are not new; they include help with construction of a light-water reactor, guaranteed access to nuclear fuel for civilian power plants, and imports of many goods for which the United States holds licenses, such as parts for airplanes. Under U.S. law it is illegal to trade with Iran and Washington has no diplomatic relations with Tehran.

Although diplomats avoided the term "sanctions," punitive measures would include action by the Security Council, a panel that has the power to ban travel, freeze assets, restrict visas and impose economic embargos on exports of nuclear technology and a wide array of other goods to Iran -- all penalties that are under discussion in the Iranian case.

Diplomats said the package offers a clear choice to Iran: suspend uranium enrichment and be treated as a full partner in the world community, or face painful consequences from a united international community with the power to undermine Iran's economy and stability.

"So there are two paths ahead," said Beckett. "We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals which would bring significant benefits to Iran."

The agreement Thursday finalized discussions begun in London on May 8 in which diplomats decided that they would present Iran with a choice, diplomats said. "But the details all came together tonight," said a senior state department official.

Russia and China both expressed interest Thursday in joining the so-called E.U. 3 and U.S. if negotiations go forward. That approach would mirror six-party talks with North Korea over its nuclear program.

The United States and Europe have been struggling to keep world powers united against Iran, but Russia and China had been reluctant go along with any deal that mentioned sanctions. The first signal that they were wiling to consider stronger measures to contain Iran came in January when they agreed to report Iran to the security council. Previously, Iran's violations of the nuclear nonproliferation regime had been dealt with at the IAEA in Vienna.

But soon after, Russia seemed to have second thoughts about its support for Iranian censure and prolonged the discussions at the security council. Meanwhile, Iran appeared defiant. In early April it announced it had successfully enriched uranium using its own centrifuges at the Natanz nuclear plant, flouting international demands that it stop all enrichment related activity.

A round of intensive diplomacy in the past week, including a call by President Bush to Russian President Vladimir Putin on Tuesday and the U.S. decision to open the door to direct talks for the first time since the Iranian hostage crisis in 1979, helped win the full backing again of the Russians.

Many experts suspect that if Moscow is again faced with the demand that it back sanctions, it will refuse, but for the moment it is holding firm.

"It is very important that the proposal for negotiations came from all six [powers], including the USA, for which this was not an easy step," said Lavrov, referring to the U.S. decision to open the door to relations with Iran.

World Powers Reach Agreement On Iran (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

World powers agreed on Thursday night on a package of “far reaching proposals” to encourage Iran to suspend uranium enrichment but warned of “further steps” if Tehran refused to co-operate.

After talks in Vienna between foreign ministers from the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, plus Germany and European foreign policy chief Javier Solana, the UK’s Margaret Becket said European governments would resume negotiations with Tehran and stop action at the Security Council if it suspends all uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

She added, however, that if Iran refuses to engage, steps would be taken at the UN.

“We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals which would bring significant benefits,” she said.

European officials refused to divulge the details of the incentives agreed and it was unclear whether Russia and China, until now opposed to sanctions, had signed up to specific penalties if Iran spurns the offer of engagement.

DOJ_NMG_0031563

But the rare show of international unity will substantially raise the diplomatic pressure on the Islamic Republic. It comes a day after the US announced a major shift in policy, dramatically bolstering the package of incentives.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said on Wednesday the US would be ready to join other nations in multilateral talks with Iran if Tehran suspended uranium enrichment and reprocessing.

A senior European diplomat, speaking before the meeting, said the UK, France and Germany – the three European governments that have led policy on Iran – were expected to hold talks with Iranian officials, perhaps as early as next week, to present and explain the proposals.

The package agreed is believed to include a guarantee of fuel supply to Iranian nuclear reactors, and the construction of a light water reactor. Crucially, the proposals are said to call on Tehran to cease all uranium enrichment activities but do not rule out a potential reconsideration of this at a future date, if and when Iran reassures the international community of the peaceful intentions of its nuclear programme.

Diplomats are hoping that the US offer, combined with the package of incentives, will persuade senior members of the Iranian regime to opt for a less confrontational approach and agree at least to a temporary freeze of enrichment activities, which could allow negotiations to begin.

Iran, however, has already warned it would reject proposals that did not allow it to retain a small-scale enrichment capability, the process that produces nuclear fuel for reactors or atomic weapons.

The first official reactions from Tehran on Thursday on the US policy shift were also not encouraging but nor did they represent an outright rejection of the American overture.

Manouchehr Mottaki, the foreign minister, played down the significance of the Bush administration's policy reversal and shrugged off American demands for a halt in all uranium enrichment and reprocessing as a pre-condition for dialogue. But he also said Tehran was ready to hold talks "over mutual concerns".

Iranian commentators, however, were deeply sceptical of the US readiness to join Europeans in multilateral talks with Iran, insisting the offer was not serious because it included a conditionality that was unacceptable to Tehran.

Hossein Shariatmadari, influential fundamentalist commentator and managing director of the Keyhan newspaper, condemned the US offer as a "trick" and argued that giving in to US demands would amount to "blackmail".

But Iran's friends and foes around the world urged the regime to take its time and carefully consider its response.

The foreign ministry in Russia, which has long pressed for a softer international approach towards Tehran, described the American policy shift as "a real chance" to achieve a settlement over Iran. "We call on Iran to constructively respond to it [the chance]," the ministry said.

Package Of Terms (No Sanctions Included) For Iran (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, June 1 — The United States, Russia, China and three leading nations of Europe announced an agreement Thursday on a package of incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, shelving any punitive action by the Security Council until Iran has time to respond to the proposals.

The initiative is aimed at encouraging Iran to return to a freeze of its nuclear activities, including turning off the fast-spinning centrifuge machines that produce enriched uranium.

The specifics of the proposals were not revealed on Thursday. But they are expected to be presented to Iran in coming days by a delegation headed by Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief. The government in Tehran would then be given weeks — but not months — to respond, American and European officials said.

Britain's new foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, read a statement on behalf of the six countries, saying: "We have agreed on a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussions with Iran. We believe they offer Iran the chance to reach a negotiated agreement based on cooperation."

She said the nations represented at the talks "are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment related and reprocessing activities" as required by the International Atomic Energy Agency. "And we would also suspend action in the Security Council," she added.

Ms. Beckett warned that "further steps would have to be taken in the Security Council" if Iran did not comply. But the statement carefully avoided any mention of sanctions or other specific, punitive measures, and Ms. Beckett took no questions.

The word "sanctions" was not uttered in the public dialogue on Thursday, perhaps in an effort to avoid giving Iran an obvious target for early objections. But should Iran reject the incentives, differences are likely to re-emerge among the six nations as they consider specific punishments in the Security Council.

Two officials who attended the talks on Thursday described the lengthy and, at times, tense negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0031564

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, insisted that any consideration of punitive action in the Security Council be frozen until Iran had a chance to respond to the current offer, said one senior European official who, like some others, spoke on the condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic rules.

"The Security Council has stopped," this official said. "If we fail, we will come back to the Security Council, but the process is now stalled until we see the reaction of Iran. They asked for it to be frozen, and they got it."

A resolution is currently before the United Nations Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which invokes the Council's power to demand compliance of member countries and threaten punishment if they refuse.

Another senior European official expressed fears that the process could allow Iran time to "string this along for a very long time."

Pressed on whether the six nations had reached full consensus on Thursday, R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, expressed broad satisfaction. "We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna," he said. "We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear weapons capability."

The emphasis of the agreement on Thursday was less on how to punish Iran, than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities. There had been optimistic predictions in recent days, particularly by the Bush administration, that the foreign ministers of the countries meeting Thursday — the five permanent Security Council powers, plus Germany — could agree on a complicated formula that would persuade Iran to stop making enriched uranium.

On Wednesday, before her departure from Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We are agreed with our European partners on the essential elements of a package containing both benefits, if Iran makes the right choice — and costs if it does not."

The afternoon talks extended into dinner, only a day after the Bush administration reversed course and offered to sit down at the same negotiating table with Iran — if Iran fully suspended its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities.

Iran has said it has no intention of stopping these activities. On Thursday, Iranian officials embraced the idea of talking to the United States, but rejected preconditions for talks.

"We will not negotiate over our nation's natural nuclear rights but we are ready to hold fair and unbiased dialogue and negotiation over mutual concerns within the context of a defined framework," said Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, the official Iranian news agency reported.

His spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, said later, "There is no obstacle to negotiating with the United States on an equal footing, with respect and without preconditions, since what is important for us is to secure our nuclear rights."

In Washington on Thursday, President Bush seemed to describe the American offer of direct talks with Iran as much as a threat as opportunity. "The choice is up to the Iranians whether or not they're going to listen to the world demand, and if they do, we've got something to talk to them about," Mr. Bush told reporters after a cabinet meeting.

Mr. Bush, who spoke by phone with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Wednesday and President Hu Jintao of China on Thursday, also sidestepped a question on whether Russia and China had come on board with the disputed package.

Asked about Mr. Mottaki's remarks suggesting that the suspension of Iran's nuclear activities was nonnegotiable, Mr. Bush said: "We'll see whether or not that is the firm position of their government. If that's what they decide to do, then the next step, of course, will be to — for our coalition partners to go to the United Nations Security Council."

Neither Mr. Mottaki nor Mr. Asefi has the authority to make policy. Still, their statements are important because they reflect efforts by Iran, like the United States, to inch away from old fixed positions that the other side is not worth dealing with.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, long rejected contacts with the United States, branding those who seek reconciliation "simpletons and traitors." But recently he has approved the idea of talking to Washington about Iraq, if there was respect for mutual interests.

Behind the scenes, Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, urged Iran to embrace the American offer. In a telephone conversation Wednesday evening with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Dr. ElBaradei described the overture as "very significant" and told Iran "to seize the opportunity of talking to Washington," an agency spokeswoman, Melissa Fleming, said.

Although all countries agreed to the initiative, the major gap was one that has been there since the beginning: the insistence by the United States and the Europeans that Iran must be punished by the Security Council if it does not change its behavior, and the counterargument by Russia and China that the best way to win concessions — at least at this point — is through engagement.

Although the Europeans had argued against holding such a high-level, high-profile meeting without closing the gaps in lower-level negotiating and guaranteeing success, the United States insisted that the meeting was important to underscore the gravity of the issue and to keep up the negotiating momentum.

DOJ_NMG_0031565

The Americans are still resisting formulas giving Iran security guarantees that it would not be the target of a military attack. The Europeans say that without such assurances, Iran will proceed with the pursuit of a nuclear weapons program despite its longstanding denials that it has that intention.

However, the Americans are willing to consider the waiving of some longstanding sanctions on Iran to allow it eventually to buy new civilian airplanes and to gain access to modern light-water reactors for civilian nuclear power, with Russia and the West controlling access to the fuel.

U.S., Major Powers Agree On Incentives For Iran (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

The U.S. and five major powers agreed to a "far reaching" package of incentives to induce Iran to suspend its pursuit of nuclear technologies, and pledged coercive measures through the United Nations if Tehran doesn't comply.

The announcement by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members, plus Germany, sought to buttress a pledge by the Bush administration to engage directly with Iran should it agree to give up uranium enrichment work. European leaders said the agreement reached yesterday provides Tehran with a clear path to reintegrating with the global community should it agree to talk.

Diplomats also said the dialogue format with Iran could be broadened down the road to include not only the U.S., but also China and Russia, which are viewed as crucial to pressuring Iran. To date, only Britain, France, Germany -- the so-called EU-3 -- have engaged Tehran over its nuclear program.

"We have agreed a set of far-reaching proposals as a basis for discussions with Iran," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said after a meeting in Vienna among Germany and the members of the Permanent Five: France, Britain, the U.S., Russia and China. "We believe that they offer Iran the chance to reach a negotiated agreement based on cooperation."

American diplomats declined to specify the incentives or penalties that Iran might face in coming months, saying it could undermine efforts to engage Tehran. These officials said a European delegation was set to outline the package to Tehran in coming weeks and expected a response no later than mid-July, when leaders of the G-8 nations meet in Russia.

This is "a step forward in our quest to deny Iran a nuclear-weapons capability," said Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs. The talks were "by far the most substantive and the most concrete" held so far on Iran.

The announcement was tempered by continued statements from Tehran that the Iranian government was unwilling to give up its development of nuclear technologies and would talk with Washington only if there were no preconditions. "Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions but won't give up our rights," state-run Iranian television quoted Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki saying yesterday.

U.S. diplomats said they were waiting for Iran to receive the formal proposal from European leaders before assessing Tehran's future course of action. They were unwilling to state that Iran would automatically face economic sanctions should it fail to comply with the international community's demand.

Both China and Russia have expressed concern in recent months about enforcing economic sanctions against Iran. And concerns remain that Beijing or Moscow might balk at such stringent measures down the road.

President Bush, however, told reporters yesterday that he held talks with the leaders of China and Russia in recent days and now believes the international community is united to take coercive measures against Iran. "The next step of acting in concert is to go to the United Nations Security Council," Mr. Bush said.

The current fight with Iran centers on fears that Tehran is working to develop nuclear weapons, while the Iranian government says it is merely enriching uranium to fuel a civilian nuclear program. To ensure that Iran doesn't acquire nuclear weapons, the U.S. and others want to stop the domestic enrichment program and supply Iran with fuel from the outside, a proposal that Iran has rejected.

Iran and the U.S. seemed at loggerheads, as the two nations have been so often over 28 years of diplomatic silence since the Iranian revolution. Yet the leaders of the U.S. and the Islamic Republic are also eyeing each other from closer than ever before as they try to decide whether to talk directly about Iran's nuclear program.

But this doesn't mean the two countries will eventually talk, and their roller-coaster history of overtures made and spurned is evidence of that. The Iranian government almost immediately dismissed the initial U.S. offer to join talks, calling it a public-relations ploy.

Six Powers Reach Accord On Iran Plan (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031566

VIENNA, June 1 -- The United States and five other major world powers agreed Thursday to offer Iran a broad new collection of rewards if it halts its drive to master nuclear technology, but they threatened "further steps in the Security Council" if Iran refuses.

The agreement, announced here by British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett following extended talks, brings general unity to the countries' approach to Iran after months of discord, diplomats said. It is intended to sharpen the choice facing Iran, giving it a clear reason to opt for cooperation over confrontation on its nuclear program.

"There are two paths ahead," Beckett told reporters, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and counterparts from Russia, China, France, Germany and the European Union stood at her side. "We urge Iran to take the positive path and to consider seriously our substantive proposals, which would bring significant benefits."

Beckett made the announcement near midnight Tehran time. There was no immediate response from the Iranian government.

Rice, who spent more than eight hours in sometimes freewheeling talks with her counterparts Thursday, flew here after announcing a major shift in U.S. policy on Wednesday -- a willingness to join the negotiations with Iran that have been led, unsuccessfully, by Britain, France and Germany, provided Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment activities first.

Iranian diplomats on Thursday did not reject outright the U.S. proposal for talks, but they criticized the demand that their country end enrichment first.

Although details of the five- to six-page document agreed to in Vienna were not announced, incentives discussed before the meeting included an international effort to assist Iran's nuclear industry, including construction of a light-water reactor and guarantees of a long-term supply of fuel. That would represent a significant shift from the Bush administration's past insistence that Iran has no need for nuclear power. Increased trade and investment have also been discussed.

Aides to Rice said the deal also commits China and Russia to a long list of specific steps to punish Iran if it refuses to halt its enrichment program. Both countries have resisted sanctions for months, arguing that they could backfire.

Addressing reporters here, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov emphasized the incentives in the package and did not mention possible negative measures. He said it was important that all six powers be united in making the offer, including the United States, which he said found it difficult to offer inducements to Iran.

The possible sanctions in the agreement are listed as a menu, ranging from minor to major, diplomats said. It was unclear whether there was agreement on which options to choose if Iran fails to act.

Diplomats have said that measures under discussion include an embargo on export of goods and technologies relevant to nuclear programs, the freezing of assets of organizations and people involved in the programs, and a suspension of technical cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Broader measures include a freeze on bilateral contacts, a visa and travel ban for senior Iranian officials, an arms embargo, an embargo on certain exports and an end to support for Iran's bid to join the World Trade Organization.

The Bush administration has repeatedly declared it "unacceptable" to have Iran armed with nuclear weapons. While publicly declaring that no option was "off the table," an allusion to military action, it had been struggling to organize unified diplomatic pressure against the country by all five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council.

Beckett read the brief statement after the diplomats huddled over it for two hours, fiddling with the wording. It emphasized the positive, while using vague code words for tough action, which U.S. officials said stemmed from a desire to persuade Iran to return to negotiations. Even speaking anonymously, U.S. officials repeatedly refused to characterize the possible punishments for Iran as "sanctions," using words such as "steps," "measures," "actions" and "negative disincentives."

"We are prepared to resume negotiations should Iran resume suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, as required by the IAEA, and we would also suspend action in the Security Council," Beckett said.

Representatives of some of the countries involved -- but not the United States -- will present the package to Iran in the "coming days," and an answer is expected before the Group of Eight industrialized countries meet in St. Petersburg in mid-July, a U.S. official told reporters. He said the countries had agreed not to disclose details until after Iran had received a full presentation and been allowed time to "digest it."

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said Russia and China were considering joining the United States and the Europeans in the talks with Iran.

Iran offered a mixed initial reply earlier Thursday to the Bush administration's offer to join talks on the country's nuclear program: It welcomed the opportunity to deflect confrontation while resisting demands that it suspend work on the program first.

"We believe that under the current circumstances, negotiations without any precondition would be the best solution to put an end to the Tehran-Washington logjam," said Hamid Reza Asefi, spokesman for Iran's Foreign Ministry, in an interview with the official press agency IRNA.

DOJ_NMG_0031567

Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, reiterated the proviso, telling reporters, "We won't negotiate about the Iranian nation's natural nuclear rights but are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold dialogue about common concerns."

Analysts and diplomats described the responses as preliminary. The most powerful elements of Iran's theocratic government remained silent on the U.S. proposal and were said to be intensely engaged in the private consultations that precede major policy announcements in Tehran.

The measured tenor of the Iranian diplomats' initial replies appeared to signal that their country was at least not dismissing the start of a process it had actively solicited in recent weeks, through back-channel messages seeking direct engagement with Washington. But one analyst in regular contact with the Tehran government said the full response would reflect skepticism about Bush's sincerity.

"The perception here is basically that the U.S. did what it did in response to domestic pressure inside the U.S., and also to convince the Russians and Chinese" to back stronger pressure on Iran, said Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University.

He predicted Iran's final response would stop short of obliging the Americans but go far enough to convince Moscow or Beijing of its good intentions. It might include steps such as suspending the installation of the next two enrichment systems and letting U.N. inspectors conduct snap inspections for the duration of the negotiations.

Six Nations Agree On Incentives For Nuke Cooperation (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan And George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 2, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- Six world powers agreed yesterday to offer Iran a new choice of rewards if it gives up its suspected nuclear activities or punishment if it refuses, a gambit that could either defuse a global confrontation with the Islamic regime or hasten one.

"There are two paths ahead," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in announcing agreement among the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China on a package for Iran that carries the threat of United Nations' sanctions.

The package would be on the table for a proposed new round of bargaining with Tehran over what the United States and its allies call a rogue nuclear program that could produce a bomb.

After a meeting of officials from the six powers, Mrs. Beckett said, "We urge Iran to take the positive path" and promised to suspend Security Council action against Tehran if it agrees to halt enrichment.

At the White House, President Bush warned that the confrontation would end up at the U.N. Security Council if Iran continues to enrich uranium.

"If they continue their obstinance, if they continue to say to the world, 'We really don't care what your opinion is,' then the world is going to act in concert," Mr. Bush said after meeting with his Cabinet.

In a major policy shift, the U.S. agreed this week to join those talks if Iran suspends its uranium-enrichment program. It would be the first major public negotiations between the adversaries in more than a quarter century.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with the foreign ministers from Britain, France and Germany, the three European nations that led talks with Iran. Those talks stalled last year. Also present were representatives of Russia and China, which have been Tehran's trading partners and could join in any future talks with Iran.

Because Russia and China hold vetoes in the U.N. Security Council, the U.S. needs their cooperation to seek sanctions or other harsh measures by that body.

"We are very satisfied by the results of today's meetings here in Vienna," U.S. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns told reporters. "We consider them a step forward in our quest to deny Iran nuclear-weapons capability."

A short statement issued by foreign ministers from the six powers and the European Union did not mention economic sanctions -- the punishment or deterrent favored by the United States and that Iran has sought to avoid.

The powers agreed privately, however, that Iran could face tough U.N. Security Council sanctions if it fails to give up the enrichment of uranium and other disputed nuclear activities, U.S. officials said.

Diplomats feared Iran would immediately reject any invitation to bargain if the threat of sanctions was explicit, officials involved in the discussions said on the condition of anonymity because the negotiations of the major powers were private.

The foreign ministers' statement threatens unspecified "further steps" in the Security Council.

If Iran returned to the talks stalled since last year, "we would also suspend action in the Security Council," Mrs. Beckett said.

DOJ_NMG_0031568

The Security Council, which can levy mandatory global sanctions and back its mandates with military force, has been reviewing Iran's case for two months. Its permanent, veto-holding members -- U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China -- have been at odds over the possibility of sanctions.

On Wednesday, Iran's foreign minister welcomed the idea of direct talks with the United States but rebuffed the U.S. condition that Tehran first must suspend uranium enrichment.

"Iran welcomes dialogue under just conditions but won't give up our rights," the state-run Iranian television quoted Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki as saying yesterday.

Mr. Mottaki's statement, issued as Miss Rice was arriving in Austria, was the country's first direct reaction to the U.S. offer.

"We won't negotiate about the Iranian nation's natural nuclear rights, but we are prepared, within a defined, just framework and without any discrimination, to hold dialogue about common concerns," he said.

Over A Barrel (WSJ)

By William P. Kucewicz

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, in signaling a new U.S. willingness to negotiate with Iran, also warned that "international isolation and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions" would follow if Tehran defies its international obligations by continuing to develop nuclear weapons. Although the likelihood of those sanctions increased yesterday after the Iranian regime rejected the U.S. offer, it has been the threat of such sanctions, and the crippling effect an international embargo would have on Iran's economy and exchequer, that have always been the likely catalysts for any possible negotiation.

There's simply no getting around the fact that you can't eat petroleum. Iran's 132.5 trillion barrels in proved oil reserves -- 10.2% of the world total -- are of little benefit unless they're earning money. A trade embargo would hit Iran especially hard, because its economy and government budget are inordinately dependent on petrodollars. Oil shipments account for about 25% of GDP, represent 90% of total export earnings and provide as much as 50% of fiscal receipts.

Further, the country imports about one-third of its gasoline. Additional gasoline supplies and other oil products are refined in Tehran from 60,000 barrels a day (bbl/d) in imported crude that arrives via pipeline from the Caspian Sea in a swap arrangement. In Iran, gasoline, like foodstuffs, is heavily subsidized -- to the tune of $3 billion this year -- as part as the regime's strategy to buy off public opinion. With gasoline retailing at just 40 cents a gallon, consumption, not surprisingly, has been growing by 8% to 10% a year.

The regime already feels the pinch of unilateral sanctions, first imposed by Bill Clinton and extended by President Bush, that forbid U.S. companies and their subsidiaries from doing business with Iran. Additionally, the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act of 1996 authorizes mandatory and discretionary sanctions against non-U.S. companies investing more than $20 million a year in Iran's oil and natural gas industries. The effectiveness of the restrictions can be measured by the volume of Iranian crude oil output. In the six months ended March, Iranian production was down 1.3% from a year earlier versus a comparable gain of 1.5% for OPEC, excluding Iran and Iraq. Compared with the six months ended March 2002, Iran's output in the latest six-month period was up 13.4% against a 21.7% increase for the eight members of OPEC sans Iran and Iraq.

Iran's below-average oil production is explained by a shortage of investment capital. Its 40 producing oilfields need modernizing. Recovery rates are a meager 24% to 27% compared with a 35% world average. But Iran doesn't have the capital to pay for upgrades. In fact, it has been counting on foreign investment to help it boost production from last year's 4.2 million bbl/d (of which 3.9 million bbl/d was crude oil) to a targeted five million bbl/d in 2010 and eight million bbl/d by 2015. Tehran further hopes, with foreign help, to expand its oil refining capacity by 50% to 2.2 million bbl/d by 2008. Sanctions would put the kibosh on these ambitious plans.

U.S. bans on technology transfers also have frustrated Iran's efforts to develop its massive natural gas reserves, the world's second largest. U.S. companies dominate natural gas liquefaction, and most liquefied natural gas (LNG) plants in the world use U.S.-licensed processes. Iran is limited to non-U.S. technology and so far hasn't built a single LNG facility. The cost: $11 billion in foregone annual earnings from one natural gas field alone.

What Tehran knows, and what the outside world has yet to grasp, is that an international trade embargo would hurt Iran infinitely more than it would hurt the U.S.

For oil-importing countries, even though Iran exports roughly 2.7 million bbl/d in petroleum, a complete cutoff of these shipments could be offset in large measure by increased OPEC and non-OPEC output, greatly diminishing the dreaded prospect of $100-a-barrel oil. Saudi Arabia has the most untapped capacity, in the order of 1.3 million to 1.4 million bbl/d. Other OPEC members, according to the International Energy Agency, have spare capacity of 1.1 million bbl/d, not including Iraq's estimated 700,000 bbl/d. With a total of 2.4 million to 3.1 million bbl/d in idle capacity, OPEC alone could offset a loss of Iranian exports. Furthermore, global oil consumption is anticipated to grow in the range of 1.4 million to 1.6 million bbl/d this year, while new supply is expected to increase by 1.2 million to 1.3 million bbl/d. Much of the imbalance is expected to be covered by OPEC exports of LNG.

Oil's fungibility notwithstanding, Asia in general and Japan in particular would be hardest hit by a cutoff of Iranian crude. (The U.S., Canada, Britain and Germany, among others, no longer import Iranian oil.) China has already taken steps in response to high oil prices that could lessen the effects of an Iranian trade embargo. It has eliminated tax rebates on gasoline exports, raised gasoline, diesel and jet fuel prices by 3% to 5% and levied higher taxes on larger vehicles. Chinese electric power generators, too, are scaling back on oil use.

Besides, it's not like we haven't been through this before. Following the 1991 Gulf War, Iraqi oil exports fell by some 2.3 million bbl/d to a mere 61,750 bbl/d between 1991 and 1996. Even now, Iranian exports are way below their pre-revolution high of 5.5 million bbl/d, which was equal to 19.2% of OPEC's 1974 crude and products shipments. Thirty years later, Iran shipped three million bbl/d, or 11.7% of OPEC exports. * * *

To be sure, there are other risks to global oil supply -- notably in Nigeria, Venezuela, Ecuador, Chad, Russia and Iraq. But should it be necessary, the U.S. could always play its trump card -- namely, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Established after the 1973 OPEC oil embargo, the reserve has a current inventory of 688.6 million barrels of oil, sufficient to provide about two months of U.S. import protection. Were, say, 500,000 bbl/d to be siphoned off to partially offset a loss of Iranian crude, the stockpile would last more than three-and-a-half years.

Iran doesn't have the world over a barrel. It's the other way around. The economic and fiscal squeeze of new trade sanctions could indeed become so painful as to prompt regime change.

U.S. Rejects An Invitation For Talks In North Korea (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 2, 2006

TOKYO, June 1 — North Korea on Thursday invited the top American nuclear envoy to visit its capital, Pyongyang, for bilateral talks, but the White House insisted that the North return to long-deadlocked six-nation talks instead.

North Korea invited Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state and chief negotiator in the nuclear talks, to Pyongyang, indicating that it wanted to discuss an agreement that was reached last September but never carried out.

"If the U.S. has a true political intention to implement the joint statement, we kindly invite once again the head of the U.S. side's delegation to the talks to visit Pyongyang and directly explain it to us," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement released through the official Korean Central News Agency.

North Korea agreed last September in the six-nation talks to abandon its nuclear program in return for energy assistance and security guarantees. But the agreement left unclear the issue of the sequence of events, and disputes arose immediately over whether disarmament or the award of benefits would come first.

Also, North Korea has said it will not return to the multination talks unless the United States lifts a crackdown on financial institutions dealing with the government and North Korean companies suspected of counterfeiting American dollars and laundering money. The other nations involved in the talks are China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

North Korea, which has long pushed for direct talks with the United States, issued the invitation a day after the United States offered to hold direct talks with Iran over its nuclear program. Washington has shifted away from decades of refusing to hold direct talks with Tehran, though the United States included the precondition that Iran suspend its uranium activities.

"The United States is not going to engage in bilateral negotiations with the government of North Korea," said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. "The United States sticks by its position, which is, North Korea has to return to the six-party talks."

The United States and the North, which engaged in direct talks in the past, reached an accord in 1994 that called for the installation of two civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and other assistance after the North abandoned its nuclear program. The accord broke down after American officials accused the North in the fall of 2002 of engaging in a secret uranium enrichment program.

The six-nation talks began in the summer of 2003. The United States has consistently rejected North Korea's request for bilateral talks, though informal talks between American and North Korean officials have taken place on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations.

In its statement on Thursday, North Korea reiterated that it would not return to the talks unless economic sanctions were lifted. The sanctions, which are opposed by China and South Korea, are said to have squeezed the North financially. Banks around the world have limited their dealings with North Korea, concerned that they would be blacklisted by the United States.

N Korea Invites US Nuclear Negotiator For Talks (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0031570

By Anna Fifield In Seoul

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Pyongyang on Thursday invited Christopher Hill, Washington's top negotiator in the six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear crisis, to visit for bilateral discussions, saying the US must prove its commitment to resolving the prolonged impasse.

It again called for the US to drop the financial sanctions that have crippled cash-strapped North Korea's ability to trade with the outside world.

"If the US has made a political decision to truly carry out the joint declaration, we again invite the chief delegate to the six-party talks to visit Pyongyang and personally explain [the US position] to us," the state-run Korean Central News Agency quoted an unnamed foreign ministry spokesman as saying.

With the move, North Korea again demonstrated its capacity for wily negotiating as the invitation is unlikely to be accepted, enabling Kim Jong-il's regime to blame further the stand-off on the Bush administration.

Although Mr Hill held talks with his North Korean counterpart on the sidelines of the September round of negotiations and has previously signalled willingness to travel to Pyongyang, he was restricted from meeting Kim Kye-gwan at a security forum in Tokyo earlier this year as Washington takes an increasingly harder line.

The September talks led to an agreement for all six parties to work towards the North's nuclear disarmament, but this was soon overshadowed by an increasingly acrimonious dispute over Pyongyang's financial activities.

Washington has cracked down on eight North Korean companies and a Macao bank it accuses distributing counterfeit dollars and laundering money earned illicitly.

The North Korean spokesman said the US had violated the spirit of the September agreement because the parties had agreed to hold increased bilateral and multilateral contacts to create a favourable atmosphere for the talks.

"The US will never find a solution to the problem if it continues to shun sitting with its dialogue partner while calling for the resolution of important issues such as the nuclear issue through discussions," he said.

The US has repeatedly said the sanctions are merely a way to protect its financial system and are unrelated to the nuclear issue.

"There's an awful lot in the September agreement that benefits North Korea, and frankly I don't understand why [North Korea] isn't coming back," Mr Hill said last week after talks in Beijing with Wu Dawei, the Chinese negotiator.

Despite efforts by Mr Hill, Mr Wu and South Korea's Chun Yong-woo to restart the talks, analysts say the negotiations are again on the brink of collapse as Pyongyang and Washington each wait for the other to give in first.

Bush To Welcome Congo's Sassou-Nguesso (AFP)

AFP, June 1, 2006

US President George W. Bush will welcome Congo's President Denis Sassou-Nguesso June 5 for talks on efforts to keep peace in Sudan's Darfur region, the White House said.

"The two leaders will discuss implementation of the May 5, 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement, NATO assistance to strengthen the African Union Mission in Sudan and the follow-on UN mission, United Nations authorization to promptly transition to a UN peacekeeping force," said Bush spokesman Tony Snow.

Bush and Sassou-Nguesso, who currently chairs the African Union (AU), will also discuss "ways to strengthen democracy and improve the lives of the Congolese people," said Snow.

Earlier, the African Union expressed "deep regret" that holdout Darfur rebel groups had failed to meet a midnight Wednesday deadline to sign a peace deal for the troubled western Sudanese region.

The peace deal aims to end three years of conflict in Darfur, which has left some 300,000 people dead and 2.4 million homeless.

It calls for a more equitable distribution of power and wealth, the disarming of the pro-government Janjaweed militias and a referendum on the future of Darfur.

But the holdouts say the accord fails to address their concerns and have refused to sign on unless substantial changes are made.

Washington And Beijing Stoke Nuclear Fears (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary, arrives in Singapore today for a three-day conference on Asia security issues that is likely to include much discussion about China following the release last month of his department's annual report on the Chinese military.

DOJ_NMG_0031571

The Pentagon drew plenty of attention last week when it suggested that US defence analysts had been surprised by changes in the capacity of China's nuclear deterrent, including the "pace and scope of its [nuclear] strategic forces modernisation".

It is not entirely clear what surprises the Pentagon was referring to since the unclassified version of the report provided few details about new developments. However, the highlighting of concerns about Chinese nuclear intentions was a reminder of the possibility for mutual miscalculation between the world's most powerful country and its most populous.

While there has been a surprising lack of nuclear competition between the US and China since Beijing exploded its first atomic device in 1964, recent signals from both sides have increased fears that they might succumb to the temptations of a new arms race.

Peter Brookes, a defence analyst at the Heritage Foundation and former Pentagon official on Asia issues, says the US and China are not "at that point right now".

But he says the increased mobility of China's nuclear forces and their desire to arm submarines is causing concern in the Pentagon.

Many Chinese observers bristle at what they see as the hypocrisy of expressions of concern from the US - which has about 10,000 strategic and tactical nuclear warheads - at a Chinese arsenal generally estimated to total less than 400.

"I do not know why they should feel surprised. Why do they assume that China should have weaker nuclear forces?" says Shen Dingli, an expert on international relations at Shanghai's Fudan University.

The Pentagon report cited China's long-standing plans to add mobile DF-31 intercontinental ballistic missiles to its current old and small arsenal of about 20 silo-based intercontinental ballistic missiles able to hit the US.

The Pentagon's focus on long-range, precision conventional weapons concerns Chinese strategic thinkers, since they could be used to launch a pre-emptive strike.

US enthusiasm for anti-missile defences means that China is likely to need more missiles or warheads to have any confidence that at least some could get through such a shield. But Larry Wortzel, a former military attaché in Beijing and now chairman of the US-China Commission, says China has been increasing its nuclear forces long before the US started looking seriously at missile defence.

"We must hold America effectively hostage, because we are being effectively held hostage by America, and we need to strike a balance - even if it is asymmetrical," says Mr Shen.

Mr Shen was mentioned in the Pentagon report as offering evidence of a possible rethinking of China's long-standing stated policy of "No First Use" of nuclear weapons. The Fudan University academic does indeed think the No First Use policy should be adjusted to take into account the possibility of a conventional attack intended to eliminate China's nuclear forces - but he insists this is a personal view not part of any wider debate.

The Pentagon has stronger evidence of a policy discussion in the comments of Chinese General Zhu Chenghu, who last year said Beijing might have to use nuclear weapons against the US if attacked during a confrontation over Taiwan.

The Chinese government assured Mr Rumsfeld in October that Gen Zhu was speaking in a private capacity. But the fact that he has been allowed to keep his job, following an administrative punishment, has fed US concerns that the No First Use policy is more rhetorical than doctrinal.

Li Bin, director of the Arms Control Programme at Beijing's Tsinghua University, argues that China's nuclear strategy has always been based on an assumption that the "nuclear taboo" ensures the US will not actually use its atomic weapons.

The greater risk is that possession of nuclear force might make policymakers rash about the use ofconventional force, Prof Li says. "Some kind of nuclear escalation could still develop," he says. "It is a danger, but it's not the number one danger."

Rift Clouds Asian Defense Talks (WSJ)

By Barry Wain

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Asian-Pacific defense ministers meet here this weekend at a time of deteriorating political relations between Japan and China.

While the U.S. has recently stepped up its criticism of Chinese military spending, some Asian countries have become alarmed about an increasingly nationalistic Japan. Government-to-government ties between a rapidly rising China and Japan, the established regional power, are at their lowest point in decades, despite strong economic links.

Although the U.S. has a major presence in the region, "the defining relationship in East Asia will be between China and Japan," said Rodolfo Severino, former secretary-general of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. "Unfortunately, they just don't like each other, and they sense a certain rivalry."

Defense ministers, military chiefs and senior officials from 22 countries, including the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and the 10 Asean members, will attend the two-day talks. The event has taken place every year since 2002. Nongovernmental security specialists from Europe, the U.S. and Asia also take part.

The forum, organized by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies, allows participants to conduct informal defense consultations and bilateral exchanges, as well as roundtable discussions. A Malaysian proposal to improve maritime security in the Malacca Strait by deploying multinational air patrols -- so-called eyes-in-the-sky -- was taken up at last year's meeting and has since been introduced by Indonesia, Singapore and Malaysia.

Tim Huxley, an IISS official, said one item arising from last year's debates is on the agenda this year: the role of major powers in Asia, and the part Asian powers might play in global security arrangements. Attention is expected to focus on China, India and Japan, he said.

The U.S. delegation will be led by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who used last year's gathering to question China's increased defense spending. Since then, U.S. officials have repeatedly criticized Beijing for annual double-digit growth in defense expenditure and for not being "more transparent" about it.

Although a U.S. Defense Department report in May again warned that China is rapidly extending its military reach with more long-range aircraft and weapons that could pose a threat to neighbors, few Asian governments seem worried -- except Japan, which has echoed Washington's concerns. Some security experts say a number of Asian governments are disturbed by China's expanding military capability but don't want to speak up for fear of offending Beijing.

"There are Southeast Asian countries that are unsure about China's long-term intentions," said Amitav Archarya, deputy director of the Institute of Defense and Strategic Studies in Singapore. "They don't mind the U.S. raising the issue."

Similarly, while most countries in the region haven't publicly taken sides in the China-Japan rift, Southeast Asia tends to be critical of Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi for visiting a World War II shrine containing the name of war criminals. Southeast Asia has a negative view of Japan's conduct during the war and thinks Tokyo "should be wiser," said Sheng Lijun, a scholar from China who works on international relations at the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies in Singapore.

China Urges Foreigners To Look Beyond Its Big Cities (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, June 2, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese officials have settled on a new mantra in meetings with visiting foreign dignitaries: You've seen Beijing and Shanghai. Now it's time to go out to the countryside and see our tired, our poor, our huddled masses yearning to be fed.

Behind the polite invitation is a more substantive message. Namely, you may view us as a strategic threat poised to steal your jobs, drive up your gas prices and take over the world. But take a peek beyond the tall buildings and bright lights and you'll have more sympathy for our problems. And then maybe, just maybe, you won't be so hard on us.

"You should visit outside Shanghai and Beijing," Cai Wu, director of the information office of the State Council, China's Cabinet, told a group of newspaper editors in Beijing recently. "It's like visiting the house of a friend. The first time you stay in the living room. But next time, after you become better friends, you go into the kitchen and the basement."

Tang Jiaxuan, state councilor and a member of the Communist Party's Central Committee, also waxed metaphoric.

"When you go to the countryside, you will understand why Chinese say they are firmly walking on the road to peaceful development," Tang said in an interview last week at Zhongnanhai, the national seat of power. "China is not a country that hides its skeletons in the drawer."

Even on trips abroad, officials are making the pitch for a visit to the Chinese sticks. In Los Angeles this week, Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan reminded business leaders who may have been to Shanghai and Beijing that the masses of rural poor in China make less than half of the $4,557 of an urban Beijing dweller.

Encouraging influential foreigners to have a "Green Acres" moment not only helps outsiders better understand China in all its complexity, it also makes tactical sense.

Beijing hopes to send a couple of messages. One is that its record $202-billion trade surplus with the United States last year may look huge but doesn't amount to all that much when divided by 1.3 billion people. A second is that China has too many domestic problems and is too focused on political stability to menace its neighbors.

"The government's old way of thinking was related to traditional culture, a concern with 'face' and presenting the best side to outsiders," said Xiao Gongqin, a history professor at Shanghai Normal University. "Now we'd like Western countries to see that China is lagging far behind. It's far, far from becoming a threat."

The perception gap was on display last week after the release of a Pentagon report saying that China is rapidly extending its military reach, allowing it to compete with the U.S. and pose a potential threat to other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0031573

Beijing strongly rejected those conclusions, arguing that its buildup is merely defensive. It accused Washington of Cold War-era thinking.

Beijing's call on foreigners to get a look at Chinese farmers living in squalor is also a sign of China's growing self-assurance. After all, it wasn't so long ago that officials rushed to hide even the smallest of blemishes, wary of leaving the impression that Chinese socialism was anything but perfect.

"China is much more confident," said Wang Yiwei, an American specialist at Fudan University. "It's rising, but it's eager to say it's not rising so much. And it has a point. While Shanghai is China's New York, the countryside is China's Africa."

Howard Snyder, a U.S. businessman who first came to China in 1981 to learn the language, recalls how tightly controlled the country was in those days. Foreigners were required to register before traveling even short distances, with trips to the countryside limited to Potemkin-style model villages.

In 1982, while studying at Beijing Normal University, Snyder slipped away to nearby Hebei province during the Chinese New Year break to experience a bit of rural life. The sort of visit officials now welcome was viewed at the time with great suspicion, prompting police to excoriate the university minder charged with watching over Snyder and other foreigners.

"There was both a fear of being seen as backward and a desire to avoid any foreign contact you might be accused of," Snyder said. "There's a Chinese expression, 'Once bitten by a snake, you're afraid of a rope for the next 10 years.' " After the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution, a reign of terror when outside influence and Chinese tradition were demonized, "there was a real lingering fear of foreign contact," he said.

Years of rapid economic growth, an increasing number of foreign leaders knocking on its door and China's growing role as a global player have made China far more open and less reflexive about criticism.

"It's a complete shift," said David Ben Kay, an American lawyer working for a U.S. software company who first came to China in the late 1980s.

All politics are local, in China as elsewhere, and the recent invitations to experience China's countryside also dovetail with a major initiative by the administration of President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

The message to get beyond Shanghai subtly distinguishes the new leadership team from former President Jiang Zemin, a Shanghai booster whose policies benefited the moneyed, high-tech and glitzy. It also falls in line with Hu and Wen's focus on rural problems, migrant workers, the rich-poor gap and those left behind.

"It's entirely consistent with the line from the top," said Patrick Horgan, Beijing-based managing director with a consulting company and a longtime China resident. "And it's for the good. If people form their view of China from the China World and St. Regis hotels and from being whisked around in motorcades, they miss the bigger story."

China is increasingly welcoming not only potential friends but some of its harshest critics to poke around for themselves.

Early this year, it invited Sens. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., for a visit after the two drafted a bill to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on all Chinese goods imported to the U.S. unless Beijing agreed to revalue its currency. Critics say China's yuan is undervalued, giving its companies an unfair trade advantage.

Back in Washington the following week, the senators agreed to postpone a vote on the bill until September on the grounds that Beijing had assured them it was serious about currency reform.

That prompted a familiar refrain.

"I think with Senators Schumer and Graham's visit to China, both sides have a better understanding of each other's views," a senior Chinese official told a small group of U.S. reporters in advance of Hu's trip to Washington in April.

"It's just a pity that, given the brief visit by the senators, there was no time to visit the impoverished Western areas."

Opec Unites Against Venezuelan Rhetoric (FT)

By Carola Hoyos And Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, June 2, 2006

Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's populist president, on Thursday angered Opec ministers with anti-US rhetoric as they united against him in rejecting his call to cut the oil cartel's production.

Overcoming Venezuelan objections, the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, at a meeting in Caracas hosted by Mr Chávez, decided to keep pumping at nearly maximum capacity. Opec produces 30m barrels a day of oil, about 40 per cent of the world's total output. Earlier this week Venezuela called for a cut in Opec production of 500,000 to 1m b/d.

"We are third world countries, nations that have suffered colonialism for years, we are countries that are condemned by much more powerful states," Mr Chávez told the meeting. "The US president is a danger for the world," he said, echoing his regular criticism of US foreign policy.

Opec ministers did not criticise their host openly. Shokri Ghanem, Libya's energy minister, said: "The most important thing in life is to listen, not necessarily to agree."

DOJ_NMG_0031574

Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil producer, has led the cartel's efforts to counter attempts by Venezuela and Iran to use Opec as a tool against the US, Opec's biggest customer. Venezuela backed the idea of selling oil in euros instead of in dollars, a proposal which was supported by Iran but rejected by other members.

Oil prices are at near-record highs and a reduction in Opec's output would have led to a further rally, analysts said. They warned this could have undermined world economic growth and pushed up inflation.

Using Opec to further his cause of oil nationalism, Mr Chávez backed Bolivia to join the group as an observer member, and Ecuador, a member from 1973-1992, to rejoin as a full member. Both South American countries have moved to wrest more control of energy from international companies.

Joseph Stanislaw, president of J A Stanislaw group, the consulting firm, said: "The enlargement of Opec is a natural extension of the energy nationalism we see in the world today. The high prices are encouraging every oil-rich country to find ways to maximise their resources revenue."

Pushed by Nigeria, Opec's biggest African member, Angola and Sudan are also considering joining the group. The two sub-Saharan countries together produce more than 1.5m barrels of oil a day. International oil companies have invested billions in Angola and oppose its membership.

If oil prices fell and Opec decided to reduce its quota level, Angola would have to ask oil companies to forgo revenues. Sudan would have to do the same to the Chinese groups that dominate its industry.

OPEC Decides Not To Cut Production Quotas (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, June 2, 2006

Ministers from the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries said at their meeting in Venezuela yesterday that the oil group that produces 40 percent of the world's oil would keep its production quotas unchanged at 28 million barrels a day.

"At this level of prices, the market is very sensitive," Qatar's Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah told reporters in Caracas yesterday, Bloomberg News reported. "We have to be very careful. We don't want the price to get out of control."

But oil traders and analysts took little comfort from OPEC's commitment, noting that the cushion between world supply and demand remained uncomfortably thin. Moreover, they said, the oil producers were unlikely to reduce output when they could cash in on record high prices that many consumers think are already out of control.

"Nobody expected that at these prices they'd cut back," said Edward Morse, executive adviser of Hess Energy Trading Co. in New York.

The only OPEC member pushing for cuts in output quotas was the meeting's host, Venezuela, but oil traders noted that Venezuela probably favored a cut in quotas because it has been unable to produce enough oil to meet its share of the organization's quota allotments. Morse estimated that Venezuela, OPEC's third-largest producer, was falling at least 300,000 barrels a day short of its quota because of technical problems it has had since an oil workers strike three years ago and more recent disputes with foreign operators.

Crude oil for July delivery fell 95 cents, but still remained high at $70.34 a barrel.

Sensitive to charges that they have helped drive up oil prices, some OPEC ministers pointed to speculators and traders who are too worried about tension between the United States and Iran over Tehran's nuclear program. Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali al-Naimi, said yesterday that the crude oil market was "oversupplied and overpriced," Bloomberg reported. Al-Naimi said world supply exceeds demand by about 1 million barrels a day.

Some investors agree. The manager of one European hedge fund said in a recent interview that he thought the world was "awash in oil."

Others don't see it that way. "There comes a point every year in the second quarter where supply is ahead of demand," said Jacques Rousseau, an oil analyst with Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group Inc. "It's a seasonal thing. We're out of the winter heating season and not yet in the summer driving season."

"It's in OPEC countries' interest to say that supply is not the problem and that OPEC is living up to its responsibility," said Morse, who noted that May is the month when demand is weakest. "Therefore, they say, it must be something else: speculators, a risk premium or a lack of refining capacity. But clearly the lack of production capacity is a factor in keeping prices as high as they've been."

Most OPEC countries can do little to bring prices down, however. The organization has limited excess production capacity and most of it is in Saudi Arabia, which says it could produce 1.8 million barrels more a day. But even there, about 800,000 barrels a day of that extra supply cannot be used at most of the world's refineries because of its low quality.

Meanwhile, demand continues to run strong. The Energy Department yesterday released figures showing that U.S. demand for gasoline has been running 0.9 percent above last year, despite high prices. U.S. gasoline consumption accounts for roughly 9 million barrels a day, of total world demand of about 85 million barrels a day.

Although the International Energy Agency this year trimmed its estimate for the growth in world oil demand, it still expects an increase of 1.2 million barrels a day.

Rousseau said he expects the oil-market balance to remain tight for years, regardless of what OPEC does.

"Prices will drift down to mid-60s this year and stay at that level next year because world economic conditions are softening somewhat. But it won't be until the next decade that we really drive down the price," he said.

OPEC Keeps Its Formal Output Aims (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree And David Luhnow

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

CARACAS -- With oil prices still above $70 a barrel, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries left its oil-output targets unchanged as expected. But behind the scenes, some major exporters already have begun making moves to effectively trim oil supply, said delegates attending the meeting.

The cartel didn't take up the hawkish call by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez to formally cut output, set a price ceiling of "infinity" or shift the pricing of petroleum to euros instead of dollars. Qatari oil minister Abdullah bin Hamad Al-Attiyah said yesterday OPEC ministers had decided to leave output unchanged.

U.S. benchmark crude settled at $70.34 a barrel, down 95 cents, or 1.3%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

But some analysts estimate that oil supply from OPEC nations is already well below the formal output quota of 28 million barrels a day, excluding Iraq, and is running as much as one million barrels a day less than a year ago. Led by Saudi Arabia, the cartel last year opted to pump full-throttle to fatten up oil inventories globally to meet growing demand, which is at about 84 million barrels a day.

The Saudis are producing less oil, say cartel officials. Saudi and Iranian producers, through a pricing mechanism that either encourages or discourages buyers, also have taken steps to reduce the amount of oil that reaches the market, the officials said. The declines -- which are also in part due to supply disruptions like political strife -- haven't been announced and haven't shown up in official figures.

The reason for the cutbacks: While oil use is rising, global inventories are flush. This is causing concern in OPEC that if investors cut back on heavy purchases of oil futures, prices could fall precipitously.

Underscoring those concerns, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi said yesterday the oil market is both oversupplied and overpriced, adding that the OPEC heavyweight is seeing no extra demand from its customers for oil, especially for heavy crude that's more difficult to refine into fuels like gasoline. "Nobody wants heavy oil," he said.

Oil ministers are saying oil prices are being driven up by financial investors, not by fundamentals of supply and demand. "Oil could drop to $40 a barrel" if hedge and pension funds decide the price has peaked and redirect money into other markets, said one senior delegate from a major Middle Eastern country.

Such worries may seem misplaced at a time when the world economy is using up more oil. OPEC's leaders reply that they have seen oil markets turn quickly in the past. In the late 1990s, prices plunged below $11 a barrel as Asian economies tanked when inventories were high. While markets can turn on a dime, curtailing production and reducing inventory can take months.

As a result, key OPEC members are adjusting their production and deliveries downward to preclude further, price-threatening increases in consumer stockpiles of oil, thus preparing for the day when markets turn against them. But they are doing so quietly, because of consumer anger over high prices at the pump. As a whole, OPEC's output has fallen by about 600,000 compared with less than a year ago, at about 27.3 million barrels a day excluding Iraq, according to PFC Energy, a Washington oil-consulting company. That doesn't include oil pumped but put in storage instead of sold. Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela and Nigeria are all producing less than they did a year ago.

"They're starting to draw down hefty crude stocks" world-wide, said Roger Diwan, a PFC analyst, on the sidelines of the OPEC meeting. "This will position them better for any downturn in price or demand."

Some of the decline, say OPEC officials, results from an attempt by Saudi Arabia and Iran to keep world oil supplies in check. They are doing this by opting not to discount heavy, high-sulfur grades of crude oil. These fuels are hard to sell during the summer, when refiners seek lighter grades that yield more gasoline when refined.

The Saudi decline -- estimated by PFC at some 200,000 barrels a day -- is recent. And because some of the oil is being stored, including on tankers, the reduced supply isn't showing up in output data compiled by various organizations, including the Paris-based International Energy Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0031576

Acknowledging that Iran is building up stores of oil, a senior Iranian delegate said his country isn't alone in having trouble finding buyers for heavy, high-sulfur grades of crude oil. "Anybody who has oil of less than 30 API can't find buyers," the official said, referring to the American Petroleum Institute's gravity scale for oil, in which a number below 30 signifies heavier grades.

Colombia's Window Of Opportunity (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Liberty lovers across the Western Hemisphere are cheering Colombian President Alvaro Uribe's second-term victory on Sunday. Colombians gave their president more than 62% of the vote. His closest competitor, the hard-left Carlos Gaviria, whose platform mirrored the ideology of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, earned only 22%. Pro-Uribe parties also won a majority in Congress.

The Uribe win is not only an endorsement of a worldview favoring security, the rule of law and global engagement for Colombia. It is also evidence of a backlash against the economic isolation and hostility toward private property preached by Mr. Gaviria and Mr. Chávez next door. As such it casts a ray of hope on the Andean region, which has been trending toward left-wing, authoritarian populism of late.

Now comes the hard part. To secure Colombian democracy, Mr. Uribe's second term will have to go beyond the success he managed in beating back guerrilla forces around the country and stabilizing the economy in his first term. Second-term success will require equal boldness in economic reform so that Colombia might attract more capital, bring underground economic activity into the legal sector, begin to grow at its potential and provide economic mobility.

The Colombian corporate tax regime may be the country's single most pernicious policy error. It is also easily correctable by introducing a single, low corporate rate, an idea that is spreading rapidly in Eastern Europe and has proven to stimulate growth and reduce corruption. Were Mr. Uribe to embrace it, he would score an early reform victory that would have a huge payoff. Failure to seize the moment will mean a missed opportunity that is not likely to present itself again. Just ask Mexican President Vicente Fox what happens when political capital is not spent.

A low corporate rate goes against the tired old saw that high taxes on entrepreneurs make society fair, even though this model has left Latin America in poverty. But bucking conventional wisdom is Mr. Uribe's trademark. When he was first a candidate for the 2002 elections, Colombia was overrun with guerrilla terror while the terrorists enjoyed a jungle safe-haven the size of Switzerland, courtesy of the government as an olive branch toward peace. The status quo favored this concession even though the rebels warred on, using the area to store weapons, hold hostages and organize assaults against the civilian population. Washington and Colombian "experts" counseled this perpetual "peace process," while the human carnage wrought by guerrillas was mounting weekly.

Mr. Uribe saw things differently and said so: Appeasement of terrorists was making things worse. That observation got him elected and when he took office he ended the safe-haven policy, beefed up the military and sent a message to the rebels that the Colombian people would defend themselves. Four years later, Colombia has not only regained lost territory but it has also recovered national confidence.

Now Mr. Uribe has the chance to do the same thing with the economy that he did with security: break with conventional wisdom and forge a new path. His economic team has already accomplished some microeconomic reform and Colombia was named one of the world's most-improved business environments by the World Bank two years ago. Improved security has paid off in increasing investment. Yet the massive underground economy remains, holding back the productivity gains essential for development. With GDP growth still averaging below 5% annually, much more has to be done to lower the cost of complying with the law so that entrepreneurs can afford to come out of the informal shadows.

The economic eyesore is tax policy, according to the bank's annual "Doing Business" report, which ranks Colombia at the bottom of the pile (148 out of 155 countries) in the category of "paying taxes." According to the report, full compliance for a medium-sized business involves an administrative burden of 432 hours and 54 payments annually. The survey further finds that "total tax payable" amounts to more than 75% of gross profit.

That's not nearly as bad as Brazilian or Bolivian tax policy but it's a world away from Estonia -- where compliance means 11 payments a year taking 104 hours and costing less than 40% of gross profit -- or Ireland where there are eight payments annually that take 76 hours at a cost of just over 45% of gross profit.

How can the lower costs in Ireland and Estonia be explained? Easy: Both have low, flat corporate rates. Ireland's is 12.5%; Estonia's is zero on retained profits. Compare this to Colombia's 35% rate and its mishmash of loopholes. Simplification means fewer filing headaches and less corruption. Tax revenues have soared in flat tax countries as businesses invest more and comply more readily. The economic effect is more employment and more funding for infrastructure and social programs serving the truly needy.

DOJ_NMG_0031577

Ireland, which for more than a century lived one of the world's most tragic emigration stories, is now experiencing net immigration and is a richer country than the United Kingdom. Estonia has one of the most competitive business environments in Europe and from 2001-2004 its average per capita growth rate was 6.7%.

Of course, any attempt at such a free-market tax policy will meet with a lot of reasons about why it can't work. Mr. Uribe could prepare for this by listening to former Estonian Prime Minister Mart Laar who won the Cato Institute's Milton Friedman Prize in April for his role in breaking the regulatory and tax shackles on his country and making it one of the world's superstar economies.

The humble Estonian has plenty of horror stories about living under Soviet rule. But he also notes that once the reformers came to power, economic freedom faced a different enemy. "The Western experts," he says, often advised his economic team against deep and rapid liberalization.

It is likely that Mr. Uribe is also encountering naysayers. The State Department is famous for its arm-twisting bureaucrats who push steeply progressive tax schedules. But Mr. Laar has the moral authority and his counsel is clear: Do it and do it fast and don't let "experts" talk you out of it.

The battle for security will continue but as Colombian economist Mauricio Cardenas said recently, "It's a mistake to think that the conflict must first be resolved for the economy to grow. We need economic growth in order to resolve the conflict." To meet that goal there may be no single policy as powerful as the corporate flat tax.

WHO Stumped By Indonesian Bird Flu Cluster (AFP)

By Marianne Kearney

AFP, June 2, 2006

The World Health Organisation (WHO) has admitted it was having difficulty identifying the source of bird flu infection in a case where seven people in the same family died of the virus.

The case in North Sumatra, Indonesia's largest cluster to date, has raised fears of human-to-human transmission of the virus, which has raised the spectre of a deadly global flu pandemic.

"There are three possible sources of infection, but there is no conclusion," WHO epidemiologist Steve Bjorge told reporters at a joint press conference with Indonesian health ministry officials in Jakarta Thursday.

"It's difficult to get good information from that village, and that family," he said. "Previously it had been good."

Indonesia has the world's second highest number of fatal human bird flu cases after Vietnam with 36 -- and the highest number of deaths this year globally.

The WHO has said that it could not rule out the possibility of human-to-human transmission in the North Sumatra case, where 54 people who came into close contact with the family are currently under voluntary quarantine.

Bjorge said the first family member to contract avian flu, a 37-year-old woman, could have been infected by her sick chickens, by chicken faeces used as fertiliser, or at the wet market where chickens are sold.

However, as two of the woman's chickens had fallen sick prior to her death, there was a strong possibility that the sick fowl were to blame, he said.

But as with two other clusters, Bjorge said WHO experts also suspected that perhaps members of the family could have been particularly susceptible to avian influenza.

"Some scientists are talking about something genetic. What we observed in all these clusters is that infections occur in closely related family members, and it is always the same bloodline," he said.

Indonesian Health Minister Siti Fadilah Supari said it was unlikely that even limited human-to-human transmission had occurred in this village.

"It's just a possibility, but based on the two criteria for possible transmission, virological evidence shows it's still being transmitted from animal to human," she told journalists.

However, as a precaution, Indonesian health authorities were to monitor the village for three more weeks -- one more than recommended by the WHO.

The people in quarantine, who include family members and other close contacts, are receiving the anti-influenza drug Tamiflu as a precaution and are being checked daily for flu symptoms, said Bjorge.

The WHO expert criticized Indonesia's efforts to fight bird flu, warning more people could die if outbreaks among poultry are not contained.

"The situation is that there is a leak in the roof, and the ministry of health is just mopping up the floor every day. Until they fix that leak in the roof, it's not going to stop," Bjorge told AFP.

"And the leak in the roof is this continuing transmission of the virus from bird to bird," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031578

Bjorge said Indonesia had to start mass culls of infected birds and more intensive testing of fowl suspected of carrying the H5N1 virus if it wanted to stem the spread of the virus, which he said was a "pandemic in poultry".

However, the sprawling country's hugely decentralised government -- spread over 17,000 islands -- meant preventing the spread of the virus amongst birds was a very complicated task, said Bjorge.

Indonesian health officials were also fighting lack of public awareness about the disease and its dangers, he added.

More than 120 people have died of bird flu around the world since late 2003, the vast majority of them in Asia.

Local Tests Show Indonesian Girl Died From Bird Flu (AP)

The Associated Press, June 2, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- An eight-year-old girl in Indonesia has died of bird flu, a health official said Friday, citing local tests, as a rise in human cases has put Indonesia on pace to soon become the world's hardest-hit country.

The World Health Organization has yet to confirm the death. The girl, from a city on the outskirts of Jakarta, died late Thursday after apparently coming into contact with sick poultry, said Nyoman Kandun, a senior Health Ministry official.

The girl's 10-year-old brother died three days earlier with similar flu-like symptoms, but no samples were taken, said Dr. Hariadi Wibisono, a senior official at the national Health Department. The boy died in an emergency room before being treated, and the family immediately took him home for burial, he said. "The family reported that chickens died near their house, and we have been told they had contact with birds," Dr. Wibisono said.

Meanwhile, Bayu Khrisnamurti, secretary general of the National Committee of Avian Flu Control, said a mass poultry slaughter would begin soon in the North Sumatra village of Kubu Simbelang. The village attracted international attention last month after six members of a family died of bird flu and a seventh was sickened. An eighth family member was buried before samples were collected, but WHO considers her part of the cluster of cases -- the largest ever reported.

Experts haven't found any link between the relatives and infected birds, which has led them to suspect human-to-human transmission. But no one outside the group of blood relatives has fallen ill and experts say the virus hasn't mutated.

Mr. Khrisnamurti said the decision to begin a mass cull came after a meeting Thursday with provincial officials. He said the government will compensate villagers whose birds are slaughtered, but did not provide additional details. Compensation is typically about 10,000 rupiah ($1.07) for every bird killed.

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people world-wide since it started ravaging Asian poultry farms in late 2003. It is difficult for humans to catch, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form more easily transmissible between humans, potentially sparking a pandemic. So far, most human cases have been linked to contact with infected birds. Indonesia trails only Vietnam, where 42 people have died, in number of bird flu deaths.

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 2, 2006

Thursday, June 1

7:15 a.m.: African health systems, already crumbling under the strain of AIDS, malaria and other diseases, could collapse if a bird-flu pandemic takes hold on the continent, health experts said at the World Economic Forum on Africa. Idrissa Sow, a senior WHO official, said it was vital to increase the number of laboratories capable of testing for the H5N1 virus in Africa. South Africa has advanced laboratory facilities, but other countries have had to send samples to Europe for testing.

2:40 a.m.: Indonesian officials began slaughtering poultry in a village where preliminary tests showed a 15-year-old boy had died from bird flu. All chickens will be killed within one kilometer (half a mile) of the boy's house in the Tasikmalaya district of West Java province, said Budi Utama, head of the local animal and fisheries agency.

U.N. Agency Proposes Plan To Track Birds (AP)

AP, June 2, 2006

The U.N. food agency said Thursday it is considering a plan to fit wild birds with tiny backpacks and monitor their annual migrations to help combat the spread of the deadly H5N1 bird flu.

The project would rely on communications satellites and a network of computers to track the birds' movements, and would cost $6.8 million, the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization said in a statement.

"All we have now is a snapshot. We need to see the whole film," said Joseph Domenech, the organization's chief veterinary officer.

Evidence on the role of wild birds is not always conclusive in the areas where H5N1 has appeared. Migratory birds introduced the disease in Russia and eastern Europe, but in the case of recent outbreaks in Africa there is scarce evidence pointing to wild birds.

DOJ_NMG_0031579

Bird flu has killed at least 127 people worldwide since it began sweeping through Asian poultry stocks in late 2003. Most human victims were infected through direct contact with sick birds, but experts fear the virus could mutate into a form that spreads easily between humans, and spark a pandemic.

The virus has ravaged poultry flocks in Asia, Europe and Africa since 2003 and experts have pointed to the poultry trade as the area where the disease is easiest to manage.

The U.N. agency's plan would entail capturing thousands of wild birds before they migrate, testing sample birds for the virus, and fitting some with backpacks weighing less than 1.8 ounces. After the birds are released, the telemetry equipment inside the packs would track their every movement, FAO said.

When the birds stop for rest, ground teams would grab them and retest them and, in case of a positive result, have a good idea where the infection originated and where it might head next, the agency said.

A system of radio beacons and satellites would feed data into the computers of ornithologists, ecologists, virologists and epidemiologists around the world.

"Early warning would give governments and producers more time to respond to potential threats — with great benefits for the poultry industry and society at large," the FAO said.

The agency said it needs to raise most of the money for the project.

The U.N. agency released details of its plan a day after scientists at an international conference on bird flu in Rome urged countries to refrain from mass killings of wild birds, saying that only further research can reveal whether the H5N1 bird flu strain will become endemic in wild birds, causing periodic outbreaks across the globe for years to come.

The conference was organized by the Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Organization for Animal Health.

Death In Darfur (WSJ)

By Mohamed Buisier

The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 2006

Once again, the international community, and the U.N. in particular, is being shamed into acting to stop the massacres in Darfur, and once again the Arab League and Arab leaders are unwilling and unable to face facts, or to deal with them in a civilized and humane manner.

Indeed, the most recent Arab League summit, which took place in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum -- presumably as a show of support to the host government -- ended with a resolution denying that any massacres had taken place in Darfur and expressing resistance to any outside intervention in the "internal" affairs of an Arab country. (Not surprisingly, this stance is identical to that taken by Osama Bin Laden.)

By adopting this argument, the Arab League was not just covering up for the atrocities perpetrated by the Sudanese government, but also for the direct or indirect involvement in this part of the Sudan of some of the Arab governments attending the summit. It is but one more shameful manifestation of Arab governments turning a blind eye to the continuing inhumane atrocities committed against their own citizens.

The fact that the Arab League is ineffectual is no longer news. Indeed, it may even work to the advantage of those present at the summit that many of the delegates were asleep, as Al-Arabiya TV cameras showed: In the future, if justice were to prevail in Darfur, the conferees could claim that they were sleeping when the resolution was passed and blame the whole ugly episode there on a Western/Zionist conspiracy to destroy the image of Arabs and Muslims.

While not dwelling on the cause of the problem, other Muslim leaders, such as Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan of Turkey, have tried to raise awareness of the humanitarian tragedy that is taking place in Darfur. But such pleas should be directed at the Arab and Sudanese governments and not just at the international community, particularly as Sudan continues to oscillate between denying and allowing international access to Darfur. Sudan's track record does not inspire confidence.

But why should anyone be surprised that the Arab League is denying yet one more massacre in its midst? In fact, some Arab leaders and so-called Arab intellectuals continue to assert that Saddam Hussein is still the legitimate president of Iraq even after his massacres of Iraqis have been unearthed. After all, for many decades now, legitimacy in this part of the world has been gained at the point of a gun (or for those diehard romantics in Western foreign ministries, by the sword).

The contrast between the Arab League's denial of any massacres in Darfur and the handover of Charles Taylor by the Nigerian government to the U.N.-backed special court in Sierra Leone is telling, to say the least. Taylor, who had received support from some members of the Arab League, will be the first African leader to face war-crimes charges.

It remains a serious concern that while many regions of the world are moving forward and finding, with the support of the international community, mechanisms to bring the likes of Chile's Pinochet, Yugoslavia's Milosevic and Liberia's Taylor to justice, the Arab League's denial of the atrocities in Darfur demonstrates not only disrespect for human life, but proof that the Arab world may be falling into a darkness of which we had only a glimpse in New York, Madrid and London.

Can the Arab world hope for, and expect, a miracle from its warlord leaders and their heirs? Or is it condemned to a downward spiral in which cruel and autocratic leaders are replaced with even more barbarity?

The Arab world is in a race against time. Its leaders, for once, should stop and think if it is in their interest to continue governing by force, and instilling fear, hatred and a dangerous sense of impotence in their populations. It is time to break out of this culture of fear, wherein the rulers fear those they govern, and the people fear their rulers. Opening up the political space for democratic participation, and encouraging a more civilized dialogue between state and society based on respect for the rights of the individual, would be a step toward breaking this cycle of fear.

If the Arab League and Arab leaders cannot constrain or punish those in their midst who commit heinous atrocities against their own populations, they should not complain when the rest of the world acts to make this world a less welcoming place for those who are committing atrocities.

Mr. Buisier is a Libyan-American political activist.

Legal blow over tobacco case information

By STEPHANIE KIRCHGAESSNER

WASHINGTON The US Justice Department was dealt a legal blow yesterday when a judge ruled that a watchdog group could interview a top official in connection with the government's controversial handling of its landmark case against tobacco companies.

Judge Emmet Sullivan said Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (Crew) could depose Robert McCallum and other Justice Department officials about how the department handled Crew's requests for information about the case.

The judgment does not give Crew the latitude to interview Mr McCallum, the associate attorney-general nominated by President George W. Bush to be ambassador to Australia, on the underlying facts of the case.

But Crew says the deposition will shed light on whether the department sought to cover up itsdecision-making process by wilfully ignoring requests under the Freedom of Information Act.

The judge's ruling is the latest chapter in a long-running saga about whether a decision by the government last year to reduce the amount of penalties it was seeking from tobacco companies - from Dollars 130bn initially to Dollars 5.2bn - was politically motivated.

Reports in the Washington Post and other newspapers last June suggested that the government's decision to change its position on the five-year civil racketeering case against the tobacco industry was made over the objection of career lawyers at the Justice Department.

A government witness, Harvard professor Max Bazerman, who said he believed the industry should be subject to a court appointed monitor, was told by a trial attorney at the department to change his testimony to be more favourable to the industry, according to a 2005 article in the Washington Post. Mr Bazerman was ultimately allowed to testify.

The controversy put a spotlight on Mr McCallum, who had oversight of the case and was a former attorney for Alston & Bird, a law firm that represents tobacco companies.

The Justice Department has previously denied that its legal deliberations were politically motivated. Its decision, nevertheless, prompted a group of Democrat senators to demand an investigation and for Crew to take up the cause.

Anne Weismann, Crew's chief council, said the government had, in effect, argued that the documents Crew was requesting were not for public consumption because they involved legal work product, which is protected, and that it would cost Crew, a non-profit organisation, Dollars 90,000 to process the request.

"Hopefully, the American people will begin to learn the truth about why the DoJ so drastically reduced the penalty in the tobacco case." said Melanie Sloan, Crew's executive director.

The World Today - Top US bureaucrat faces Washington court over tobacco controversy

Reporter: Michael Rowland

ELEANOR HALL: Australia may be without a US Ambassador in residence for several more months, with the man nominated by President George W. Bush to fill the post now being ordered to answer questions in a Washington court.

Top Justice Department bureaucrat Robert McCallum is under scrutiny over his involvement in a controversial decision to dramatically reduce the amount of damages the Justice Department was seeking from the tobacco industry in a high profile prosecution.

Mr McCallum, a former tobacco industry lawyer and close friend of President Bush, has denied allegations of improper influence.

But a district court has now ruled that the man who would be ambassador to Australia must appear as a witness in the case.

Washington Correspondent Michael Rowland reports.

MICHAEL ROWLAND: Robert McCallum's nomination as the new US Ambassador to Australia has been trouble plagued from the start. Within a month of President Bush announcing he was appointing his old university friend to the plum diplomatic post, senior Democrats put a hold on the nomination because of concerns over Mr McCallum's activities at the US Justice Department.

Attention is focused on the department's sudden decision in June last year to slash the amount of the damages it was seeking from big tobacco companies for misleading Americans about the dangers of smoking.

The figure fell from $180 billion to $13 billion. That's a cut of more than 90 per cent.

Suspicion immediately fell on Robert McCallum, who, in an earlier life, was a lawyer for the tobacco industry.

Mr McCallum denied exerting any improper influence, but the issue soon became the subject of an internal ethics investigation, which has yet to report its findings.

In the latest twist, a US district court judge has now ordered Mr McCallum to appear in court to answer questions about the case.

A public watchdog group, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, is suing the US Government to get hold of documents related to the reduction in the tobacco damages.

Judge Emmet Sullivan has ruled sufficient questions have been raised about the propriety of the Justice Department's conduct in the case.

The watchdog's Executive Director, Melanie Sloan, says the American people will now hopefully begin to learn the truth about why the Department of Justice so drastically reduced the penalties in the tobacco case.

A Justice Department spokesman has told the ABC he had no comment on the matter, but confirmed Mr McCallum was still in his post as the Associate Attorney-General.

No date has been set for Mr McCallum's court appearance, but the move presents yet another obstacle for the Bush administration as it attempts to fill an ambassador's post which has now been vacant for more than a year.

The President's hopes for a swift Senate confirmation for Mr McCallum have been shattered, and it now could be months before the nomination is resolved one way or the other.

Mr McCallum himself has kept a very low public profile since being nominated.

He and his wife were guests at last month's official White House dinner for visiting Prime Minister John Howard and Mr McCallum has been briefed on key Australian issues.

Whether he'll get the chance to experience life in Canberra first-hand remains to be seen.

In Washington this is Michael Rowland reporting for The World Today.

Judge Orders Testimony On Tobacco Files

By Staff Reporter of the Sun

A liberal anti-corruption group won permission from a federal judge yesterday to take sworn testimony from the head of the Justice Department's civil division in a case seeking information about a decision made last year to cut sharply a financial demand against the tobacco industry.

Judge Emmet Sullivan's ruling faulted the government for purporting to grant expedited treatment to a Freedom of Information Act request from Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, and then failing to turn over any records about the tobacco-related decision for more than 10 months.

In 2005, the Justice Department retreated from its long-standing position in a racketeering lawsuit against tobacco firms that the companies should be required to fund a $130 billion, 25-year program to encourage people to quit smoking. The government's reduced claim, for a $10 billion, five-year program, drew howls of protest from anti-tobacco forces and dissent from government attorneys assigned to the case.

"What we suspect is the Bush administration wanted to make big tobacco happy and they dropped the award," an attorney for the citizens' group, Melanie Sloan, said.

"It was totally meaningless to tell us they'd expedite our request. Here we are a year later and they didn't give us anything."

Judge Sullivan said he was "troubled" by some of the government's claims, including one that a two-hour search for records took four months to complete. He noted that the Justice Department asserted it would cost more than $90,000 to search for the records.

A Justice Department spokesman, Charles Miller, declined to comment on the ruling. However, at a hearing in April, a government attorney called the request for depositions "a frolicking detour" aimed at improper questioning of the officials about their actions in the tobacco case.

While the Judge Sullivan granted permission to depose the civil division chief, Robert McCallum, and three other officials, the judge suggested the questioning would be limited to the issue of delays in handling the group's request for data. The judge said the depositions would last no longer than five hours in total and be overseen by a federal magistrate.

An authority on freedom of information litigation, Alan Morrison of Stanford University, said an order permitting sworn questioning in such cases is "very uncommon." He said most of the records will probably be deemed exempt from release, but the Justice Department may have to disclose evidence of contact with outsiders about the sharply reduced financial demand. "While the tobacco companies have an absolute right to communicate with government officials, they don't have a right to keep those communications secret," Mr. Morrison said. "If tobacco companies were making arguments to the chiefs that they weren't making to the Indians, you have a pretty good idea of what may be going on."

President Bush has nominated Mr. McCallum as ambassador to Australia, but Senator Durbin, a Democrat of Illinois, is blocking confirmation because of concerns about the handling of the tobacco case.

Judge refuses to halt suit against U.S. spy agency

DETROIT_U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor says she will go ahead with hearings in a legal challenge to a warrantless domestic surveillance program run by the National Security Agency.

The Bush administration says hearings in the lawsuit would reveal state secrets that affect national security.

Diggs Taylor also criticized the Justice Department for failing to respond to the Jan. 18 legal challenge, The Detroit News said.

Spokespeople for the spy agency and the Justice Department declined immediate comment.

The American Civil Liberties Union in Detroit and the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York filed lawsuits against the program in January, saying it violates Americans' rights to free speech and to privacy.

On March 9, the plaintiffs asked the judge to summarily declare the National Security Agency's program illegal. They say that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act requires that the spy agency go to a secret court in order to spy within the United States.

The government filed a motion saying that no court can consider the issues because of a privilege against revealing state secrets, if doing so harms national security.

Diggs Taylor said she will hear the government's motion only after proceeding with a June 12 hearing on the plaintiffs' motion to summarily declare the spying illegal.

Justice: No Comment on Gabelli Settlement Reports By Mark Rockwell

WASHINGTON--The U.S. Department of Justice declined comment on reports that it is negotiating a settlement in a high-profile spectrum fraud case.

Lawyers for Mario Gabelli asserted in media reports yesterday that they were in discussions with the Justice Department concerning a settlement in a civil fraud case involving financier Gabelli's resale of spectrum licenses.

Gabelli is accused of using a series of front companies to bid on spectrum licenses under designated entity (DE) rules that provide discounts to smaller bidders. Gabelli allegedly formed small companies days before a number of FCC spectrum auctions between 1995 and 2000. After getting the licenses at the small company discount, allegedly the small companies immediately sold the spectrum awards to other companies for big profits.

A settlement of the case could require Gabelli to pay as much as $100 million, according to reports. Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the agency could not comment on the reports.

A call to attorney Lanny Breuer, partner at the law firm Covington and Burling, wasn't returned by deadline. Breuer, who represents Lynch Interactive, a Gabelli-owned company, was quoted in reports saying that the government and Gabelli lawyers were in settlement discussions. Breuer handles white collar crime and civil litigation for the firm. In 1998, he was special counsel for President Clinton during impeachment hearings.

A new school firm probe; `Turns up heat on' Career Education

Career Education Corp. said Thursday that the Justice Department is investigating allegations it made false statements to students regarding job placement and tuition costs.

The Education Department, in a separate letter released to Bloomberg News, described a growing problem with Career Education schools failing to provide reliable audit data.

The Justice Department investigation suggests renewed problems for the Hoffman Estates-based company at a time when it appeared to be emerging from more than two years of government probes, private lawsuits, accreditation problems and a falling stock price.

"This clearly turns up the heat on the company and could represent a setback after various steps forward," Harris Nesbitt Corp. analyst Jeffrey Silber wrote in a note to investors.

Analyst Kelly Flynn of UBS AG wrote that the news was "a surprising and significant negative."

In a regulatory filing, Career Education said the Justice Department's Civil Division wrote to the company May 30 asking "that we provide documents relating to representations made to current or prospective students at certain designated schools regarding job placement or placement rates and the costs of attending school."

The letter, citing the possibility of false statements to the Education Department, also requests documents "relating to the compensation structure of admissions personnel, the use of Pell Grant funds at one school and the calculation of student refunds at another school," the company said.

Career Education said it told the Justice Department it would "cooperate fully with this investigation."

A company spokeswoman, Pattie Overstreet-Miller, said she had no additional comment on the investigation.

A Justice Department spokesman, Charles Miller, said he could not comment.

"The recipient can acknowledge it, but we can can't discuss anything regarding the possibility of an ongoing investigation," Miller said.

The Education Department told Career Education in June 2005 that it was reviewing the company's restated financial results for 2000 to 2003 and was barring the approval of any new school acquisitions or expansions.

The department, in a May 12 letter to the company provided to Bloomberg News, said a "significant number" of Career Education schools have not received qualified auditor opinions.

"This problem has not been ameliorated, but, in fact, has grown worse," the department said.

"The inability of CEC to produce audits with unqualified opinions at nearly 45 percent of its schools, standing alone, gives the department reason to retain the growth restrictions it imposed."

Halter says exit from company board unrelated to federal inquiry

By ANDREW DeMILLO

Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK_Democratic lieutenant governor candidate Bill Halter says his personal situation, not a Justice Department probe, prompted his departure from a California biotech firm's board.

Halter, who is running in the June 13 runoff for his party's nomination, said Thursday he decided against seeking another term on InterMune's board because of his wife's pregnancy and his campaign for the state's second-highest office.

Halter stepped down from the company's board May 24 after his term expired. He had joined the board of the Brisbane, Calif.-based company in July 2002.

In a recent filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said it was under investigation by the Justice Department over the marketing and promotion of Actimmune, one of its patented drugs. The company said it received a subpoena from the Justice Department in November 2004.

"Although we cannot predict whether the outcome of this inquiry will have a material adverse effect on our business, it is possible that we will be required to pay a substantial civil fine in connection with the settlement of this matter," the company's filing said. "At this time we cannot predict the magnitude of such a fine or the impact the payment of such a fine may have on our future business operations."

Halter provided few details on the reason for the inquiry, citing an ongoing investigation, but said it had nothing to do with his decision to leave the board. Justice Department Spokesman Charles Miller could not confirm or deny the investigation, but InterMune spokeswoman Pam Lord said the inquiry was ongoing but was not related to Halter.

Halter said the investigation concerns actions that were taken by employees of the company.

"We, the board of directors, have provided documents. We have provided access to the employees. We have provided a whole range of information to the investigators," Halter said at a news conference at his campaign headquarters. "We have fully cooperated."

Halter faces state Sen. Tim Wooldridge of Paragould in the June 13 runoff for the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor. The winner of the runoff faces Republican Sen. Jim Holt of Springdale in the Nov. 7 general election.

Wooldridge used the news of Halter's departure from InterMune to claim that Halter has been in the state for a short period of time.

"It concerns me that he's been back in Arkansas such a short time that we're just now getting to know more about Mr. Halter," Wooldridge said in a prepared statement. "What's even more alarming is what we still don't know, because the only source of information we've had until now has been his TV ads."

Halter spokesman Bud Jackson dismissed Wooldridge's comments as "desperate attacks."

Halter has cited his ties to businesses as one of his assets in the campaign for lieutenant governor. He sits on the board of four other information and biotechnology companies.

In its third quarterly quarterly report, InterMune reported having an accumulated deficit of $473.7 million as of the end of March. The company reported having sustained losses every year since its inception.

Halter said deficits are not unusual for startup biotechnology companies and noted that the company's market capitalization is valued at more than $500 million.

"Most biotech companies, early in their life, run significant losses and investors don't view that as a negative," Halter said. "They view that as an understandable and usual course of business."

OSTN: Appeals Court Reduces Lower Court Award

OLD STONE CORP

Old Stone Corporation (OSTN) announced that a three-judge panel of the U.S. Federal Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed in part and reversed in part the decision of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, leaving Old Stone with an award of $74.5 million in the company's breach of contract claim against the federal government. In November 2004, Judge Robert H. Hodges, Jr. of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims had issued a decision awarding Old Stone $192.3 million in damages claims.

Press Release: Justice Department Fights to Protect Name of Fraudulent Contractor

PETALUMA, Calif., June 1 /PRNewswire/ -- The Justice Department, acting on behalf of the Small Business Administration, has responded to a suit filed in Federal court under the Freedom of Information Act by the American Small Business League. The government is refusing to release the name of a contractor that was found to be intentionally misrepresenting itself as a small business in order to illegally receive Federal small business contracts. United States Attorney Kevin V. Ryan is claiming exemptions under the Freedom of Information Act that would allow the government to withhold the name of the firm because of an ongoing criminal investigation.

The SBA's Office of Inspector General conducted an investigation into the matter last year. In June 2005, the Inspector General recommended to SBA Administrator Hector Barreto that the firm in question be debarred from doing business with the Federal government. Barreto will leave office in June without taking any punitive action against the firm.

Under Federal law, misrepresenting a firm's status as a small business in order to receive Federal small business contracts is punishable by up to ten years in prison, a $500,000 fine per occurrence, and permanent debarment from doing business with the government.

The ASBL believes the company may have illegally received millions of dollars in Federal small business contracts. President Lloyd Chapman stated, "I find it very difficult to believe that the investigation is ongoing, and I don't think the government has any plans to prosecute the firm."

Chapman went on to say, "We don't know who the contractor is, but if they are guilty of misrepresenting their company, they should be debarred and prosecuted according to the law."

'Bullying' immigration judge absent, replaced

By Gaiutra Bahadur
Inquirer Staff Writer

A Philadelphia immigration judge, recently rebuked by a federal appeals panel for "bullying" and "bias-laden" courtroom conduct it said warranted further review, has been replaced in his chambers following an unexplained two-week absence.

The Executive Office for Immigration Review (EOIR), which manages the nation's immigration courts, this week dispatched a pinch-hitter from Arlington, Va., to fill in for Judge Donald V. Ferlise.

The administrator for the Philadelphia region's immigration court, Elliott Edwards, said Ferlise's absence was not due to illness. The arrangement would continue for an indefinite period, Edwards said.

Ferlise, 62, a former prosecuting attorney for U.S. immigration authorities, has been the subject of mounting criticism and calls for reprimand.

City Council overwhelmingly passed a resolution on May 5 calling for his removal from the bench after the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit ruled that Ferlise failed to give two asylum-seekers fair and impartial hearings.

The Third Circuit court, which rarely singles out judges by name in its rulings, was scathing in its assessment of Ferlise. It referred to a pattern of "belligerent questioning and a failure to consider relevant evidence," "brow-beating," and "nitpicking" by Ferlise.

In the last two years, the court has granted new hearings to immigrants in at least five asylum petitions denied by the judge.

Calls to Ferlise at home and at his office were not returned.

Ralph Conte, a Washington lawyer, said he was defending Ferlise but declined to say why he had been retained. Conte referred questions to the Justice Department, which oversees the EOIR. A spokesman there declined to comment on what he termed a "personnel action."

There are indications, however, that the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility may be investigating Ferlise.

The Third Circuit court summoned a deputy assistant U.S. attorney general, Jonathan Cohn, to its Jan. 9 hearing of appeals by a Pakistani journalist and a nephew of an ousted Gambian president. Both had been denied asylum by Ferlise.

On the same day, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced a review of immigration judges across the country following allegations of widespread incompetence and bias in their ranks.

In a tape of the proceedings obtained by The Inquirer, the federal judges expressed alarm at Ferlise's treatment of asylum-seekers in cases dating to 1999. They questioned Cohn about the process for reviewing and rebuking immigration judges.

Cohn replied that Gonzales was aware of concerns about Ferlise, and said privacy issues prevented him from commenting further. But, he added, "whenever there is a judicial finding of misconduct, there's automatically an inquiry by the Office of Professional Responsibility."

Four opinions that chastise Ferlise, dating to June 2005, amount to judicial findings of misconduct.

It is rare for an immigration judge to be removed from the bench. In the last decade, only four of more than 200 immigration judges nationwide have been terminated. The process, Cohn told the Third Circuit court, is lengthy and hobbled by administrative and union issues. While judges are being investigated, typically they continue to hear cases, he said.

Senior District Judge Dickinson R. Debevoise, a member of the panel, challenged Cohn on the effectiveness of the process for reprimanding and removing judges. He recalled presiding over a 2004 appeal of a Ferlise decision.

"Now, a year later, same judge, same problem," Debevoise said. "Poor people seeking asylum are suffering through this process."

Debevoise also suggested that problems with the immigration courts run deeper than an individual judge.

In June 2003, Judge Thomas M. Ragno of Boston addressed a Ugandan asylum-seeker named Jane with "Me Tarzan, you Jane." Ragno was restored to the bench last year after being put on paid leave in August 2003.

In their conversation with Cohn, members of the Third Circuit court also noted widely divergent track records among immigration judges, with some granting 60 percent of asylum claims and others only 2 percent. According to a 2000 study by the San Jose Mercury News, Ferlise has granted 10 percent of asylum claims, putting him among the 10 judges nationwide with the lowest grant rates.

"... Most judges do a professional job," Cohn said. " 'Most' is not good enough. It has to be all of them. For that reason, we're doing a comprehensive review."

Since January, as part of that review, the Attorney General's Office interviewed members of the Philadelphia chapter of the American Immigration Lawyers Association about all four immigration judges based here, said Bill Stock, the chapter chair.

Stock said the members criticized Ferlise's record.

"Judge Ferlise, like several other EOIR judges, often gave the appearance that he was another attorney for the government," Stock said.

Several other immigration attorneys said that Ferlise was fair and merciful to some immigrants, but seemed bent on discrediting those whose testimony contained insignificant or explainable inconsistencies.

"In many cases he's extremely fair," said David Piver, an attorney for Seemab Fatima Shah, the Pakistani turned down for asylum by Ferlise.

"Then there are other cases," Piver said. "It's almost like a switch gets switched. He begins to see everything as a misstatement. He believes someone's trying to abuse the system."

A witness for Shah, for instance, referred to the journalist's parents as being alive and well in Pakistan. Her case rested largely on her father's politically motivated assassination. The court interpreter had apparently mistranslated parents-in-law as parents.

Shah submitted reams of evidence, including her father's death certificate and a newspaper article accompanied by a photograph of his bloody corpse.

Still, Ferlise accused her of trying to defraud the court: "You've blown your cover. I see now her parents aren't even dead."

A Plea for Asylum, a Squabble Over Language

Abou Cham, the nephew of a deposed president of Gambia, came to the United States in 2001 after relatives were imprisoned and attacked and their political party banned by the subsequent regime. Judge Donald V. Ferlise excluded affidavits from the fallen leader and his ambassador that Cham's life would be in danger if he returned to Gambia. Ferlise ruled Cham's asylum claim "frivolous."

Cham's problems began when he was asked for his date of birth. He answered in English. Ferlise demanded Cham answer in his native tongue, Wolof, through an interpreter.

Here is an excerpt from Cham's 2003 hearing:

Ferlise: Mr. Cham, the question is a rather basic question. When were you born? You said in English, 1978. You said to interpreter in the Wolof language, 1979 - or at least that was interpreted as 1979. I just brought that to your attention. Now, we're back to 1978. When were you born, Mr. Cham? Give me your date of birth.

Cham: I, I cannot count it in Wolof. That's the reason why I'm a little confused.

Ferlise: I want to know the date you were born, sir.

Cham: 1978.

Ferlise: What date? Give me a month.

Cham: September. September 28.

Ferlise: And, please -

Cham: I'm sorry, sir. I'm sorry.

Ferlise: Would you, please, remain in the Wolof language. I don't know why you're doing this. I'm giving you instructions to speak only in Wolof and you keep intermingling English and Wolof. So, what's your date of birth, now? Sir, the questions are going to get progressively more difficult. We're two minutes into the hearing and already you're having difficulty with a simple question.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Police Arrest 17 Suspected Terrorists As Part of Multinational Probe. Canadian officials announced the arrest of 17 young, mostly Muslim, men who are suspected of plotting a major terrorist attack in Toronto. This morning, the Los Angeles Times (6/5, Meyer, Chow, 958K) says the arrests in Canada are "part of a continuing, multi-national probe into suspected terrorist cells in at least seven countries, a US counter-terrorism official confirmed Sunday. The senior US law enforcement official said authorities are combing through evidence seized during raids in Canada this weekend to look for possible connections between the 17 suspects arrested Friday and at least 18 other Islamist militants who have been arrested in locations including the United States, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Britain, Denmark and Sweden." The investigation "began as separate probes," but "over the past year, the counter-terrorism authorities of those countries began to see connections among the cells, in part through electronic surveillance of phone calls and Internet correspondence, as well as ground surveillance of individual suspects, several US officials said in interviews Sunday."

USA Today (6/5, Kiely, 2.31M), in a story titled "Officials Say USA Wasn't A Target In Terror Plot In Canada," reports nonetheless that "the FBI says some of the Canadian suspects met last year with two Americans now facing prosecution on separate terrorism-related charges." The FBI "confirmed that some of the Canadian suspects had been in contact with two Muslim men who were arrested this year by the bureau's Joint Terrorism Task Force. 'It does appear that there were contacts between certain suspects in Canada and two individuals recently charged in the United States,' FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said." The two, "now jailed and awaiting trial, are Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, and Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, 19. Both are US citizens who had been living in Georgia." The New York Times (6/5, Depalma, 1.19M) reports, "American officials in Washington and New York said they had been aware of the [Canadian] investigation and were informed of the coordinated law enforcement action."

The story of the arrests in Canada is receiving extensive print and TV coverage, leading the CBS and NBC newscasts last night and running second in the lineup on ABC. Reacting to news of the arrests, Secretary Rice said yesterday on CNN's Late Edition (6/4), "We have excellent counterterrorism cooperation with Canada." In its coverage, the AP (6/4) reports Rice said "there was no indication that 17 terror suspects arrested in Canada were trying to plan an attack in the United States."

ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Yang, 8.78M) noted police say most of the suspects "were born in Canada. Homegrown terrorism. Analysts say that's the new, growing danger." Jack Cloonan, former FBI counterterrorism official: "The structure of al Qaeda as we've known it, has now been destroyed. It's no longer a top-to-bottom organization. They do not need direct control from al Qaeda. So, that makes it a lot more difficult to counter it." On NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 2, 1:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M), terrorism analyst Roger Cressey said, "It's the evolution of the al Qaeda terror threat. We now have individuals with no known affiliation to the network or to al Qaeda now deciding to undertake jihad for their own reasons. So the movement is what we're worried about now, not the organization that attacked us on 9/11."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, lead story, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Authorities now believe those suspects were motivated by politics and not by faith." NBC (Tibbles) added, "The arrests drive home concerns within Canada and the United States that Canada, with its liberal immigration laws, may become a launching point for future terror attacks." David Harris, former Canadian security official: "We've seen a tremendous amount of infiltration and evidence of real radicalization of some, particularly amongst the youthful Islamic community." Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (6/5, Chipello, Block, 2.11M) reports the arrest "of 17 Ontario residents…underscores concern among North American and European counterterrorism experts that the next wave of Islamist militants will be made of 'home-grown' radicals, rather than infiltrators from abroad."

The New York Times (6/5, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "According to Canadian authorities, the suspected fertilizer bomb plot…appeared to follow the pattern of successful terrorist attacks in Madrid in 2004 and in London last year. As in those instances, officials said, those accused in the Canadian case are Muslims with no evident ties to Al Qaeda leaders overseas except a shared ideology."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/5, 61K) reports, "There have been no Al Qaeda-type attacks in Canada, although security services have long worried about possible risks and the US has urged more vigilance on the long border the two countries share." Canada, "under its previous Liberal government, declined to join the US-led forces in Iraq, and many Canadians felt that helped their country stay off the Al Qaeda radar screen." But "the country does have troops in Afghanistan, originally sent to fight the Taliban."

Security Forces First Became Aware Of Plot In Chat Room. The Toronto Star (6/5, Van Rijn) reports that "when a shadowy group of disaffected urban youth began talking in an Internet chat room in the fall of 2004 espousing anti-Western views, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was listening. The spy agency, and an alphabet soup of other security agencies across the continent, closely monitor such sites, where talk may sometimes turn to buildings and bombs and bringing global jihad home to North America, to Canada." The Star adds, "Often it's just that -- talk -- but when CSIS began monitoring the sites allegedly used by some of the 17 men and youths arrested on terrorism-related charges in a sweeping series of raids across the GTA Friday evening, the Canadian spy agency heard enough to remain interested, and increased surveillance of the group."

The New York Times (6/5, Austen, 1.19M) says this morning, "The competition between Toronto's four major daily newspapers is often intense, particularly over crime news. But its results are rarely as one-sided as the coverage that followed the arrests of 17 Ontario residents in what the police call a terrorist bomb plot. Some readers of The Globe and Mail awoke on Saturday to find nothing about the raids while, at the other extreme, The Toronto Star published 3,030 words and several photos spread over three pages."

Toronto Mosque Vandalized. The New York Times (6/5, DePalma, 1.19M) reports, "As the authorities in Canada and the United States continued to piece together details from the lengthy investigation, a mosque in Toronto was vandalized overnight. More than a dozen windows in the building were broken, two panels of the glass front door were smashed and several cars parked in the rear of the building were damaged. Islamic leaders who met with the Toronto police chief on Sunday demanded a thorough investigation of the vandalism."

CBS Evening News (6/4, lead story, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that news of the arrests may bring "a backlash against Muslims in the city." In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/5, A10, Struck, 744K) says Canada "touts the relative harmony within its society, sometimes in contrast with tensions over immigration in the United States." The Washington Times (6/5, 90K) reports that a "police official" said "he had no information on any link between the incident and the arrests, which began late Friday."

The Toronto Globe and Mail (6/5, Chung) reports, "The head of Canada's largest urban police force called on both Muslims and non-Muslims alike to let cooler heads prevail." Toronto police Chief Bill Blair "told a gathering of Muslim leaders" that the suspects "will be considered innocent until proven guilty."

US-Canada Border Security Less Likely To Be Relaxed After Toronto Terrorism Arrests. USA Today (6/5, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "the national debate over border security hit closer to home [northern Minnesota] this weekend when 17 Canadians were arrested and charged in a bomb plot in Ontario. Some people here on the USA's northern edge have been hoping to ease security that was beefed up after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." The local business community is concerned it may "lose customers under a law requiring U.S. citizens to show passports or new ID cards containing computer chips — instead of driver's licenses — to cross the border for the fishing and hunting that lure tourists here. Most vacationers here spend time in both countries. That law is to take effect in 2008, though the Senate has voted to postpone it until 2009."

More Commentary. The USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "After the 9/11 attacks, the French newspaper Le Monde famously declared that 'We Are All Americans.' The Iraq war has squandered much of the cooperation, focus and goodwill needed to defeat the 9/11 enemy. The Canada arrests provide an opportunity to refocus international attention on the war on Islamic extremism."

Scope Of British Raid On Suspected Bomb Factory Questioned. The AFP (6/5, Jackson) reports, "Questions were raised in the British press over the circumstances of a huge anti-terror raid here two days ago as police questioned two terror suspects, one of whom was shot in the operation." Attorneys for brothers Abul Koyair, 20, and Mohammed Abdul Kahar, 23, "vehemently deny any involvement in terrorism after they were arrested during a dawn raid on Friday in Forest Gate, east London." Police have "declined to comment on news reports that experts were hunting for evidence of chemical or biological weapons as they continue to search the terraced house." The AFP Adds, "According to The Sunday Times, which cited Scotland Yard sources, there had been 'specific intelligence' which suggested that a single bomb overlaid with cyanide was being prepared at the address."

Administration Has Moved "Aggressively" To Mute Leaks. In a lengthy story marking the 35th anniversary of the release of the Pentagon Papers, U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Halloran, Michels) reports that 35 years after the New York Times published the papers, the "atmosphere feels distinctly different, the concept of national security more ominous. … With a more conservative federal judiciary, the realities of a post-9/11 world, and enduring public skepticism toward the media, the Bush Administration appears convinced that this time the scales might just tip in the government's favor." The Administration "has moved aggressively on other fronts, investigating leaks it asserts have harmed national security, firing a CIA officer suspected of leaking, and even suggesting that reporters could for the first time be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act."

Pentagon Detainee Policies Omit Key Geneva Convention Tenet. The Los Angeles Times (6/5, Barnes, 958K) reports the Pentagon "has decided to omit from new detainee policies a key tenet of the Geneva Convention that explicitly bans 'humiliating and degrading treatment,' according to knowledgeable military officials, a step that would mark a further, potentially permanent, shift away from strict adherence to international human rights standards." The decision could "culminate a lengthy debate within the Defense Department but will not become final until the Pentagon makes new guidelines public, a step that has been delayed." However, the State Department "fiercely opposes the military's decision to exclude Geneva Convention protections and has been pushing for the Pentagon and White House to reconsider, the Defense Department officials acknowledged."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Ridge Says Vacated Spectrum Should Be Used For Broadband Public-Safety Network. Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/5, 90K) writes that the nation's first responders can have "the national communications system they need instead of testimonials, a few bucks and repeated promises of change" when "Congress and the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) are willing to think and act anew." Ridge states that spectrum "owned by the American people" is being vacated, which could "allow the FCC…to create America's first nationwide broadband public-safety network." If it is auctioned off in 2008 as planned, "we will have lost our last best chance to give those who risk their lives for us the tools they need both to protect their own lives and ours."

New York Lawmakers Launch Postcard Campaign To Protest Anti-Terrorism Grant. The Washington Times (6/5, Hudson, 90K) reports, "New York lawmakers are urging their constituents to mail postcards depicting New York City landmarks" to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff in a "bipartisan campaign" to protest New York City's Urban Area Security Initiative funding. The Times adds that while members of Congress "agreed" to cut the program by "millions of dollars…from last year," they "did not expect…major slashes in the top terrorist target cities of New York or Washington, which will suffer a $32 million cut, or cuts to 26 other cities that total $204 million." Meanwhile, "Despite rumblings on Capitol Hill that hearings might be called or Mr. Chertoff's resignation demanded, the secretary is standing steadfast in favor of his department's decision."

Bloomberg Doesn't Expect Change In Funding. The New York Times (6/5, Chan, 1.19M) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that he was not optimistic that federal officials would change their minds about" New York City's funding. He added, however, that "hope springs eternal, and in any case, remember, we've got next year to fight for." His "comments came as top officials continued to assail the Department of Homeland Security's handling of antiterrorism grants."

Lawsuits Claim Ground Zero Workers Had Little Access To Proper Respirators. The New York Times (6/5, DePalma, 1.19M) reports that with "mounting evidence that exposure to the toxic smoke and ash at ground zero during the nine-month cleanup has made many people sick, attention is now focusing on the role of air-filtering masks, or respirators, that cost less than $50 and could have shielded workers from some of the toxins." More than "150,000 such masks were distributed and only 40,000 people worked on the pile, but most workers either did not have the masks or did not use them." These respirators "are now at the center of a federal lawsuit filed on behalf of more than 8,000 firefighters, police officers and private workers who say they were exposed to toxic substances at or near ground zero that have made them sick or may eventually do so." Lawyers "representing the workers say that there was no central distribution point for the respirators, no single organization responsible for giving them out, and no one with the power to make sure the respirators that were distributed got used, and used properly. By contrast, at the Pentagon, workers not wearing proper protective gear were escorted off the site."

WAR NEWS:

Pace Vows Thorough Probe Of Haditha Deaths. The AP (6/4, Baldor) reports, "The top US military officer pledged a thorough investigation into the alleged massacre of Iraqi citizens in Haditha by Marines, saying it is important to avoid a rush to judgment." Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, "acknowledged that the allegations involving the deaths of about two dozen Iraqis have raised concerns among Iraqi officials and in the United States. 'But you don't want to have the emotions of the day weigh into the process,' Pace told the Associated Press in an interview Sunday. 'We need to stick with our judicial process. We want to be sure that it moves forward without any influence.'"

Officials Express Caution. The Washington Times (6/5, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Both Democrats and Republicans yesterday expressed caution about the investigation of an incident last year in which US Marines killed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Vice President Al Gore, "a vocal critic of the Iraq war," said on ABC's "This Week," "I don't have enough evidence to see how they've handled that particular set of charges. … I don't think that we have enough information now to know how they have handled it." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she has spoken with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki about the Haditha incident. 'I've talked to Prime Minister Maliki,' Miss Rice said on 'Fox News Sunday.' 'He wants coalition forces there. He knows that Iraqis are not yet capable of dealing with these security issues themselves. We have very good cooperation with him.'"

GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham was asked on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) to describe what he knows about the killings in Haditha, Graham replied, "The allegations are that some Marines used deadly force inappropriately, violated the rules of engagement, the law of armed conflict, that some officers may have had direct knowledge of this activity and failed to report it, that other people in the chain of command should have known and failed to do anything about it, a dereliction of duty allegation. … The allegations are serious. They're unnerving. And they're being investigated. And if it is true that our Marines killed innocent civilians, noncombatants, out of revenge, they will be severely dealt with."

Sen. Jack Reed, also on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace), said, "I think the test will be whether the leadership in the Department of Defense and in the administration does not try to confine these incidents in small sort of compartments and say it was just a few Marines or a few soldiers, but looks to see if this is part of a larger systemic problem. That's the challenge. … We have to take the blinders off. We have to look clearly and dispassionately about whether the situation is there and the training is such that this might be more widespread."

Haditha Incident Draws Comparisons To My Lai Massacre. The investigation into the deaths of 24 Iraqis at the hands of US Marines at Haditha is the subject of lengthy coverage in all three newsmagazines this week. The incident is the cover story in two of the magazines, Time and Newsweek. Time (6/12, Duffy, McGirk, Ghosh) reports in its cover story that "the Bush Administration finds itself on the defensive about a war that is now entering its 40th unrelenting month." The deaths of Iraqi civilians at the hands of US Marines at Haditha "threatens to become one of the war's signature debacles, an alleged atrocity committed by a small group of service members that comes to symbolize the enterprise's larger costs." Newsweek (6/12, Thomas, Johnson) reports in its cover story that Haditha "may turn out to be the worst massacre since My Lai. And Iraqis may be entirely justified in their outrage."

Up To 10 Marines Could Be Charged Over Haditha Killings. Time (6/12, Duffy, McGirk, Ghosh) reports in its cover story, "A knowledgeable congressional source monitoring the Haditha probes says congressional aides are being told by Marine officers in the Pentagon that the number of Marines who may be charged with murder is small. But the source speculates that the total number who may be charged with crimes ranging from murder to aiding in the attack or trying to cover it up could be as high as 10, according to Marines who have talked to officials at the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS), which is conducting the inquiry into the killings."

Iraqi Journalist Videotaped Scenes Of Haditha Deaths. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Kluger) cover package, "If the Marines are indeed guilty of an atrocity, they had the ill fortune to have committed their crime in the worst possible place: outside the front door of a budding Iraqi journalist and human-rights activist." The day after the killings, Taher Thabet "went into the houses where the killings had taken place and videotaped what he saw, as well as the wrenching scenes later at the local morgue, where friends and family collected the bodies of the victims."

Slain Marine Profiled. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Pitluk) cover package profiles Marine Miguel Terrazas, noting that his death, the result of an improvised explosive device set by insurgents, "appears to have led to the killings now under investigation."

US Downplays Iraqi PM's Remarks. In a separate story in its cover package, Time (6/12, Ghosh) reports on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's "unexpectedly angry response" to questions about the Haditha slayings. Al-Maliki "accused US forces of misconduct even beyond the actions of the Marines last Nov. 19. … Iraqis saw in al-Maliki's outburst a bid to counter the perception that he is Washington's stooge." Time adds, "For the moment, U.S. officials are downplaying al-Maliki's tough talk. … Indeed, al-Maliki's remarks may have been intended less for the U.S. government than for members of his own."

US Military Investigating At Least Two Other Incidents Of Civilian Deaths. U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Whitelaw, Pound) reports, "The US military acknowledges investigations into at least two other unrelated incidents of Iraqi civilian deaths. In one, several US soldiers are likely to face charges in the shooting death of one Iraqi in the town of Hamandiyah. And, last week, the BBC reported allegations that another military unit rounded up and shot 11 civilians in the town of Ishaqi before blowing up their house to hide the actions. (The Pentagon said an investigation cleared the soldiers of wrongdoing in Ishaqi.)"

Iraqi Ambassador Says His Family Members Were Victims Of A US "Atrocity." Newsweek (6/12, Thomas, Johnson) reports in its cover story, "In an interview with NEWSWEEK, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, Samir Sumaidaie" discussed "an atrocity that, he claims, happened to his own family. A year ago, says Sumaidaie, Marines raided the home of his cousin, a school principal in a small village in Anbar province. The Marines shot the man's son, a student home from college. The only weapon in the house was an AK-47 loaded with blanks. Ambassador Sumaidaie protested all the way to Gen. George Casey, the Coalition forces commander, but was told that the Americans fired in self-defense—and that the ambassador had to file a Freedom of Information Act request if he wanted to see the investigative file."

Estimate Says 38,000 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed Since May 1, 2003. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Ghosh) cover package, "Though there is outrage among many Iraqis about the alleged massacre in Haditha last November, the violence on Iraq's streets is so unrelentingly horrific that even the worst atrocities have lost their power to shock. Few Iraqis even know how many people have died by the bullets and bombs." Time adds, "According to the Iraq Body Count project, the most frequently cited source, at least 38,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed since May 1, 2003, when President George W. Bush announced that 'major combat operations' had ended."

Levin Call Haditha Killings "A Real Massacre." On CNN's Late Edition Sen. Carl Levin, (6/4, Blitzer) said that from what he has been told about the incidents in Haditha, "there is a massacre here of 24 civilians, and not accidentally. This looks like, from all appearances, a real massacre. There's finally an investigation that's taking place, but there's also the real possibility of a cover-up here."

Biden Reiterates Call For Rumsfeld Resignation. On NBC's Meet The Press (6/4), host Tim Russert asked Sen. Joseph Biden, "How high up the chain, based on your information, do you think this goes?" Biden replied, "The Secretary of Defense. … He should be gone. He shouldn't be in his office tomorrow morning. And I'm so tired of saying this on your show. I've been saying this for two years." Russert: "Well, the President knew about it in March." Biden: "Well, we can't get rid of the President. He's there for two and a half more years. There is a system of accountability. … When you make serious mistakes, you step forward and you acknowledge them and you walk away. Presidents can't and shouldn't do that. Secretaries of Defense can and should."

Kristol Says Liberal "Hand-Wringing" Wrong Response To Haditha. In his Weekly Standard column (6/12), William Kristol says, "The last thing we need in response to Haditha is hand-wringing liberalism. The war against the jihadists…is not a metaphorical one. Liberals may want to win a war on terror without fighting, and are shocked that in a war, crimes and abuses occur. But here's the hard, Trumanesque truth: In war, terrible things happen, including crimes and abuses and cover-ups." Though "crimes and cover-ups cannot be excused or tolerated," what "makes us exceptional is that we stand for liberty, and that we are willing to fight for liberty. We don't need to 'prove' we are different from the jihadists by bringing our own soldiers, if they have done something wrong, to justice. Of course we must and will do this. But our doing this 'proves' nothing. Even if there were ten Hadithas, we would still not have to 'prove' that we are 'different from the jihadists.' The idea would be offensive if it were not ludicrous. What we do have to prove is that we are strong enough to fight this war, and intelligent enough to win it."

US Marines Face Second Iraqi Murder Investigation. In a 1,500-word story on its front page, the Washington Post (6/5, A1, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports another controversial action by US forces against an Iraqi civilian. "All parties to the case of Hashim Ibrahim Awad al-Zobaie agree that he was shot dead by Marines of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment on April 26 in the small central Iraqi village of Hamdaniyah. But there are differing accounts of his death, and they are at the heart of another investigation into the conduct of American forces in Iraq." The Marines claim Hashim was burying a bomb and was armed, while Hashim's family claims he was executed and the evidence planted. "Hashim's family alleged this weekend that a small group of U.S. servicemen came to them last week and offered the family money to support the Marines' version of the killing." The Post keys on the fact that Hashim was disabled, and calls his killing "the smaller and less prominent of two incidents being investigated over allegations of wrongful death and possible cover-ups".

Rice Says Iraqi Cabinet Posts Will Be Filled Soon. The Financial Times (6/5, Biedermann) reports, "Iraq's governing coalition yesterday failed to name the crucial defence and interior ministers, despite an earlier pledge by" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "to do so and despite ongoing violence." The AP (6/5, Yen) reports Secretary Rice said "Iraqi leaders should agree in the next few days on filling key security posts for the government," and says she called "on the United States to be more patient despite growing sectarian violence." Rice: "Of course, they need to get this settled, but they will get it settled. The more important thing here is that they get it right. When they get it right, and they will get it right, everybody will forget how long it took them." Rice "said she had faith that al-Maliki was a strong leader who will be able to assert control," and later "denied that a decision by U.S. military commanders last week to move about 1,500 combat troops from a reserve force in Kuwait into volatile Anbar province to help establish order in an insurgent hotbed was a sign of growing trouble."

AFP (6/5) says Rice "played down difficulties in filling key posts in Iraq's new government and predicted the process would be complete in 'the next few days.'" Rice "remained upbeat," and "played down Maliki's concerns about the conduct of US troops in Iraq following reports of" the Haditha killings and other alleged acts of violence.

In an analysis piece titled, "Iraqi Government Has Rocky Start," the AP (6/5, Buzbee) reports, "Two weeks ago, President Bush praised Iraq's new unity government as a watershed event and turning point in the war. Since then, a series of crises shows how troubled the path ahead remains." For all major players in the rebuilding effort, "the two troubled weeks have called into question whether U.S. troops can begin any drawdown this year, as originally hoped." While "not everything is bleak," the "stalemate over the [Cabinet] jobs demonstrates that apparent political success in Iraq — such as the formation of al-Maliki's unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds — can often mask more entrenched problems." Ambassador Khalilzad, "a hands-on official with perhaps the best view of the country's internal workings, said in astonishingly frank terms in recent days that while the unity government is a step forward, serious problems remain." Knight Ridder (6/4, Youssef) runs a similar report.

21 Iraqi Shiites, Kurds Killed In Religiously Motivated Attack. Gunmen killed 21 Iraqi Shiites and Kurds on busses in a town northeast of Baghdad, selecting victims by religion and ethnicity. The story was reported by each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, lead story, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported on "an attack so brazen so, brutal, that against the daily drum beat of violence in Iraq this, one stands out. 21 people, 12 of them students on their way to take exams, executed by attackers who dragged them out of three buses northeast of Baghdad." ABC (Marquez) added, "Gunmen pulled their victim office the bus. Divided them up. Let the Sunnis go free. And then executed the Shiites and the Kurds."

CBS Evening News (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Palmer, 7.66M) reported the attack was "so brutal it even shocked this country already numbed by violence. Witnesses say armed gunmen stopped three minibuses north of Baghdad and killed all the Shi'a and Kurds on board including 14 students on their way to exams. The four Sunni passengers were spared. Nearby yesterday, the heads of eight Sunni men were discovered along with a note explaining they had been killed for allegedly having murdered four Shi'a doctors. The cycle of deadly religious tit for tat killings has escalated all week as Iraqi security forces battled increasingly bold insurgent gangs in broad daylight trying to take over whole neighborhoods."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported it was a "new horror in Iraq. Gunmen drag 21 Shiite Muslim men from three busses north of Baghdad and execute them. A dozen were high school students on the way to take exams. Five were old men. The lives of four Sunnis were spared. In the south, Sunnis were the victims. Iraqi police shot dead nine men in a Sunni mosque in Basra, a day after 28 Shiites were killed in a market bombing. The police said the dead were terrorists."

Iraqi Government Seen As Unable To Reduce Sectarian Violence. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, lead story, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Today's violence comes, despite the Iraqi's vow to crack down on sectarian violence, another sign that the new leaders have little control over security on their own streets. Once again, today, the government failed to appoint candidates to run the Ministries of Defense and Interior, as expected. The government agencies, expected to keep the peace, are still unable to do so."

CBS Evening News (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's Prime Minister is trying desperately to work out a deal tonight between Shi'a and Sunni factions that would share out control over the country's security forces. The hope is then that each side would reign in its violent supporters. But the fear is it is already too late."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Once again, the nation's new government, even though it promised it would, could not agree on new chiefs for Iraq's police and army, leaders counted on to stop the violence. 'More negotiations are needed,' explained an Iraqi government official, a phrase heard often in recent weeks. But while the Iraqi government quibbles about who will lead their security services, Iraqi civilians die in increasing numbers."

The AP (6/4, Quinn) reports the attacks "dealt a blow to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's pledge to curb sectarian violence. He again failed to reach consensus Sunday among Iraq's ethnic and sectarian parties on candidates for interior and defense minister -- posts he must fill to implement his ambitious plan to take control of Iraq's security from US-led forces within 18 months."

The New York Times (6/5, Tavernise, 1.19M) also says "the killings were in keeping with the nature of attacks here now, and, in a grimly familiar pattern, were not hindered by authorities of any kind, Iraqi or American." The killings are "a grim illustration of how badly security has deteriorated in and around Baghdad." The Washington Post (6/5, Hernandez, Nouri, 744K) and Washington Times (6/5, Behn, 90K), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Forensic Teams' Efforts To Collect Evidence Of Saddam Atrocities Examined. The New York Times (6/5, Burns, 1.19M) reports from the edge of the Ash Sham Desert in Iraq, "in the late winter of 1991, at least 28 men were executed here, crowded together in a pit their killers scraped with a backhoe from the desert floor. Rounded up along the alleyways of their native city, they were forced aboard a bus or truck and driven out along an isolated highway." What "happened here is not only a macabre marker in the history of Iraq under Mr. Hussein, but a harrowing footnote in American politics. The victims here, American and Iraqi officials say, died in Mr. Hussein's suppression of the Shiite uprising across southern Iraq in early 1991. It was a rebellion that survivors — and American critics of the President George H. W. Bush — say that the president encouraged after halting American troops at Iraq's southern border with Kuwait at the end of the Persian Gulf war." For "the American forensic experts who came to Iraq after the 2003 invasion, the desert camp is a way station toward holding Mr. Hussein accountable for what many Iraqi human rights experts say was the most merciless passage in his 24 years in power." Raid Juhi, "chief investigative judge for the Iraqi court now trying Mr. Hussein in another case, said during a visit here on Saturday that the court had documentary evidence, and statements from witnesses, showing that at least 100,000 Shiites, and possibly 180,000, died in the 1991 repression. The trial of Mr. Hussein and his associates for what is known among the Shiites as the 'intifada,' or rebellion, could be still a year or more off."

Ohio Marine Unit's Losses Unite Parents Despite Differing Political Views. The Washington Post (6/5, A3, Slevin, 744K) reports "amid the sadness that has looped through his life since the death in Iraq of his only son," Bob Derga has "found a spark that drives him to defend President Bush, the war and the troops who are fighting it. He has begun to speak out, urging Americans 'to have the guts as a nation to stay the course.'" Paul Schroeder and Rosemary Palmer, "whose only son lived and died in the same Marine Reserve unit as Derga's son, have also been driven by anguish to speak out. But they do not believe in this war or this president or in staying the course." To "talk with the parents is to see reflected a real debate, grounded in searing loss, about the war's wisdom. It is also to witness a powerful connection felt toward one another by the Gold Star families of Lima Company, 3rd Battalion, 25th Marines." The Columbus, Ohio-based Lima Company "spent seven months in Anbar province last year and lost more troops than any other U.S. military unit in the war. What many had expected would be relatively safe duty -- perhaps guarding a base -- turned into grueling weeks of combat. Twenty-three Marines died, blown up by roadside bombs or killed by insurgents."

Military Doctors Face Unfamiliar Professional, Ethical Dilemmas. USA Today (6/5, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports military doctors Brett Schlifka and Hans Bakken have "made a pact — something they would not have done back home. Because counseling a family in a war zone is impossible, and because the U.S. military offers no guidelines on whether to withhold treatment for severely brain-damaged casualties, the doctors had decided to err on the side of life. No matter how severe the brain injury, no matter how hopeless the case, they vowed to keep a soldier alive long enough to get him out of the war zone, if only so his family could see him one last time." For Schlifka, Bakken "and other doctors at one of the busiest battlefield hospitals in Iraq, the war has created new or more complicated moral and ethical dilemmas. Here, doctors often face profound personal choices treating the most disturbing wounds they have seen." Like those "featured in the recent HBO documentary Baghdad ER, doctors here say working at a battlefield hospital is at once the most fulfilling and most frustrating experience of their lives — one that has changed them, as doctors and as people."

NATO Troops In Afghanistan Focus On Reconstruction, Winning Local Support. USA Today (6/5, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports NATO units "moving into troubled southern Afghanistan will have twice as many combat troops as the Americans they're replacing. But they will focus more on protecting reconstruction projects and winning Afghan support than on hunting Taliban fighters, the NATO commander said here Sunday." British Lt. Gen. David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) said, "I have a different approach. The way to win in a campaign like this is to win the support of the people." USA adds Afghan government troops "and U.S.-led coalition forces have been battling Taliban militants in southern Afghanistan." Next month, ISAF "will formally replace U.S. forces in the south, and Richards will take command there."

Suicide Bomber Kills Four In Kandahar. The New York Times (6/5, Gall, 1.19M) reports that in Kandahar, a "suicide bomber exploded his car on the main street…narrowly missing the governor of Kandahar Province and a Canadian military convoy, but killing 4 civilians and wounding at least 12 others, officials said. The explosion was heard across town and stirred anger and fear once more in a city that has been shaken by violence for months." As the police "cleared the wreckage of the suicide bomber's car, the owners and workers of a teahouse on the sidewalk beside it cursed the Taliban, the government, the United States-led coalition, former Afghan leaders, President Bush and Pakistan."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Fannie Mae Head Under Probe. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (6/5, Phelps) reports, "In a nearly 40-year career that's spanned politics and business, James Johnson has parlayed a talent for relationships that's taken him from rural Benson, Minn., to inside the Capitol beltway. … He served in the West Wing of the White House as Vice President Walter Mondale's right-hand man. In the 1990s, he led Fannie Mae, the nation's largest provider of home mortgage funding. He was chairman of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and led the prestigious Brookings Institution. … But these days, Johnson is under fire for being too generous with other people's money. Fannie Mae's regulator has criticized the size of Johnson's compensation in his final year at the mortgage giant. And at UnitedHealth Group, he chaired the board committee that awarded lucrative stock-option packages to William McGuire and other top executives at the Minnetonka-based health insurer." The Tribune adds, "Compensation awarded to UnitedHealth executives going back as far as 1999 is under review by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the IRS and the Justice Department, as well as the subject of a special internal audit. As chairman of UnitedHealth's compensation committee, Johnson is in the crossfire with CEO McGuire, corporate counsel David Lubben and Chief Financial Officer Patrick Erlandson."

Key Figures In Fannie Mae Scandal Tied To Clinton Administration. In the National Review (6/19), Byron York says the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO)'s report on Fannie Mae was "stunning. In meticulous detail, it outlined a culture of corruption at the Federal National Mortgage Association — better known as Fannie Mae — that rivals the most serious corporate scandals in recent years. In this case, however, the main players are Washington insiders — some of them prominent veterans of the Clinton administration — and the scandal's effects could ripple through Congress for years." From 1998-2004, Fannie Mae "was headed by former Clinton budget director Franklin Raines, whose top management team included former Clinton Justice Department official Jamie Gorelick, sometimes mentioned as a future attorney general in a Democratic administration. During that period, the report says, Raines and his team grossly overstated Fannie Mae's earnings — to the tune of $10.6 billion — for the purpose of paying themselves big bonuses."

Former National Century Financial Executives Plead Not Guilty To Fraud Charges. The AP (6/3) reported, "Seven former executives of a defunct company that was once the nation's leading lender to health care providers pleaded not guilty Friday to charges that they defrauded investors of more than $3 billion." A federal grand jury indictment "last month alleged the executives at National Century Financial Enterprises lied to investors about how their money was being used, then conspired to conceal cash shortages by shuttling money among various subsidiaries. The former officers are charged with 60 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud, mail fraud and money laundering." Among the executives "who entered pleas Friday in U.S. District Court was founder Lance Poulsen, 62, of Port Charlotte, Fla., who faces 47 federal counts. He already is fighting similar charges in a civil case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission."

Suits Over Backdated Stock Options Are Next Step In Probe. The National Law Journal (6/5, Bronstad) reports, "Securities class action lawyers are preparing for the next wave of shareholder lawsuits as more companies and their top executives face federal probes and accounting restatements linked to the backdating of their stock options." The Journal continues, In the past month, dozens of shareholder suits have been filed on behalf of large institutional shareholders by a number of law firms, including well-known plaintiffs' firms Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann of New York and Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins of San Diego. The suits allege that certain companies backdated stock options granted executives to enhance the profits the executives made when they exercised the options." The Journal adds, "Backdating stock options is at the heart of recent inquiries by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and Justice Department. So far, more than two dozen companies have been targeted, many of which have restated their earnings or ousted their top executives. … Meanwhile, lawmakers have been debating in recent weeks whether to seek stricter regulations than those being proposed by the SEC regarding executive compensation."

Judge Considers Companies Denying Legal Fees To Employees. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Davies) reports that a federal judge is considering whether prosecutors should be able to force companies to cut, "off legal support for employees suspected of wrongdoing," in a, "case against 16 former KPMG LLP executives accused of marketing fraudulent tax shelters." The Journal adds, "Defense attorneys for the former executives have complained to the judge that prosecutors leaned on KPMG to cap or cut off the legal-fee reimbursements to their clients." Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, "pronounced himself 'troubled' by the government's actions at a hearing last month. His response could come any day."

Former Tyco Exec Seeks Reimbursement For Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Levitz) reports, "Jailed former Tyco International Ltd. Chief Executive L. Dennis Kozlowski is battling over the insurance coverage for his hefty legal bills." Mr. Kozlowski filed papers in a New York state court, "recently seeking documents from an insurance broker that negotiated Mr. Kozlowski's 'officer and director' liability policy at Tyco." The Journal continues, "Mr. Kozlowski has put in a claim to be reimbursed for nearly $17.8 million he spent defending himself -- but the insurer has rejected the claim."

Tier Technologies CEO Forced Out. The Washington Post (6/5, D1, Kang) reports that only two years after Tier Technologies Inc. moved to Reston with a record stock price former CEO James, "Weaver has been forced out and the company is under a, "SEC investigation." The Post adds, "Its stock was removed from the Nasdaq National Market after it failed to file financial statements for the past nine months, and the company says it now must restate its financial records back to at least 2002." What went wrong is unclear, but records suggest, "a combination of missteps and core problems, including weak financial management and increased competition."

WSJournal Urges Stock Markets To Regulate Themselves. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Transatlantic mergers are promising to finally do for stock markets what globalization has done for the rest of the business world: bring new opportunities and efficiencies to investors. The big unknown is whether regulators will have the sense not to get in the way." The Journal also urges the business community to regulate itself, noting that "government abhors a vacuum. If private industry isn't offering its own solutions, regulators will design something that works for them -- usually with worse results."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Court Documents Reveal Broad Scope Of Alleged Jefferson Bribery Deals. In a front-page story, The Washington Post (6/5, Lengel, Weisman, 744K) reports that "over dinner with business partner and FBI informant Lori Mody, Rep. William J. Jefferson…furtively scrawled the letter 'c' on a sheet of paper, and next to it wrote some numbers indicating that he was demanding a much larger personal stake in an African business deal than previously agreed to." Jefferson told Mody, "I make a deal for my children," and, "as court records, sworn affidavits, plea agreements and search warrants attest, it was quite a deal, one of several involving at least seven business entities, nearly a dozen family members and hundreds of thousands of dollars sloshing through bank accounts, all for Jefferson's personal benefit." The Post notes that "as that controversy subsides" over the FBI raid, "the focus has shifted back to Jefferson and the corporate labyrinth that federal authorities say he erected to secretly receive illegal payments for promoting high-tech ventures in Cameroon, Ghana and Nigeria."

Judge Orders Release Of Nigerian VP Search Warrant Affidavit. Roll Call (6/5, Bresnahan) reports, "In another legal setback for Rep. William Jefferson," US District Judge Alexander Williams Jr. on Thursday decided "to publicly release documents supporting an FBI search of a Potomac home belonging to Jennifer Douglas, a wife of the vice president of Nigeria, Atiku Abubakar. Jefferson has until this afternoon to appeal the ruling." Roll Call notes, "The six paragraphs that will not be made public are from a court-approved wiretap in which Mody wore a wire during her dealings with Jefferson."

DOJ, House Lawyers To Begin Discussions About Jefferson Documents. Roll Call (6/5, Pershing) reports, "The dispute over last month's FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's…office will continue on three different fronts this week as the House and the Justice Department grapple over the fate of the documents seized from Jefferson and with how similar cases should be handled in the future. Lawyers from the House and the Justice Department are expected to sit down within the next several days to begin negotiations on a set of procedures for dealing with possible future search warrants for Congressional offices." Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner "has pledged to craft legislation on that subject and to hold more hearings on the constitutionality of the Jefferson raid," and "sources said House lawyers are expected to file a brief on behalf of the chamber in federal court on Tuesday supporting a motion by Jefferson's attorneys calling the search unconstitutional and asking that the FBI return the documents it took." Noting the ABC News poll which "showed that 86 percent of respondents — including 94 percent of Republicans — believed the FBI's search was allowable," Roll Call adds, "With Members in their districts last week, House GOP leadership aides said their bosses were taking a wait-and-see attitude on whatever legislation Sensenbrenner might produce."

More Commentary. In a Roll Call (6/5) op-ed condemning the FBI search as a violation of the Speech and

Debate Clause, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars Congress Project director Don Wolfensberger Donald Wolfensberger writes that "the unprecedented FBI raid" on Rep. William Jefferson's office "instantly jolted me back to an earlier era of parliamentary history," when "King Charles I, with a group of armed men, burst into the British House of Commons to arrest five of his most vocal critics for treason" and set off the English Civil War. "There are clear signs President Bush has gotten the message from the united Congressional outcry at this overreach of power and is interested in repairing the breach. … Let us hope the damage is not irreparable and that the two houses on the Hill and the White House may come again to enjoy each others' hospitality — when invited."

In a Roll Call (6/5) op-ed, Chadbourne & Parke partner Abbe David Lowell writes, "A civil libertarian is a conservative against whom an investigation leak has just occurred," and "thus, Speaker Dennis Hastert…has become the new spokesman for reining in the power of prosecutors." Lowell notes, "It should not be shocking to the Speaker or anyone else paying attention that this administration did what none other has done in more than 200 years — execute a search of a sitting Congressman's Capitol Hill office. … This truly has become the administration whose motto is: 'We do it because we can.'" Lowell adds, "As worrisome as this problem is, the solution is not a difficult one. Midterm elections provide a real opportunity for Americans to restore a better balance."

Lobbying Firm's Clients Subpoenaed As Part Of Lewis Investigation. Roll Call (6/5, Bresnahan) reports a federal grand jury in Los Angeles investigating Rep. Jerry Lewis, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has subpoenaed "at least four clients" of the lobbying firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White. According to Roll Call, "Federal investigators are looking into the ties between Lewis and former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), a partner in Copeland Lowery, and are focusing at this point chiefly on Jeffrey Shockey, the deputy chief of staff for the Appropriations panel who previously worked for the lobbying firm, several sources close to the probe said. … When Lewis took over as chairman of the Appropriations Committee at the start of the 109th Congress, Shockey returned to the panel as deputy chief of staff. Shockey received a $600,000 package from Copeland Lowery before he left the firm."

Tennessee Waltz Bag Man, Former FBI Agent Testify About Alleged Bribes. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/3, Buser) reported, "The key government informant in Roscoe Dixon's bribery trial testified Friday that the former state senator indicated to him that to gain support in the legislature 'you had to pay to play.' Tim Willis, a political consultant who wore recording devices for the FBI, said he paid Dixon and his aide Barry Myers thousands of dollars in cash to push a bill on behalf of E-Cycle Management, Inc." He "acknowledged that he was well paid by the FBI -- $180,000 in salary and more than $26,000 in expenses since 2003 -- but that he did not become an informant only to make money or to avoid going to prison. 'I think the videotapes demonstrate that I don't need to lie today,' Willis told defense attorney Coleman Garrett on cross examination. 'Senator Dixon took bribes.'" The Commercial Appeal added, "In other testimony Friday, former FBI agent Joseph Carroll told jurors how he came out of retirement for 14 months to play the role of E-Cycle chief executive officer 'Joseph Carson.' Carroll's undercover skills were needed because he had spent most of his 30 years in the FBI investigating public corruption in more than a half dozen state legislatures."

The AP (6/3, Baird) reported that during Willis' testimony, jurors saw a second video clip of Dixon taking an alleged bribe. "'Oh man, you want me to carry that,' …Dixon says on the clip when handed two envelopes that informant Tim Willis said contained a total of $1,500. … Willis said Dixon was wary of accepting money himself and insisted that bribes go to an aide, Barry Myers, who testified against his former boss this week." The AP added that during Carroll's cross-examination, defense lawyer Coleman Garrett tried to ask Carroll "about 'other targets of the E-Cycle operation' but was stopped by Judge Jon McCalla on an objection from the prosecution. Garrett contends government agents focused more on black lawmakers than on white legislators." WPTY-TV Memphis (6/2) and WMC-TV Memphis (6/2) also reported on Friday's testimony.

Cotton Beginning Three-Year Prison Term Today. The Chattanooga Times Free Press (6/4, Lazenby) reported, "Former Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton is scheduled this week to become the second Tennessee Waltz defendant to begin serving prison time on federal extortion charges." Cotton "is scheduled to report Monday to Edgefield Federal Correctional Institution in Edgefield, S.C., where he will serve three years."

Sorich Lawyers Subpoena High-Ranking Daley Aides' Records. The Chicago Tribune (6/3, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reported defense lawyers for former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich "have subpoenaed datebooks, diaries, calendars and e-mails of the mayor's Chief of Staff Ron Huberman, corporation counsel Mara Georges and other high-ranking officials in the city Law Department. The subpoena demanded that the city release on Friday all documents related to internal investigations of the city's hiring and promotions practices and the scandal-marred Hired Truck Program." The Tribune noted, "Durkin's subpoena also demanded the city produce information about hiring that was provided to federal prosecutors in 1997. In particular, he sought lists that Sorich kept of names of people who applied for city jobs or promotions."

Blagojevich Patronage Chief Met With Hiring Officials About Applicants. The Chicago Tribune (6/4, Pearson, Chase, 643K) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage chief routinely met with other hiring officials to discuss job applicants and their political sponsors for positions that were supposed to be free from clout, sources involved with the process say. Blagojevich aides say they created a complex system to prevent hiring officials from seeing the names of candidates seeking so-called civil service jobs, providing an extra layer of security to ensure politics was not a factor in doling out the jobs. But even after the system was established, the sources said, patronage officials and others in the governor's office still knew applicants' names and discussed their clout at meetings to decide whether to fill positions."

Former Ohio Workers Comp CFO Charged With Taking Bribes. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/2, Tobin, 375K) reported, "The former chief financial officer for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation took cash, a Florida Keys condo and tuition payments for his son in exchange for doling out lucrative investment contracts, according to charges filed by federal and state authorities Thursday." Terry Gasper "was charged in U.S. District Court in Cleveland with one count of racketeering. He was also charged in Franklin County Common Pleas Court with one count of money laundering and one count of violating Ohio ethics laws because he did not report the gifts. The charges were related to favors that authorities say Gasper received from investment brokers, dealers and marketers and from Tom Noe, the disgraced coin dealer and heavyweight Republican fund-raiser." The Dayton Daily News (6/2, Bischoff) noted, "He was charged through a bill of information, not an indictment," which Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien said his office typically uses when "the defendant is cooperating with authorities and plans to plead guilty." The AP (6/2, Welsh-Huggins) also reported on the charges.

Probe Examining Former AmEx Executive's Connections To Gasper. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/3, Brown, 375K) reported, "Authorities are investigating the role a former senior vice president of an American Express company played in getting unauthorized investment business from the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, sources said Friday. Officials are examining Clarke Blizzard's connections to Terry Gasper…and Blizzard's role in brokering millions in investments that were later changed into risky, unsanctioned hedge funds, sources said. Those funds eventually lost $4.8 million of the bureau's money." Blizzard "allegedly showered Gasper and friends close to him with thousands of dollars' worth of meals, Columbus Blue Jackets hockey tickets, airline tickets and other gifts."

Prince George's School Board Members Testify Before Hornsby Grand Jury. The Washington Post (6/4, C6, Anderson, Rich, 744K) reported, "Prince George's County Board of Education members and other school officials testified recently before a federal grand jury investigating issues related to former county schools chief Andre J. Hornsby, officials familiar with the testimony said. The testimony…signals a quickening pace in an investigation that helped drive Hornsby from office one year ago. … The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of grand jury proceedings, said federal prosecutors appeared to be scrutinizing issues raised by an independent ethics report. That report examined Hornsby's actions relating to the federal telecommunications subsidy known as 'e-rate and a $1 million purchase of classroom equipment for literacy instruction." The Post noted, "In April 2005, the FBI seized records from Hornsby's office in Upper Marlboro and other school facilities."

FBI Cuts Agents Assigned To Seattle Federal Prosecutor Murder Probe. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/3, Shukovsky) reported, "The FBI has cut the number of agents assigned to the almost five-year dragnet to find the murderer of Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Wales. …

Leaders of the FBI's Seattle office -- who have about 140 agents to cover the entire state of Washington -- made the decision to reallocate scarce FBI resources last month. It came on the heels of a routine inspection of the office by FBI headquarters, said federal criminal justice sources." US Attorney John McKay "made clear Friday that he was not happy with the decision to cut the number of agents on the case. … But he added he has 'confidence in the Seattle FBI to get it right.'" SAC Laura Laughlin and Assistant SAC Steven Fiddler made no comment, but "one federal criminal justice source who spoke on condition of anonymity said" that the decision "is a good call" because "it reflects the lack of progress in the Wales investigation, and balances it against other investigative priorities."

Second DC Transportation Official Charged With Bribery. The Washington Times (6/5, Mcelhatton) reports, "A D.C. Department of Transportation inspector was indicted last week on charges of seeking cash payments in exchange for allowing illegal job sites to operate or to prevent contractors from being fined. Denard A. Smith," is, "the second city inspector charged in a bribery scandal in the past month." The Times adds, "Authorities said Mr. Smith accepted a total of about $4,000 in cash from more than a dozen people since last summer."

Florida Plastic Surgeon Convicted Of Medicare Fraud For AIDS/HIV Treatments. The Miami Herald (6/2, Dorschner, 323K) reported Isaac Nosovsky, "a former plastic surgeon in Weston, has been convicted in federal court of Medicare fraud charges involving expensive AIDS/HIV infusion treatments -- the latest case in a crackdown to stop widespread schemes that may have bilked taxpayers out of hundreds of millions of dollars." Nosovsky "gained notoriety last year over accusations that he allowed his brother, Gregorio, to perform breast implants and other cosmetic operations even though Gregorio had no medical license. At least 35 women have said Gregorio botched their surgeries, and both brothers still face criminal charges in Broward courts concerning their alleged unlicensed collusion." The fraud indictment "stated Nosovsky had taken Medicare for $1.3 million in his fraudulent billing scheme."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/2, 249K) added that Novosky was convicted of "fraudulently billing Medicare $1.3 million for patients treated at a HIV/AIDS clinic, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. … Medicare patients were paid cash kickbacks to attend Nosovsky's clinic…in Miami." The South Florida Business Journal (6/2) noted that three "other co-conspirators - Rosa Walled, Rafael Walled and Gregory Delatour -were separately charged and have all pleaded guilty."

Columbine A 'Benchmark' To Troubled Children. USA Today (6/5, Toppo) reports, "U.S. public schools in April saw at least a dozen Columbine-like plots foiled, from central Alaska to southern Florida. … Why does Columbine still resonate for troubled kids? School safety experts say they struggle to answer that question." Bill Modzeleski, of the Safe and Drug-Free Schools program says, "seven years later, disaffected children talk about 'out-Columbining, outdoing Columbine. So that's the benchmark.'" Today continues, "authorities in several areas have responded by filing terrorism charges based on threats alone, paving the way for possible longer sentences and, in cases when attacks actually take place, trials in adult court."

Data From Active Duty Navy, National Guard Stolen With VA Information. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 3, 0:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The case of the missing data from the Department of Veterans Affairs is growing with more military personnel potentially at risk, from stolen information. The government says data on as many as 50,000 active duty Navy and National Guard personnel are among the records stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee last month. Already, 26 million retired veterans are at-risk."

Man Arrested Trying To Jump White House Fence. The Secret Service arrested a man yesterday as he tried jump the fence on the south side of the White House. The AP (6/4) reported that Roger Witmer of Washington "faces charges of unlawful entry and disorderly conduct." Secret Service spokesman Tony Mazur "said members of the uniformed division captured Witmer before he got over the fence. But he threw over plastic bags, and officials shut down traffic on the south side of the White House so they could be examined for explosives. None was found."

Hotel Website Loses Data From 250,000 Customers. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "The Internet site Hotels.com has notified thousands of customers that their credit card information may have been compromised. The data was loaded on to a lap stop compute that was stolen back in February. The company says there is no evidence so far that the information has been misused."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 7, 0:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "The travel website Hotels.com says it involves a company laptop carrying the names, addresses, and credit card numbers of nearly 250,000 customers. Letters have been sent to those involved, and officials are watching for improperly used information."

Brownback Visits Jail Overnight To Highlight Reassimilation Program. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 7, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Every year, an estimated 650,000 inmates are released. Two-thirds of them will be rearrested within three years. Creating new crime victims and costing taxpayers millions of dollars to put those offenders back behind bars. For years, inmates have been released with $100 and a bus ticket. Now, a coalition of liberals and conservatives are trying to change that. Days ago, one of the most conservative politicians in the country, US Senator Sam Brownback, stayed overnight in this prison in his home state of Kansas. He met, mingled and prayed with, murderers, rapists and robbers." Brownback "doesn't want to reduce their sentences. He wants to reduce the chances they'll commit new crimes when they're released." Sen. Brownback: "Once a person has paid their penalty to society, let's work with them to see they don't go back in." ABC added the "annual price tag for corrections in this country, $60 billion. Nearly double the budget for homeland security. Which is why Senator Brownback is co-sponsoring the Second Chance Act. It would prepare inmates for success outside of prison." Of 40 inmates who participated in one program in Kansas, "only 4 have been rearrested. That's way below the national average of 66%." Senator Brownback "says research shows children of inmates are more likely to become criminals themselves. And that reentry programs can help address that generational curse."

WPost Praises SCOTUS Decision In Ceballos Case. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/5, A14, 744K) praises the Supreme Court decision the case of Richard Ceballos, a prosecutor with the Los Angeles district attorney's office, who claims he suffered professional retaliation for questioning the accuracy of a search warrant affidavit upon which his office was relying in a criminal case. The case presents a "difficult puzzle: whether the First Amendment right to free speech protects Mr. Ceballos's on-the-job expressions. The court ruled that it does not. On balance, we think that's right. … In the end, the First Amendment seems a bad fit for shielding intragovernmental debate. Protecting people like Mr. Ceballos should be the province of whistle-blower protection laws, which need to be strong enough to prevent retaliations of the sort he claims."

LATimes Skeptical Of Administration Stance On Preserving Internet Records. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) says the Bush Administration "has opened talks with leading Internet providers and search engines about preserving their records. The Justice Department apparently wants Internet companies to keep two years' worth of data on where users go, what they search for and to whom they send e-mail. The ostensible purpose is to combat child pornography and terrorism. That's a laudable goal. It's not at all clear, however, that this plan would put more bad guys behind bars. It's more likely that the new troves of data would attract hackers or trial lawyers." The Justice Department "should have to show that the change is needed to put more child pornographers and terrorists behind bars."

CIVIL LAW:

Number Of Fair Wage Lawsuits Increases. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Maher) reports, "Workers are filing more lawsuits against employers they accuse of violating fair-wage laws that govern overtime and minimum pay, with an increasing number seeking to combine the claims with large groups of their fellow employees as well. The suits increasingly seek what is called collective action under federal wage laws." The Journal adds, "In part, the uptick reflects efforts by lawyers to represent large groups of workers, from assistant managers to computer technicians and delivery drivers who may be owed back wages, and collect potentially lucrative settlement fees."

Potential Abortion Bans Playing A Role In Many State Races. The New York Times (6/5, Davey, 1.19M) reports that "in campaigns for governor and the Legislature…many candidates are not only being asked about limits on abortion, but a far broader, starker question: to outlaw or not to outlaw?" The Times notes that the issue is playing a prominent role in the South Dakota, Florida and Arkansas gubernatorial contests, adding that in many state races, "it remains uncertain who will benefit from the sudden focus on abortion bans -- candidates who oppose abortion rights or those who favor them."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush Will Urge Senate To Pass Gay Marriage Ban At White House Event. NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 8, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "At the White House, marriage will be the topic in the Rose Garden tomorrow. The President plans to use the setting to push again for an amendment against same-sex unions." NBC went on to report that Republicans "acknowledge they don't have the 67 votes needed for passage, but President Bush is calling on Congress to act now." NBC also said that with his "approval ratings low, steady bad news out of Iraq, problems with the immigration bill, and elections in November looming, the timing of the gay marriage debate is welcome by the President and his party."

The Washington Times (6/5, Fagan, 90K) reports that today the Senate begins debate on the gay marriage ban. The Times notes President Bush "this weekend stepped into the fray, using his Saturday radio address to urge approval of the amendment. … He will make another push at a White House meeting today, after conservative groups complained that he hasn't fought hard enough for the measure. The Senate is expected to vote Wednesday on whether to limit debate and force a final vote, but even supporters say they likely won't get the needed backing from 60 senators to force a final vote."

Friend Says Gay Marriage Is Barely On Bush's "Moral Radar." Newsweek (6/12, Rosenberg) reports that President Bush "had been mostly mum on gay marriage since his re-election. But now, with his poll numbers in a nose dive and even his most enthusiastic supporters grousing, Bush took up the cause in his radio address Saturday; an amendment is needed because 'activist courts have left our nation with no other choice,' he explained." Newsweek notes, "Though Bush himself has publicly embraced the amendment, he never seemed to care enough to press the matter. One of his old friends told NEWSWEEK that same-sex marriage barely registers on the President's moral radar." White House aides "insist that the President does care about banning gay marriage."

Frist To Bring Gay Marriage Amendment Up For A Vote This Week. Newsweek (6/12, Rosenberg) reports that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist this week will bring the Federal Marriage Amendment (FMA) up for another vote in the Senate. The House "House could weigh in next month. Though it isn't expected to pass either House, supporters want to get pols on the record before November." Newsweek adds, "While the GOP leadership clearly hopes this tack can revive their sputtering election prospects this fall, some GOP strategists aren't so sure. Pew polls show a 10-point jump in support for gay marriage since 2004."

NYTimes Calls Bush Radio Address "Cynical" and "Depressing." The New York Times (6/5, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "devoted his Saturday radio speech to a cynical boost for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage. It was depressing in the extreme to hear the chief executive trying to pretend, at this moment in American history, that this was a critical priority."

Bauer Sees Change In How Marriage Is Viewed. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) former presidential candidate Gary Bauer, president of American Values and chairman of the Campaign for Working Families, writes, "Many couples are replacing the traditional promise 'til death do us part' with vows such as 'for as long as our love shall last' and 'for as long as we continue to love each other.' Clearly these couples are under no illusions about their odds in a nation with a 50% divorce rate."

FBI Uncovers Eastern Shore Sex-Trafficking Operation. The Virginian Pilot (6/3, Burke, Gaynair) reported, "Federal authorities allege they have uncovered a sex-trafficking operation in which prostitutes were transported from New York City to service Hispanic customers at a brothel" in Mappsville on Virginia's Eastern Shore. "The case is the latest in a growing number of investigations nationwide of sex trafficking involving Hispanic women," and "in the Eastern Shore case, three people have been arrested so far." FBI agents "secretly videotaped activity and conducted surveillance at the Beartown Road house, where weekend business was brisk, according to court documents and testimony in Norfolk federal court last week. … Jennifer V. Collins, the lead FBI agent in the case, testified…that there were conflicting opinions among those involved in the operation of the brothel about whether the women were free to leave when they were on the Eastern Shore."

Busby Retracts Controversial Remark Concerning Voting By Illegals. The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0031612

Times (6/5, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Francine Busby, the Democratic candidate in the CA50 special election, "finds herself trying to explain a remark she made last week to a largely Hispanic audience: 'You don't need papers for voting.' On Thursday night, Francine Busby, the Democratic candidate for the 50th Congressional District in California, was speaking in Escondido when she uttered those words." Someone taped the remarks "and a recording began circulating Friday. After she made that statement at the meeting, Mrs. Busby immediately said: 'You don't need to be a registered voter to help' the campaign. She said that subsequent statement was to clarify what she meant."

Rothenberg Says Strong Busby Showing Would Be Evidence Of Coming "Democratic Deluge." Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (6/5) that neither party is expressing confidence about the CA540 special election, which "increasingly looks like a test of Democratic efforts to ride a wave of voter dissatisfaction and of Republican efforts to energize the party's conservative base." Rothenberg notes that "even if former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) ends up squeaking out a narrow victory against Democrat Francine Busby…a strong Busby showing (say, near 50 percent) would be evidence that the Democratic Deluge of '06 has begun."

Electronic Voting Machines Face Legal Challenges. USA Today (6/5, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports that electronic voting machines are the subject of legal challenges in at least six states. Most of the suits "argue that the machines are vulnerable to software tampering, don't keep an easily recountable printed record and may miscount, switch or not record votes and even add phantom votes. … No case yet has claimed intentional manipulation of electronic vote data. But another advocacy group, Black Box Voting, reported last month that a Finnish expert found security flaws for a Diebold Election Systems model. Diebold, a major manufacturer, says the vulnerability is theoretical and will be fixed this year."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ, FTC In Antitrust Clash Over Generic Drugs. The Financial Times (6/5, Kirchgaessner, Bowe) reports, "An unusual rift between the top antitrust authorities in the US over the legality of deals between pharmaceutical companies and their generic counterparts is intensifying, raising questions for the companies involved in the controversial transactions." The Times continues, "The dispute between the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, which is playing out in the arena of the Supreme Court, is likely to become even messier next week when the FTC takes the rare step of filing a second petition urging the court to take on the issue over the objections of the Bush administration." The Times adds, "At the centre of the disagreement between the justice department, the top law enforcement body, and the FTC, an independent agency composed of Democratic and Republican commissioners, is a complex patent dispute involving Schering-Plough and its drug, K-Dur 20, which treats the side-effects of drugs for high blood pressure. … In 1997 Schering ended a dispute with a generic rival by paying the company, Upsher-Smith, $60m (€46m, £32m) to stay out of the market until 2001. Schering's patent was originally intended to expire this year. The FTC has claimed that the agreement, as well as similar deals that have since been agreed between drug companies, are anti-competitive. … The agency says that while settlements between drug companies do not violate antitrust laws, the equation changes when branded drug groups offer their generic rivals deals they cannot refuse: substantial payments to stay out of the market until a certain date."

Toshiba Gets Nod For Westinghouse Deal. The Financial Times (6/5, Kirchgaessner, Hoyos) reports, "Toshiba's $5.4bn takeover of Westinghouse, a UK-owned nuclear company, has cleared a significant regulatory hurdle with the approval of the deal by the US committee that investigates foreign transactions on national security grounds." The Times continues, "People familiar with the transaction said it got the green light from the secretive Committee on Foreign Investment in the US, or Cfius, last week." The Times adds, "Approval from Cfius was widely expected but it represents an important milestone given the heightened political tension in Washington. Both the Cfius process and acquisitions by foreign companies of sensitive assets either owned by US groups or, in the case of Westinghouse, located in the US have recently come under the spotlight. … A political firestorm erupted in Congress this year after Cfius approved the takeover of five US port terminals and other facilities by a state-owned Dubai company. Lawmakers said the deal compromised US national security and attacked the executive branch agencies that comprise Cfius for failing to adequately investigate the deal. … The backlash forced Dubai Ports World to sell the port terminals to a US buyer. It also prompted a flurry of legislative proposals to revamp the Cfius process. … Although the proposals have not yet been made law, attorneys and lobbyists who work on Cfius deals in Washington say that, in practice, the Dubai controversy has had a significant impact on the way deals are handled and expanded the range of transactions that are reviewed."

Planned NYSE Merger Reveals Lack Of International Regulations. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Wysocki, Lucchetti) reports, "As financial markets grow more electronic and international, a big question looms: Who should regulate them? … That issue is now in the spotlight as the operator of the New York Stock Exchange sets plans to merge with Euronext NV." The Journal adds, "Right now there's no formal legal framework for regulating exchanges that cross national borders." While executives at the NYSE and Euronext say little regulation will change, "under the new combined holding company" regulators are still "planning adjustments -- more sharing of information, for example."

Unitab Rejects Tabcorp Takeover Bid. The Financial Times (6/5, Reporters) reports, "Unitab on Monday rejected an eleventh hour unsolicited A$1.9bn offer from Tabcorp, Australia's biggest gaming group, and maintained its endorsement of a merger plan with another betting operator. Tabcorp's cash-and-paper offer – presented on Thursday — values the Queensland-based Unitab at A$14.25 a share." The Times continues, "This is higher than a rival A$1.7bn paper bid for Unitab, unveiled in March, from Tattersall's." But Unitab said, "in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange on Monday that it considered the offer made by Tabcorp inadequate for a takeover."

Political Fallout From Rate Increase Halts FLP, Constellation Merger. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Smith) reports, "FPL Group Inc.'s proposed $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy Group Inc. looks increasingly doubtful due to a political furor in Maryland over higher electricity rates. Constellation Chief Executive Mayo Shattuck sent employees a letter May 30 in which he said the firm had 'ceased FPL merger integration activities.'" The Journal continues, "A 72% rate increase by Constellation's Baltimore Gas & Electric unit has become a political issue in Maryland, where Democrats are hoping to unseat Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich."

Ferrovial To Raise Hostile Bid For BAA To $18.46 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Singer) reports, "Spanish construction company Grupo Ferrovial SA will raise its hostile offer for British airports operator BAA PLC for a second time in a final, £9.8 billion ($18.46 billion) bid to acquire the world's largest airport operator by market value, according to people close to the matter. It will raise its bid to at least 915 pence ($17.23) a share." The Journal adds, "To defend against the Ferrovial bid, BAA has said it would return £700 million to shareholders and boost its dividend payout by 40% this fiscal year."

ENVIRONMENT:

Blanco Threatens To Block Federal Efforts To Drill In Gulf. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco says she will try to block federal efforts to open part of the Gulf of Mexico to oil drilling this summer unless Washington shares the proceeds with her state. Blanco "risks the ire of Washington, which is providing billions of dollars in reconstruction money to her storm-racked state. Even so, she says she will try to block the August auction of offshore oil properties in the western Gulf unless the federal government agrees to help restore the state's wetlands, which scientists say are disappearing at an alarming rate." The Journal adds, "It is unclear whether Ms. Blanco can force the cancellation of the August lease sale, but she may be able to delay it, since she can file an objection with the Interior Department. If the department rejects her complaint, Ms. Blanco can appeal to the Commerce secretary. If the Commerce secretary overrides her, Ms. Blanco has hired a Washington lawyer and threatened a suit."

Gore Urges Paulson To Speak To Bush About Global Warming. Former Vice president Al Gore was asked on ABC's This Week (6/4, Stephanopoulos) if he thinks the nomination of Henry Paulson, his "ally… in the fight against global warming," is evidence of "a change of heart by the president" on global warming. Gore replied, "I would like to think so. … I doubt it. I would love to be proven wrong about that. His first secretary of the Treasury was terrific on the issue of global warming, but it didn't make any difference to the president." Gore added, "I hope that privately he will try to convince the president to change his mind."

Hubbard Cheers Paulson Nomination. R. Glenn Hubbard, who was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President George W. Bush, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), "President Bush's selection of Hank Paulson to be the next Treasury secretary is cause for cheer. His nomination also offers a pause for reflection on the economy's performance and its productivity muse -- and on concerns about the economic outlook." Treasury Secretary John Snow "has rightly celebrated the economy's success, and Mr. Paulson will no doubt do so as well. But explaining the fount of that success and confronting real fears about change and entitlement spending would be a welcome addition."

China Becoming A World Leader At Developing Renewable Energy. U.S. News and World Report (6/12) reports that China "is quietly becoming a world leader in developing renewable energy sources and technology. With its energy needs growing exponentially and the price of oil near record highs, Beijing is using every possible means to eke out extra kilowatts -- and this means not only cutting oil deals with rogue regimes and building nuclear reactors but also putting into place some of the most aggressive renewable-energy policies in the world."

NYTimes Praises Protection Of Coral Under The Endangered Species Act. The New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) editorializes, "Anyone who has given thought to the pitifully fragile state of the oceans' coral reefs should have been heartened by the recent classification of two kinds of coral as threatened under the Endangered Species Act. The inclusion of the elkhorn and staghorn, two species of Caribbean coral, was a welcome first for the list, prompted by a task force on coral reefs established by President Bill Clinton and continued by the Bush administration.

2 DC Jail Escapees Recaptured. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Glod, Pierre) reports, "The second of the two men who escaped from the D.C. jail Saturday was recaptured last night in the Seat Pleasant area of Prince George's County. The other man was picked up early yesterday at a Fairfax County motel." Ricardo Jones, "was seized about 11:40 p.m., the U.S. Marshals Service said." While Joseph Leaks, "was arrested without incident about 1:20 a.m. yesterday." The Post continues Leaks and Jones had escaped by, "smashing through a reinforced window, officials said."

Jail Break Raises Concerns Over Neighboring Citizens Safety. The Washington Times (6/5, Mcelhatton) reports, "The jailbreak has raised questions about whether the facility's siren system to alert neighbors was working properly. Wilbert Hill, an advisory neighborhood commissioner who lives about five blocks from the Southeast jail, said he and others in the area did not hear the sirens. 'I think they should have some way of notifying residents of a prison break,' Mr. Hill said."

Alleged Drug Dealer May Be Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (6/3) reports on an alleged drug dealer who may be linked to recently reported overdoses involving fentanyl-laced drugs and writes, "The plan was to buy drugs and arrest the suspected dealer, Maurice A. Adkins, on the spot. But Adkins tried to escape, injuring an undercover detective in the process, and officers opened fire, officials said. As Adkins, 27, lay in critical condition in a hospital Friday, prosecutors filed charges of first-degree assault on a law enforcement officer, delivering a controlled substance and possession of a controlled substance. … A man arrested with Adkins was hospitalized after authorities discovered that he had swallowed some heroin during the arrest, police said."

Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/5, Rotstein) reports, "A potent form of heroin delivered devastating effects to users in several city neighborhoods over the weekend, killing one and knocking others unconscious in cars and homes. Pittsburgh police said they and paramedics responded to at least 20 heroin overdose cases in a 24-hour period yesterday and Saturday, primarily in Hazelwood, Greenfield and Lincoln Place and on the North Side. At the scene of many of the overdoses, investigators found tiny packets labeled in red type with the words: 'Get high or die trying.'

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/5) reports, "Police do not know if a high concentration of the drug or something mixed with it is to blame for the unusually high number of overdoses. Police do not know where the heroin is coming from but are working with their counterparts in Detroit to see if there is a link with overdoses reported there."

In Tennessee, Plea Agreements Reveal Millions Of Dollars Worth Of Drug Trafficking. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (6/5, Satterfield) reports, "A slew of guilty pleas entered in the past two weeks in U.S. district courts in Knoxville and Greeneville has generated a paper trail outlining a decade-long venture among a diverse band of traffickers that served up $22.5 million worth of marijuana and nearly $1.1 million in meth to users in East Tennessee. The granddaddy of plea agreements secured by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Reeves in this case involves Washington County man Mark Saults, a horseback-riding country boy who headed up this organization. Saults has admitted pushing 15,000 pounds of pot, 24 pounds of meth and a handful of pounds of cocaine in a drug business he began in earnest in 1995." The Sentinel also notes the DEA's involvement with the case.

10 Arrested In Mississippi Drug-Ring Investigation, More Arrests Expected. From Hattiesburg, the AP (6/4) writes, "Authorities say they have arrested at least 10 people in a probe into a drug trafficking ring that operates between Mexico, Jackson and Hattiesburg and more arrests are likely. … 'You can reasonably say that these defendants are connected to an active investigation that remains ongoing,' said Steve Luzinski, spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in Jackson. He described it as a large investigation into marijuana and cocaine trafficking." A similar story was published by the Hattiesburg American.

Use Of DEA "Bug" Credited For Collapse Of Gang Leader's Influence. The Chicago Tribune (6/4) reports, "At the peak of his tyranny, Larry Hoover's "gang nation" numbered 50,000 members in 35 states. … In the mid-1990s, though, Hoover's influence collapsed. The key reason: U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents dreamed up the kind of electronic gadget that makes TV's '24' a celebration of technology deployed against bad guys. More than a decade after that DEA coup, a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has declared that the feds' tactics didn't violate the rights of Hoover's deputy, Gregory 'Shorty G' Shell." The Tribune goes on to report how DEA supervisor Rick Barrett thought of the idea of using microphones and transmitters thin enough to fit a prison visitor's tag and ultimately get information needed for the investigation.

In Texas, "Operation Elm Street" Seen As Groundbreaking Drug Investigation. The McAllen Monitor (6/4) reports, "Two to three times a week, for at least a decade, George Gutierrez or members of his clan…made trips up U.S. Highway 281 to San Antonio, Austin or sometimes Houston with 50 to 300 pounds of pot concealed in passenger vehicles. … The illicit drug proceeds financed a multi-million dollar real-estate developing business, lush trips to Las Vegas, the best hotels. … But access to those and other luxuries came to a halt when the county's drug interdiction task force in tandem with the local U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's task force closed in on the family's illegal dealings in late 1999." The investigation was called "Operation Elm Street," and it "became a groundbreaking operation that launched larger, longer investigations, the kind for which HIDTA task forces are known."

Guatemalan Man Accused Of Drug Smuggling, Customs Officer Faces New Trial. In its "Police Briefs" section, the Brownsville (TX) Herald (6/5) reports a federal judge on Friday "denied bond for a Guatemalan man after customs officers found more than 6 pounds of heroin and more than 6 pounds of cocaine in his truck's battery. Henry Otoniel Yanes drove a 1999 Ford Ranger across the Gateway International Bridge on Wednesday, according to a criminal complaint. … According to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Web site, Colombian heroin traffickers are known to smuggle the drug to Guatemala and then into the United States using car batteries."

In a separate story in the same section, the Herald reports, "A federal judge said a new trial for a customs officer accused of bribery will take place…despite objections from his two attorneys. The four-day bribery trial for U.S. Customs & Border Protection K-9 officer Juan Posas ended May 25 afternoon with a mistrial because of a deadlocked jury. Authorities arrested Posas in March based on a two-count indictment for accepting bribes and allowing drug smugglers to pass through his post."

In Montana, Tobacco Shop Owner Acquitted Of Possessing Drug Paraphernalia. The AP (6/4) reports a tobacco shop owner has been acquitted of possessing drug paraphernalia for sale, a day before a similarly accused but convicted Missoula man was sentenced by a judge critical of the prosecution. A federal jury Thursday acquitted Bradford Moore, 46, owner of Heads Up Tobacco Shop. He is one of four Montana business owners arrested last year during an investigation by federal drug agents. The four include David Sil, 61, of Missoula, who Friday received a sentence of two years on probation for distribution of drug paraphernalia."

The Missoulian (6/3) reports, "Last May, Drug Enforcement Administration agents seized pipes, cash, clothing items and business records from Sil's shop, The Vault, a small pipe and tobacco accessories business he opened nearly 10 years ago. On Friday, fighting for a sentence at the lower end of the federal spectrum, Sil's attorney, Martin Judnich, explained that his client operated The Vault in Missoula for eight years, without subterfuge and without legal consequences."

IMMIGRATION:

Fifty-Five National Guard Troops Begin Border Security Duties In Arizona Today. The New York Times/AP (6/5) reports that 55 Utah National Guard troops will begin work today "extending fences, improving gravel roads and working on border lighting near the town of San Luis, Ariz., which is part of the nation's busiest Border Patrol station." The AP notes, "The troops are part of President Bush's plan to send up to 6,000 National Guard members to the four border states to perform support duties that will allow immigration agents to focus on border security. The Guard members will not perform significant law enforcement duties." NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 3, 2:25, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "critics contend that sending in the National Guard on a hastily improvised mission like this probably will not do much to stem the flow of illegal immigrants from the south of the border, this as concerns about securing that border continue to mount in this country. Despite the criticism, the Border Patrol people here say they welcome the addition of the Guard, something they say will free up agents to do the work of law enforcement."

Report Finds Illegals Escape Portion Of Tax Burden. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Brulliard, 744K) reports a study by the Urban Institute shows that taxes "paid by immigrant households in the Washington region are on par with those paid by native-born Americans, although immigrants here illegally pay less." DC-area immigrants "pay nearly one-third of their income to the government -- at least $10 billion a year -- but those here illegally pay less than $1 of every $5 they earn in taxes, the report says. That is partly because they earn less but also because many are paid off the books and escape payroll taxes.

Stabenow's "Balancing Act" On Immigration Draws Criticism Form Left And Right. The Washington Times (6/5, Lambro, 90K) reports Sen. Debbie Stabenow "is under attack in Michigan for straddling the fence on the immigration bill, attempting to please both sides of an issue that has deeply divided her political base." Stabenow "has come under fire" from Republicans and the Lansing State Journal, "a major state newspaper," for "opposing key amendments that would crack down on the hiring of illegal aliens. According to the Times, "While Mrs. Stabenow's votes on the bill appeared contradictory to some, Michigan Democrats said she was striking a balancing act on the measure by casting votes that would appeal to her state's Hispanics, but in the end voting against the entire bill, which much of her party's blue-collar constituencies oppose."

Immigration Sowing Discord Amongst Some GOP Rivals. The Washington Times (6/5, Hurt, 90K) reports, "From districts along the Mexican border to deeply landlocked districts, immigration has become both a rallying cry for Republicans in some races and a wedge that splinters Republicans in other races." The Times notes that Sen. John McCain cancelled his appearance at a fundraiser for former rep. Brian Bilbray, who is trying to replace former Rep. "Duke Cunningham, after Bilbray "publicly attacked" McCain's Senate legislation "because he said it granted 'amnesty' to illegals." Among other races briefly noted by the Times is the GOP primary in UT6, where Rep. Chris Cannon's support for a guest-worker program helped challenger John D. Jacob beat Cannon among delegates at the Utah GOP convention.

Grassley Tax Measure Complicates Immigration Reform Negotiations. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/5) writes, "On May 23, as the Senate raced toward passage of the comprehensive immigration bill" Sen. Charles Grassley "moved the adoption of a new Title III to the measure. It passed easily without anybody mentioning that the amendment raises revenue, which was a violation of the U.S. Constitution's requirement that all such measures originate in the House of Representatives. That adds another new obstacle to the formidable task of reconciling seemingly irreconcilable Senate and House immigration bills. To surmount the constitutional problem, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, in effect, must pass a new bill -- either under a procedure requiring unanimous consent or starting over with a bill subject to amendment." According to Novak, "There is no sign that Grassley intentionally sought to sabotage the immigration bill."

Annan Claims Migration Benefits Countries Of Origin And Receiving Countries. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M) Kofi Annan, secretary general of the UN, writes, "In a report that I am presenting tomorrow to the U.N. General Assembly, I summarize research which shows that migration, at least in the best cases, benefits not only the migrants themselves but also the countries that receive them, and even the countries they have left. How so? In receiving countries, incoming migrants do essential jobs which a country's established residents are reluctant to undertake. … Meanwhile, countries of origin benefit from the remittances that migrants send home, which totaled around $232 billion last year, $167 billion of which went to developing countries -- greater in volume than current levels of official aid from all donor countries combined, though certainly not a substitute."

TAX:

McCain Among GOP Senators Blocking Estate Tax Repeal. Roll Call (6/5, Stanton) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "hopes that the expected defeat of a GOP plan to fully repeal the estate tax this week will help increase pressure on the two wings of his fractured party to work together, along with moderate Democrats, to craft a compromise later this summer, Senate GOP aides said. … A motion to proceed to the bill is set for Wednesday, but a senior GOP aide said Thursday said that it remains well short of the 60 votes required to take up a full repeal measure. If that happens, leadership aides are expected to recommend that Frist drop the issue for now to 'let the dust settle' and allow compromise talks to continue behind the scenes before settling on a course of action." Roll Call goes on to report that "moderate" Republicans, "including Sen. John McCain, have argued that…the repeal sought by Frist and President Bush would expand the deficit by too much.'

WSJournal Says As Many As 62 Senators May Support Repeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), in an editorial, writes that with sixty votes needed "to defeat a liberal filibuster…we're told 56 Senators have indicated they'll vote for repeal, with another six undecided." The Journal adds, "It speaks volumes that opponents of repeal aren't debating the morality of the double or triple taxation that the death tax represents. Instead, they're basing their case on highly dubious Joint Tax estimates. These phony numbers may provide political cover both to fence-sitting Democrats and 'deficit hawk' Republicans such as" McCain and Sen. George Voinovich.

Sessions Says Estate Tax Is Among The "Most Painful" Taxes. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (6/5, 744K) Sen. Jeff Sessions writes that the estate tax – "or, as many of us prefer to call it, the death tax –" is "one of the IRS's most painful taxes, as it hits families at the worst possible time, when they are dealing with the death of a loved one."

Columnists Claim Repeal Would Diminish Assistance For The Needy. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (6/5) writes, "it's important to realize that there's still a clear connection between tax breaks for the rich and failure to help Americans in need. Any senator who votes to repeal the estate tax…is in effect saying that increasing the wealth of people who are already in line to inherit millions or tens of millions is more important than taking care of fellow citizens who need a helping hand."

The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (6/5) writes, "It doesn't matter if you are liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican. There is no possible excuse for doing what Congress is poised to do this week: Abolish the estate tax." Mallaby adds, "The nation faces rising inequality. … What is the dumbest possible response to this? Identify the most progressive federal tax and repeal it."

IRS Will Split Tax Refunds Among 3 Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (6/5) reports, "Hoping to encourage Americans to save more of their tax refunds, the Internal Revenue Service will change its rules to allow taxpayers who opt for direct deposit of their refunds to divide the money among as many as three accounts. Taxpayers would have to fill out an additional form -- dubbed Form 8888 -- to take advantage of the program." The Journal continues, "'Split refunds should encourage saving, and we hope it will dampen demand for refund anticipation loans,' said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. The program will take effect in January."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

High Court Taking Fewer New Cases. The Washington Post (6/5, A13, Lane) reports, "The inscription on the Supreme Court's front door declares 'Equal Justice Under Law.' But lately it almost seems that 'Going Out of Business' might be more accurate. … That's because the justices have been unusually stingy about agreeing to hear new cases." The Post continues, "Out of thousands of petitions for certiorari, as appeals are known, the court has granted only 16 for the term beginning in October. That is nine fewer than the 25 it had granted by this point in the previous term. … The court has an opportunity to issue more grants today and on each of the remaining three Mondays in June. But it is unlikely that the court will be able to find the 16 cases it would take to fill up its 32-hour fall oral argument calendar, lawyers who specialize in Supreme Court practice said. … Even for a court whose caseload has declined from about 150 to about 80 per term over the past quarter-century, this is a slow pace." The Post adds, "Lawyers who practice regularly before the Supreme Court are aware of the trend but are at a loss to account for it. … One factor, lawyers noted, might simply be the lack of lower-court rulings that cry out for correction. Usually the court looks to resolve 'circuit splits' -- conflicting decisions by regional appeals courts on major issues. … But with the appeals courts increasingly stocked by Republican appointees, there is relatively less disagreement among them."

DOJ_NMG_0031618

Medicaid Citizenship Rules Seen As Hardship For Children And The Elderly. The New York Times (6/5, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush administration "plans this week to issue strict standards requiring more than 50 million low-income people on Medicaid to prove they are United States citizens by showing passports or birth certificates and a limited number of other documents." The Times notes that "federal health officials" considered granting states "broad discretion to accept affidavits in place of official documents. But House Republicans complained, and the administration backed off, allowing affidavits 'only in rare circumstances.'" According to the Times, "advocates for the poor" claim the new requirements "could cause hardship for children, older Americans and poor people born at home in rural areas who never received birth certificates. Children account for about half of Medicaid recipients. People 65 and older account for about 10 percent."

White House's Wehner Highlights Underreported Positive Trends In The News. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/5, A15), Peter Wehner, director of the White House's Office of Strategic Initiatives, says, "By now Americans know the litany: The nation is engaged in a difficult and costly war in Iraq; Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon; gas prices are high; the costs of reconstructing the Gulf Coast region are huge; illegal immigration is a major problem -- and more." But these issues "aren't the whole story -- and they ought not color the lens through which we see all other events." A "strong case can be made that in a number of areas there are positive trends and considerable progress." We are "witnessing a remarkable cultural renewal in America. Violent crime rates remain at the lowest levels in the history of the Bureau of Justice Statistics' survey (which started in 1973). We are experiencing the sharpest decline in teen crime in modern history. Property crimes are near the lowest levels in the history of the federal survey. Welfare caseloads have declined almost 60 percent since 1996. Both the abortion rate and ratio are at the lowest levels we have seen in the 30-year period these data have been tracked." Other positive news includes the economy, which is "the strongest in the world and growing faster than that of any other major industrialized country," the US is using its "military power to promote great purposes" and "we are witnessing one of the swiftest advances of freedom in history." The "trajectory of events is in our favor -- and with the passage of time, all this will become clear enough."

Kappes Will Return To CIA. Time (6/12, Burger) reports in its "Notebook" column that Stephen Kappes, a former CIA operations chief, will rejoin the CIA as predicted. Kappes "would rejoin a CIA that has changed considerably since he quit in November 2004 after a management dispute with Porter Goss." Time adds, "Many career spooks are said to be thrilled by the symbolism of bringing back a man who stood up to the unpopular Goss, who quit last month. But the return of Kappes, who declined interview requests last week, is receiving some mixed reviews."

Congressional Lobbying Reform Negotiations Have Stalled. The AP (6/5, Abrams) reports, "The stench of scandal on Capitol Hill is getting stronger five months after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to influence-peddling charges, but a lobbying overhaul has yet to see the light of day." The AP notes that in January both parties "battled for the ethical high ground." Rep. David Dreier, "who has led GOP lobbying efforts in the House, said at the time he hoped to pass a bill by the end of February." Dreier's spokeswoman, Jo Maney, "said the effort to reach consensus on the bill has been a challenge because some lawmakers are opposed to any changes while others favor revamping the entire system."

Municipal Governments Increasingly Relying On Lobbyists For Earmarks. Business Week (6/12) reports that as Congress "has moved toward passing more narrowly targeted spending projects, known as earmarks, a niche lobbying business has sprouted to steer that money to local interests." A "surprisingly large number of legislators have resigned themselves to the outsourcing of federalism. Some say that given the press of other legislative duties, they welcome any help they can get." More than "800 state and local governments, or their arms, employed a lobbyist on Capitol Hill in 2005, some more than one, according to a count done for BusinessWeek by the Web site lobbyists.info."

Administration Enforcement Of Medical Privacy Law Criticized. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/5, A1, Stein, 744K) reports, "In the three years since Americans gained federal protection for their private medical information, the Bush administration has received thousands of complaints alleging violations but has not imposed a single civil fine and has prosecuted just two criminal cases. … While praised by hospitals, insurance plans and doctors, the approach has drawn strong criticism from privacy advocates and some health industry analysts. They say the administration's decision not to enforce the law more aggressively has failed to safeguard sensitive medical records and made providers and insurers complacent about complying."

Study Urges Government To Recognize "Strategic Value" Of CORs. The Washington Post (6/5, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that a study released by the Merit Systems Protection Board urges the federal government to "find ways to identify and track" contracting officer representatives, or CORs, "improve their training opportunities and recognize their 'strategic value.'" The Post adds, "A significant proportion of the CORs told the Merit Systems Protection Board that their contracts failed to meet at least one of these goals: quality, timeliness, completeness and cost. Only 52 percent of the CORs said their contracts met all of the goals at the same time. … The study also questioned whether some agencies are doing enough to support CORs so they can crack down on waste, fraud and abuse, and the board recommended that agencies ramp up training for CORs."

NYTimes Says Drug Benefit Has Left Some Worse Off. An editorial in the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) says that while the new Medicare drug benefit "has scored some real successes after a staggeringly bad start, but it seems to have left some beneficiaries worse off." The Bush Administration "seems to have resolved most of the bureaucratic and computer problems that initially left tens of thousands of people unable to obtain essential medicines quickly. Complaints at pharmacies have dropped precipitously, and callers who once found it impossible to get through congested help lines now typically wait only a few minutes when trying to reach either Medicare or most individual health plans."

OTHER NEWS:

US Firms Post Unprecedented Rate Of Growth. The Financial Times (6/4, Swann, Guerrera) reports, "US companies have increased their share of the economic pie at a faster rate over the past five years than at any time since the second world war. Recent government figures show that profits from current production as a share of national income have risen from 7 per cent in mid-2001 to 12.2 per cent at the start of this year. This rate of growth is unprecedented since collection of these figures began in 1947."

Central Bankers Seek To Discourage Speculative Investments. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Browning, LaHart, 2.11M) reports that the world's central bankers "are draining away some of the easy money that has made investors' lives comfortable for years. … If they keep mopping up the excess liquid cash they had helped pour into the markets, they will eventually slake the world's thirst for speculative investments, forcing investors toward established stocks, government bonds and other safe investments. If they decide to go easy, as Japanese officials recently have been doing, then maybe some of the speculative investments can hang on."

Florida Republicans Worried About Harris' Senate Bid. USA Today (6/5, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports that Rep. Katherine Harris' bid for the GOP Senate nomination in Florida is "inspiring dread among many in her party. Whether they measure by fundraising, polls, disarray, ethics, strange behavior or potential to polarize, they see trouble." Although Gov. Jeb Bush, said Harris could not win, and "staged a search for an alternative," the September 5 primary "will pit three little-known latecomers against the high-profile Harris." USA lists Harris' "other problems," including her "appearance," her "sketchy record" and her ties to corrupt defense contractor Mitchell Wade.

Jeb Bush Called Best Governor In US. In the Weekly Standard's cover story (6/12), Fred Barnes says if Gov. Jeb Smith's "last name were Smith," he would "be the prohibitive frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But his last name is Bush. So Jeb Bush, nearing the end of his eight years as governor of Florida, has to settle for being the best governor in America." Bush has been "recognized as the best by a smaller group: governors who served with him and experts and think-tank and conservative policy wonks who regard state government as something other than a machine for taxing and spending." Barnes concludes the lengthy profile by saying, "We know he's not running for president in 2008. But what about 2012 or 2016? He seems disinclined."

In Possible 2008 Preview, Warner, Allen Cross Paths In Richmond. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Shear, 744K) reports, "The orbits of former governor Mark R. Warner (D) and U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) collided Saturday at Richmond's swank Jefferson Hotel, offering a preview of what the 2008 election might bring if Virginia's two most ambitious politicians seek the White House. … In six months, the prospect of a chance meeting of Warner and Allen might not seem so novel. Both are openly flirting with a presidential bid, although neither admits to having made a final decision. An announcement from either could come after the November elections."

Gore Says He Has "All But Ruled Out" Another Presidential Bid. The Washington Post/AP (6/5, A5) reports that former Vice President Al Gore "says he has all but ruled out running for president in 2008, saying the best use of his time is to educate people about global warming. … Gore, in an interview broadcast yesterday on ABC's This Week, stopped short of issuing…an unequivocal statement. But he said his time is best spent educating people on heat-trapping gases raising Earth's surface temperature."

Kristol Says Gore, Not Clinton Is Favorite For 2008 Democratic Nomination. On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "There's a huge opening for" Sen. Hillary Clinton "to be challenged from the left. Gore is the strongest challenger, probably, from the left. And I think…he can get in the race a year from now. It will be Clinton vs. Gore. I think Warner, Bayh, Feingold -- I think those people start to fade awfully fast. And I believe Gore could beat Clinton in the Iowa caucuses. … The notion that Hillary Clinton should be favored over Al Gore strikes me, at this point, as wrong. … I think he could be the nominee in 2008."

Brown Running For California Attorney General. The New York Times (6/5, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Jerry Brown's candidacy for California attorney general. Brown "is running to fill a law-and-order post that is beholden to the demands of other state officials — not to mention Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican — might surprise those who remember his maverick, on-my-own 1992 presidential bid. That was his most recent venture on the national political stage. (And his last, he says.) But as the mayor of Oakland since 1999, Mr. Brown has largely run, and delivered, on a promise to crack down on violent crime, which has plagued the city. Mr. Brown says that his experiences living in downtown Oakland, in a loft above his campaign headquarters, have given him an up-close look at the problem."

CDC Estimates AIDS Has Infected More Than 65 Million People. The New York Times (6/5, Times, 1.19M) reports that 25 years after the first mention of a "peculiar cluster of pneumonia cases in five otherwise healthy gay men," in the June 5, 1981 Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the US estimates that HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, "has infected more than 65 million people, 25 million of whom have died." The Times story also examines the disease's impact on a New York City nurse, an HIV-infected mother in Atlanta, an Indian prostitute, an artist, a doctor who wrote "what AIDS chroniclers regard as the first article on the emergence of -- well, of something unusual and terrible, but exactly what was not clear at the time" and the friends of AIDS victims.

AIDS Survivors Profiled. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 11, 0:20, Rooney, 8.78M) profiled long-time AIDS survivor JT Anderson, who is "working as a counselor, sometimes telling people, they, too, have the disease, AIDS has defined his life." Anderson: "I wish I did not have to live through that time. But I have been. And I have survived it. And I'm very happy that I have. This is the basic regimen."

The CBS Evening News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) profiled long-time AIDS survivor LaGena Lookabill Greene, who has lived with the disease for 25 years.

Writer Praises Warren's Approach To Religion And Public Life. Tom Krattenmaker, a writer specializing in religion in public life, writes in USA Today (6/5, 2.31M), "Is 'inclusive' Christianity just watered-down religion — a weakened faith that compromises the Truth for the sake of political correctness? Listening to the more strident voices in today's debates over religion in public life, one could easily reach that conclusion. … Happily, another model is emerging, one that makes a compelling case that evangelical belief in the public square need not always divide us. The exemplar of this other approach: Rick Warren, the pastor of an evangelical megachurch in California, the author of the mega-selling Purpose-Driven Life." Warren "is spending his time and clout…on a campaign that can bring people together and save many lives in the process. Warren is taking on poverty and AIDS and on a continent — Africa — that tends to command the least of the world's attention and resources."

Professor Makes Case For Tradeable Gasoline Rights. Martin Feldstein, a professor of economics at Harvard, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), "The rapid rise in the price of gasoline has produced calls for tougher fuel economy standards on new cars and trucks. Although reduced gasoline consumption would be good for the environment and for national security, such a regulatory change would be a mistake. A far better approach would be a system of tradeable gasoline rights, or TGRs. … In short, a system of tradeable gasoline rights would be better than either higher taxes or tougher new car regulations. … It would be an efficient way to reduce gasoline that Congress could actually pass."

Herbert Praises Boston's SkillWorks Program. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) about "a modest but promising joint effort by business, government, union and nonprofit leaders in the greater Boston area to open new doors to good jobs and higher standards of living." The effort, called SkillWorks, was "organized by the Boston Foundation, to improve the skills and career opportunities of the low-wage work force in a number of industries. … What SkillWorks is attempting to do is merge investment commitments from foundations and the government (Mayor Thomas Menino is solidly onboard) with a willingness of business leaders to actually provide meaningful employment and promotion opportunities to the kind of men and women whose talents have long been overlooked, and thus wasted." SkillWorks "is a serious attempt to address at least one aspect of this complex picture in a way that is beneficial to employers while keeping the best interests of the workers in mind."

Hevesi Criticized Over Suggestion About Shooting Bush. In an editorial, the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) writes New York State comptroller Alan Hevesi "should know better than to suggest that anybody — in this case Senator Charles Schumer — would like to put a bullet between the president's eyes. That is the opposite of funny, and an outrageous remark for a public figure."

LATimes Praises Effort To Replace Electoral College. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) praises the National Popular Vote campaign, "which intends to undermine the Constitution's anachronistic Electoral College. If the campaign succeeds, future presidents will take office only if they win the popular vote nationwide. … The beauty of this approach is that each state is constitutionally allowed to allot its electoral votes as it sees fit. The measure was approved by California's Assembly on Tuesday and is pending in four other states; backers hope to get it before all 50 states by January."

Rice Claims US Offer To Negotiate With Iran Is Not A Change Of Policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, on CBS' Face the Nation (6/4, Schieffer), said the recent US statement about negotiating with Iran were not a change in policy. Said Rice, "When the President made the decision more than a year ago that the United States was going to fully support the European negotiations, that that was in the US interest to have the diplomacy have a chance to work, that really was the course that we continued to follow this week." She added that "it was clear that at some point, we were going to have to decide should the United States become party to the talks that we already supported." During her appearances on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) and CNN's Late Edition (6/4, Blitzer) Rice made very similar statements regarding the evolution of US policy towards Iran. On Fox, Rice noted, "The decision to join the talks is a natural follow-on to the decision that the president took more than a year ago to fully and completely back the negotiations." While on CNN she maintained that "this is a path that really is logical given the president's decision more than a year ago to fully support and back the European three negotiations with Iran, with some steps that the United States took, for instance, removing our objections to a WTO application for Iran. The next step of offering to join the talks should Iran suspend its enrichment programs, the condition that the IAEA board of governors, that's a logical step in a policy that's really been set for more than a year."

Iran Announcement Seen As A Diplomatic Win For Bush Administration. Time (6/12, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Chalk up a diplomatic win for the White House. President Bush's surprise offer last week to talk to Tehran yielded breakthroughs that have momentarily quelled fears of U.S. military action against the Iranian regime." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "obtained an unprecedented commitment from Moscow and Beijing to support penalties in the Council if Iran refuses a package of political and economic incentives and continues nuclear activities that could enable it to build a Bomb." Time adds that "the pressure on Iran from all sides is growing. An International Atomic Energy Agency report on Iran's activities is expected next week, and Western diplomats tell TIME that it will include 'potentially incriminating' details about traces of highly enriched uranium recently found by inspectors on equipment at the Lavisan-Shian military site."

Newsweek (6/12, Hirsh) reports that a month ago, Rice's strategy for stopping Iran's nuclear program "was in danger of falling apart." In addition to US allies who were "voicing doubts about Rice's approach," Rice "faced a separate mutiny from the rear: mounting skepticism in the White House that diplomacy could work at all, along with tough resistance to direct talks from the hard-line faction of Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld." A senior Administration official says that on May 8 he "idea of two paths was born." The two paths "involve delivering a clear ultimatum to Tehran and, with it, a brand-new inducement. According to the new approach, if Iran cooperates and suspends enrichment of uranium, Washington will sit down and negotiate directly alongside its European partners." Newsweek notes, "As she has so often done, Rice had found a graceful way out of her troubles by compromising -- and winning President George W. Bush over to her views. In one swift move, she managed to get ahead of the Iranians, outflank administration hard-liners, delight and unify her European partners (even the Russians) -- and spin the whole affair as a triumph of U.S. leadership."

Rice Allows Iranian Government "A Little Time" To Respond To US Offer. Secretary Rice, commenting on the Iranian government's response to the offer of face-to-face talks with the US, on CBS' Face the Nation (6/4, Schieffer), said, "We're going to give the diplomacy a little time here. And we're not going to react to everything the Iranian leadership says. Over the last couple of days, they have said lots of different things. … Iran keeps talking about its right to civil nuclear power. No one is questioning that it has a right to civil nuclear power. But many countries have the right to that that don't enrich and reprocess on their territory. And given Iran's history, it must not have the technologies that could lead to a nuclear weapon."

On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) Rice contended that, "We understand that it may take a little time for Iran to assess the situation. In short time they will be presented with the actual proposals that the E.U. three and others have been considering. And I think we have to give that some time." However, "We will not allow Iran to drag this out. This really has to be settled not in a matter of months. This program has been moving along. But one reason, Chris, that you want to be sure that there's a suspension of the activity is that you don't want the negotiations to be used as a cover for continued progress along the nuclear front. "

USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) picks up Rice's comments in a story tiled "Rice: Iran Must Act Quickly On Incentives," while the AP (6/5, Pickler) headlines its report "Rice Warns Iran Against A Slow Response." The Washington Times (6/5, Pfeiffer, 90K) also reports the story.

Biden Endorses Negotiations With Iran, Claims There Is No "Imminent Threat." Responding to the administration's shift in policy towards Iran, Sen. Joseph Biden, on NBC's Meet the Press (6/4, Russert) said, "I think it's a very positive step. … I think it's long in coming, but very welcome." According to Biden, "this was a bit of a knockdown, drag-out fight between Cheney and Condoleezza Rice, and Rice won this round as to how to proceed with regard to Iraq. What you do is you continue to proceed down the line that apparently Secretary Rice now has the president on rather than return to the bellicose notions of threats." Biden added, "We shouldn't undertake military action now. It should be the absolute last resort. And one of the things that I've gotten all the briefings as most of the people in my position have, and there is no imminent threat at this point." Asked if the US public would believe President Bush if he said Iran possesses WMDs and that military action is necessary, Biden responded, "No."

Khamaneni Threatens To Disrupt Middle East Oil Supply If US Attacks. CBS Evening News (6/4, story 3, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "As if the oil markets are not rattled enough, Iran's top leader threatened today to choke off the flow of Persian Gulf oil if the US were to attack the country." CBS (Phillips) added, "The threat came in the form of a rhetorical broadside from Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and will send shivers through the world's oil markets. If you, he said, meaning the United States, make a wrong move regarding Iran, definitely the energy flow from this region will be seriously endangered. The key phrase in that threat is the use of the term 'in this region' not just Iranian but Saudi, Kuwaiti, Iraqi, all the oil from around the gulf has to flow through the narrow Strait of Hormuz, just 21 miles wide as it tucks up against the Iranian coast." In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "downplayed the threat saying playing the oil card was too risky a strategy for Iran." Secretary Rice: "Well, I think that we shouldn't place too much emphasis on a threat of this kind. After all, Iran is also very dependent on oil revenue. I think something like 80% of Iran's budget comes from oil revenue."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 5, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "It's a threat that was quickly dismissed by the US. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice suggested the cost to Iran would be too high if it stopped the flow of oil. She also had a warning of her own, that Iran needed to decide quickly on new incentives to end its nuclear enrichment program or face sanctions."

The New York Times (6/5, Knowlton, Tribune, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "played down today a threat from Tehran to curb oil exports if the United States made 'a single mistake about Iran,' but added that Iranian leaders had a limited window for taking up a six-nation offer of incentives if they stop enriching uranium."

In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/5, A10, Vick, 744K) keys on Khamenei's comments, reporting that he "unleashed a flurry of broadsides Sunday at the United States and other countries confronting his government over its nuclear program, saying that suggestions of a consensus against Iran were 'a lie.' 'There is no consensus against Iran. This is a lie by the US and a few other US supporters,' Khamenei...in a speech. 'Some 116 member states of the Non-Aligned Movement supported Iran's brave achievements in nuclear technology. The consensus is among a few monopolist countries. Their consensus is of no value.'" The AP (6/5, Dareini) also reports the story.

Lifting Of Some US Sanctions On Table For Tehran, Diplomats Say. AFP (6/5, Adler) reports, "The United States has offered to lift some of its trade sanctions against Iran as part of a package of benefits the EU will deliver to get Tehran to guarantee it will not make nuclear weapons, diplomats told AFP. The United States is proposing 'lifting sanctions partially, not only waiving sanctions but actually lifting them,' in an agreement to be worked out in multilateral talks that would start once Iran suspended uranium enrichment, said a senior Western diplomat, who requested anonymity." According to AFP, "The United States 'is not only interested in allowing Europe to sell Airbus airplanes to Tehran but also supplying (US-made) Boeings,' the diplomat said. And trade in agricultural fields, 'where the United States is particularly competitive...is important for Iran since Iran is still a rural country in lots of ways,' the diplomat added."

"Relatively Conciliatory Statements" By Iran Seen As Raising US Hopes. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "A series of relatively conciliatory statements by senior Iranian officials over the weekend is raising hopes that Tehran may be preparing to respond positively to a call by the US for direct talks over its nuclear program." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said his government would seriously study a package of incentives, expected to be delivered by European envoys, aimed at persuading Iran to scrap development of nuclear technologies. … The seemingly encouraging tone, however, was countered by other Iranian leaders."

Shanghai Cooperation Organization To Consider Offering Membership To Iran. The Washington Times (6/5, Mainville, 90K) reports, "An obscure regional security group will consider admitting Iran as a member at a summit this month, accelerating its transformation into a political and military bloc with the potential to challenge US interests." The Times adds, "US analysts think Russia and China already are using the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) -- which links the two with four Central Asian neighbors -- to try to squeeze the United States out of the region."

US-Funded Radio Farda Reaches Out To Young Iranians. The Washington Post (6/5, A13, Finkel, 744K) reports on the US-funded Radio Farda, which broadcasts inside Iran. According to the Post, Radio Farda "has been a work in progress since its debut in late 2002. The one constant, for which it has been both lauded and criticized, is that unlike Cold War-era transmissions by the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe that relied primarily on news programming, Farda blends news and music as a way to reach a country where two-thirds of the population is said to be under 30."

More Commentary. On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "Iran was winning. That's what's been happening for the last year. … It was reasonable to make one last effort, perhaps, but at some point serious decisions are going to have to be made." Kristol went on to say that President Bush "needs to deal with this threat on his watch. Either we will have diplomatic success, or we'll have success through pressure and sanctions, or we'll be forced to use military action, or we will acquiesce to Iran getting nuclear weapons."

Jackson Diehl writes in the Washington Post (6/5, A15, 744K), "In the middle of a tirade about the pointlessness of talking with the Bush administration, a senior Iranian official I met in Tehran last month abruptly paused and asked if he could speak off the record. Then he said: 'What we need is an American president who will follow the example of Richard Nixon going to China.' There in a nutshell is what this Iranian government, and most Iranians I've spoken to, fervently desire from the United States: not the tactical talks offered last week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice but strategic recognition of Iran as a great civilization and a regional power that must be treated, like China, as a 'stakeholder' in global affairs." Diehl asks, "The question then becomes: Could such a step be in the American interest? … It's hard to find experts on Iran in Washington who believe that it would."

Olmert Says He's Ready To Meet With Abbas. The New York Times (6/5, Myre, 1.19M) notes Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "said today that he was prepared to meet" Abbas "to seek a resumption of negotiations based on an international peace plan. Mr. Olmert's announcement came at a joint news conference that followed his meeting with" Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who "has sought to mediate between the Israelis and Palestinians." The Times reports, "It is far from clear whether such talks will lead to breakthroughs after years of violence. Mr. Olmert and other Israeli leaders have said progress is extremely unlikely with the militant Islamic group Hamas leading the Palestinian government. Still, Mr. Olmert said he was ready to hold talks with Mr. Abbas and has repeatedly called for renewed negotiations." The AP (6/5, Barzak) adds that, "in a rare dose of good news, …Israel's premier talked to" Mubarak "about resuming peace talks with the Palestinians." Mubarak "opposes unilateral Israeli steps, and" Secretary Rice "said the Bush administration prefers negotiations. She told CNN on Sunday that the 'final status is really something that has to be mutually acceptable' to Israel and the Palestinians." Knight Ridder (6/5, Nissenbaum) also reports the story.

Hamas Ignores Abbas' Demand To Back State-Recognition Plan. The AP (6/5, Barzak) reports the Palestinian "standoff intensified Sunday after Hamas rejected an ultimatum from President Mahmoud Abbas to endorse a plan implicitly recognizing Israel, and a pregnant woman was killed during a clash between the rivals' forces in Gaza. Abbas will order a referendum on a plan drawn up by top Palestinian prisoners in an Israeli jail calling for a Palestinian state" in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem. A separate AP (6/5) piece reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh "on Sunday said a plan by" Abbas "to hold a referendum on a plan that implicitly recognizes Israel is illegal. The statement was the strongest sign yet that Hamas will not give in to Abbas' ultimatum to accept the concept of a two-state solution or go to national referendum on the issue." The Los Angeles Times (6/5, King, 958K), among other sources, also reports the story.

Nuclear Agreement Spurs Indian-Americans To Intensify Lobbying. The New York Times (6/5, McIntyre, 1.19M) reports that Indian-Americans "have mounted an intensive drive to support President Bush's plan to aid India's civilian nuclear program, spending heavily on lobbying, campaign contributions and public relations to persuade Congress to approve the deal." According to the Times, Indian-Americans "are not new to lobbying in Washington. But the proposed nuclear pact has energized them like nothing before. In recent months, Indian-Americans, as well as the Indian government in some cases, have invested heavily in proven political tools that have helped previous immigrant groups break into American politics. … Much of the lobbying has focused on lawmakers from the New York metropolitan region, home to the highest concentration of Indian-Americans in the country." One group is holding a fund-raiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, "whose support is viewed by Indian-American leaders as crucial to winning broader Democratic backing for the plan." Clinton, though co-chairwoman of the Senate's India Caucus, "has not taken a position on the deal."

NPT Seen As Failing To Stop Nations From Acquiring Nuclear Weapons. The Christian Science Monitor (6/5, Grier, 61K) reports, "The world may be teetering on the edge of a worrisome new phase in the sixty-year-old age of atomic weapons. … Meanwhile, efforts to strengthen the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty have stagnated. Last year's NPT review conference fell apart amid international bickering. Will nukes now become must-haves for more nations? Asked for their worst-case scenario, experts say there could be 10 new members of the nuclear club by 2015." Iran's nuclear program "may have further undermined confidence" in the NPT.

Rumsfeld Arrives In Vietnam Amidst Lowered Expectations. AFP (6/5, Mannion) reports Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "arrived in Vietnam for a three day visit to encourage stronger military ties at a time when the United States is repositioning its forces in Asia." Rumsfeld "played down expectations of dramatic new developments in the relationship, however. … Rumsfeld, who has visited Vietnam twice before, said he did not know what the next step in the relationship might be and refused to say where he thought it was heading." AFP notes Rumsfeld "will meet Prime Minister Phan Van Khai and Defence Minister Pham Van Tra on Monday, returning their previous Washington visits, officials said."

US, Eight Other Countries To Discuss Joint Strike Fighter Cooperation. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Karp, 2.11M) reports the U.S. and eight other countries "will gather this week to negotiate a final road map for" the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, "the Pentagon's biggest weapons program, a $276 billion…project that has struggled to live up to its billing as a model of global cooperation." The Williamsburg, Virginia talks "are crucial to producing an agreement by the end of the year, in which each country is expected to declare how many airplanes it will buy. The agreement also will determine how the fleet will be maintained and upgraded over the expected 40-year lifespan of the plane." The Journal notes, "The talks have big implications for lead contractor Lockheed Martin Corp., which oversees the JSF's development and will play a lucrative, long-term role in maintaining the planes." However, Lockheed "won't be at the table with government officials."

Ex-President Garcia Appears Victorious In Peru Runoff. The Washington Post (6/5, A10, Reel, 744K) reports, "Preliminary results indicated that former president Alan Garcia defeated nationalist candidate Ollanta Humala in Sunday's presidential election, earning a second chance to run a country that he led into economic devastation in the 1980s. ... With 77 percent of the votes counted, Garcia led Humala 55 percent to 45 percent. Garcia cast the election as a referendum to determine where Peru would position itself on South America's political map: with moderate, left-leaning leaders such as Chile's Michelle Bachelet or with populists like Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. Describing himself as a responsible leftist, Garcia, 57, warned that his opponent could steer Peru toward an authoritarian brand of confrontational, anti-American nationalism." Political analyst Fernando Rospigliosi is quoted as saying, "I think this election had more to do with the rejection of Humala than with any attraction for Garcia. ... The theme of Chavez was very important, and Garcia used it very well against Humala."

The Financial Times (6/5, Weitzman) quotes Garcia as saying, "The people have voted for us, in spite of queues, in spite of economic problems. ... We will not govern with passions and impulses as we did in the past." And in a swipe at Chavez, Garcia is later quoted as saying, "He thought he could dominate us, but we have ensured the independence of Peru." The New York Times (6/5, Forero, 1.19M) notes, "Voters had seen the race as an unappealing choice between a former president whose first administration had been an unmitigated disaster and a former army officer who once led a military rebellion," but "saw Mr. Garcia as the lesser of two evils." USA Today (6/5, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (6/5, McDonnell, 958K) and AP (6/5, Hayes), among other sources, also report on the Peruvian elections.

Leftist Leader In Mexico Seeks Distance From Chavez. The Washington Times (6/5, Stier, 90K) reports, "Aides to Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador say that if elected next month, the leftist presidential candidate will govern more like Theodore Roosevelt -- whose economic policies featured trust-busting and progressive taxation -- than like Venezuelan firebrand Hugo Chavez." The claim "illustrates the extent that TV ads comparing Mr. Lopez Obrador to Mr. Chavez have hurt his campaign and compelled him to try to distance himself from the Venezuelan president."

New Chilean President Besieged By High School Students' Demands. The New York Times (6/5, Rohter, 1.19M) reports, "Less than three months after she took office" Chilean President Michelle Bachelet "is facing her first domestic crisis. To the surprise of many here, the challenge comes not from the right but from a group expected to be sympathetic to her center-left coalition: high school students." The Times goes on to report, "Striking students, who have occupied a Santiago high school for two weeks, are demanding smaller classes, the elimination of college entrance exam fees and federal financing to reduce the inequality between rich and poor schools. Some 700,000 students across the country have joined the movement."

Nigerian Militants Free Foreign Oil Rig Workers. The AP (6/5, Nsoyoh) reports, "Nigerian militants on Sunday released eight foreign oil rig workers, who looked tired but unharmed after two days in captivity." Police "involved in negotiating the release of the six Britons, one American and one Canadian would not say whether a ransom was paid." The AP adds, "Two of the Britons were released before dawn, followed by the six remaining hostages later in the day. The eight met with a local governor and were handed over to a representative of Nigerian oil firm Peak Petroleum in Yenagoa, the capital of Bayelsa state. The eight, whose names have not been released, looked tired but cheerful and said they were treated well by their kidnappers."

Development Projects Used To Modernize China's Restive West. The Washington Post (6/5, A1, Goodman, 744K), in a front-page article, reports, "In the six years since China's central government began its well-financed campaign to spread the benefits of economic growth beyond coastal provinces, the effort has exacerbated the extreme inequality that characterizes the national economy." The Develop the West program "was conceived in part to stem separatist inclinations in Xinjiang and other western provinces, where ethnic minority communities resent the continued influx of Han -- a migration actively encouraged by the central government. Though sporadic and sometimes violent protests have persisted in Xinjiang since the advent of the program, observers say they are happening less frequently -- a fact that Uighur groups attribute more to an aggressive crackdown by Chinese authorities than to the success of the campaign in spreading development." The Post adds, "Studies have shown that the investment has contributed to economic growth in the west, but the pace has fallen behind development in the east."

Japan At Forefront Of Campaign To Expand Whaling. The Washington Post (6/5, A14, 744K) editorializes that whaling is "increasing. Japan, Norway and Iceland never stopped hunting whales. … The reemergence of whaling could get a considerable boost this month at, of all places, the meeting of the International Whaling Commission." Japan "has aggressively sought pro-whaling allies, and it now has close to a majority of votes."

Saudi Textbooks Said To Promote Intolerance. USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) says in an editorial that in Saudi Arabia, "the Ministry of Education publishes textbooks for mandatory 'Islamic studies.' Parts read as if they could have been written by bin Laden, who is from Saudi Arabia, as were 15 of the 19 hijackers." For "more than a year, the Saudi government has said that the textbooks have been rewritten to emphasize tolerance over violence toward non-believers. But the non-profit Freedom House has found otherwise. The books are not publicly available, but Freedom House obtained and translated copies. Despite some minor changes, passages still contain disturbing intolerance. An eighth-grade text, for example, teaches that 'the Jews are apes ... while the swine are the Christians.' A 12th-grader learns the value of jihad (holy war) in language that shows jihad as a violent struggle against Jews, Christians and Muslims who don't follow the conservative Wahhabi version of Islam that Saudi Arabia officially adheres to." The Saudi government "needs to get serious and transparent about cleaning up the kingdom's instruction. And the Bush administration must start paying more than its present cursory attention."

Saudi Ambassador Says Change Taking Time. In a USA Today op-ed (6/5), Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the US, says, "Saudi Arabia is a nation undergoing dramatic self-examination. Every aspect of Saudi Arabia's society and culture is being openly debated. We have recognized that a comprehensive, modern and open educational system — with new and revised textbooks — is fundamental to the growth and prosperity of our country. A thoughtful revision of this system is necessary, and indeed well underway. Updating a national educational system is a major undertaking. Hundreds of books must be revised, and several hundred thousand public school teachers need additional training. The process remains ongoing. In the meantime, I have agreed to meet with the directors of Freedom House to address their concerns. But as Americans have seen through the civil rights movement of the 1960s, changes in attitudes cannot be instantly achieved. Change takes time. The decision to delete the unacceptable wording used in textbooks is a thing of the past. Our efforts are now concentrated on producing the new texts and the new educational aids that go along with these texts."

Mugabe Blamed For Zimbabwe's Fall. U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Cue) reports that Zimbabwe, "once seen as a star of post-colonial Africa, is in an economic death spiral." US News adds, "The nation's economic collapse has been accompanied by social decline. The World Health Organization puts life expectancy for Zimbabwean women at 34, the lowest in the world." US News blames Zimbabwe's fall on President Robert Mugabe, "whose increasingly repressive misrule is dooming millions here to a life of misery."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Canadian Police Arrest 17 Suspected Terrorists As Part of Multinational Probe. Canadian officials announced the arrest of 17 young, mostly Muslim, men who are suspected of plotting a major terrorist attack in Toronto. This morning, the Los Angeles Times (6/5, Meyer, Chow, 958K) says the arrests in Canada are "part of a continuing, multi-national probe into suspected terrorist cells in at least seven countries, a US counter-terrorism official confirmed Sunday. The senior US law enforcement official said authorities are combing through evidence seized during raids in Canada this weekend to look for possible connections between the 17 suspects arrested Friday and at least 18 other Islamist militants who have been arrested in locations including the United States, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Britain, Denmark and Sweden." The investigation "began as separate probes," but "over the past year, the counter-terrorism authorities of those countries began to see connections among the cells, in part through electronic surveillance of phone calls and Internet correspondence, as well as ground surveillance of individual suspects, several US officials said in interviews Sunday."

USA Today (6/5, Kiely, 2.31M), in a story titled "Officials Say USA Wasn't A Target In Terror Plot In Canada," reports nonetheless that "the FBI says some of the Canadian suspects met last year with two Americans now facing prosecution on separate terrorism-related charges." The FBI "confirmed that some of the Canadian suspects had been in contact with two Muslim men who were arrested this year by the bureau's Joint Terrorism Task Force. 'It does appear that there were contacts between certain suspects in Canada and two individuals recently charged in the United States,' FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said." The two, "now jailed and awaiting trial, are Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, and Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, 19. Both are US citizens who had been living in Georgia." The New York Times (6/5, Depalma, 1.19M) reports, "American officials in Washington and New York said they had been aware of the [Canadian] investigation and were informed of the coordinated law enforcement action."

The story of the arrests in Canada is receiving extensive print and TV coverage, leading the CBS and NBC newscasts last night and running second in the lineup on ABC. Reacting to news of the arrests, Secretary Rice said yesterday on CNN's Late Edition (6/4), "We have excellent counterterrorism cooperation with Canada." In its coverage, the AP (6/4) reports Rice said "there was no indication that 17 terror suspects arrested in Canada were trying to plan an attack in the United States."

ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Yang, 8.78M) noted police say most of the suspects "were born in Canada. Homegrown terrorism. Analysts say that's the new, growing danger." Jack Cloonan, former FBI counterterrorism official: "The structure of al Qaeda as we've known it, has now been destroyed. It's no longer a top-to-bottom organization. They do not need direct control from al Qaeda. So, that makes it a lot more difficult to counter it." On NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 2, 1:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M), terrorism analyst Roger Cressey said, "It's the evolution of the al Qaeda terror threat. We now have individuals with no known affiliation to the network or to al Qaeda now deciding to undertake jihad for their own reasons. So the movement is what we're worried about now, not the organization that attacked us on 9/11."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, lead story, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Authorities now believe those suspects were motivated by politics and not by faith." NBC (Tibbles) added, "The arrests drive home concerns within Canada and the United States that Canada, with its liberal immigration laws, may become a launching point for future terror attacks." David Harris, former Canadian security official: "We've seen a tremendous amount of infiltration and evidence of real radicalization of some, particularly amongst the youthful Islamic community." Likewise, the Wall Street Journal (6/5, Chipello, Block, 2.11M) reports the arrest "of 17 Ontario residents…underscores concern among North American and European counterterrorism experts that the next wave of Islamist militants will be made of 'home-grown' radicals, rather than infiltrators from abroad."

The New York Times (6/5, Shane, 1.19M) reports, "According to Canadian authorities, the suspected fertilizer bomb plot…appeared to follow the pattern of successful terrorist attacks in Madrid in 2004 and in London last year. As in those instances, officials said, those accused in the Canadian case are Muslims with no evident ties to Al Qaeda leaders overseas except a shared ideology."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/5, 61K) reports, "There have been no Al Qaeda-type attacks in Canada, although security services have long worried about possible risks and the US has urged more vigilance on the long border the two countries share." Canada, "under its previous Liberal government, declined to join the US-led forces in Iraq, and many Canadians felt that helped their country stay off the Al Qaeda radar screen." But "the country does have troops in Afghanistan, originally sent to fight the Taliban."

Security Forces First Became Aware Of Plot In Chat Room. The Toronto Star (6/5, Van Rijn) reports that "when a shadowy group of disaffected urban youth began talking in an Internet chat room in the fall of 2004 espousing anti-Western views, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was listening. The spy agency, and an alphabet soup of other security agencies across the continent, closely monitor such sites, where talk may sometimes turn to buildings and bombs and bringing global jihad home to North America, to Canada." The Star adds, "Often it's just that -- talk -- but when CSIS began monitoring the sites allegedly used by some of the 17 men and youths arrested on terrorism-related charges in a sweeping series of raids across the GTA Friday evening, the Canadian spy agency heard enough to remain interested, and increased surveillance of the group."

The New York Times (6/5, Austen, 1.19M) says this morning, "The competition between Toronto's four major daily newspapers is often intense, particularly over crime news. But its results are rarely as one-sided as the coverage that followed the arrests of 17 Ontario residents in what the police call a terrorist bomb plot. Some readers of The Globe and Mail awoke on Saturday to find nothing about the raids while, at the other extreme, The Toronto Star published 3,030 words and several photos spread over three pages."

Toronto Mosque Vandalized. The New York Times (6/5, DePalma, 1.19M) reports, "As the authorities in Canada and the United States continued to piece together details from the lengthy investigation, a mosque in Toronto was vandalized overnight. More than a dozen windows in the building were broken, two panels of the glass front door were smashed and several cars parked in the rear of the building were damaged. Islamic leaders who met with the Toronto police chief on Sunday demanded a thorough investigation of the vandalism."

CBS Evening News (6/4, lead story, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that news of the arrests may bring "a backlash against Muslims in the city." In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/5, A10, Struck, 744K) says Canada "touts the relative harmony within its society, sometimes in contrast with tensions over immigration in the United States." The Washington Times (6/5, 90K) reports that a "police official" said "he had no information on any link between the incident and the arrests, which began late Friday."

The Toronto Globe and Mail (6/5, Chung) reports, "The head of Canada's largest urban police force called on both Muslims and non-Muslims alike to let cooler heads prevail." Toronto police Chief Bill Blair "told a gathering of Muslim leaders" that the suspects "will be considered innocent until proven guilty."

US-Canada Border Security Less Likely To Be Relaxed After Toronto Terrorism Arrests. USA Today (6/5, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "the national debate over border security hit closer to home [northern Minnesota] this weekend when 17 Canadians were arrested and charged in a bomb plot in Ontario. Some people here on the USA's northern edge have been hoping to ease security that was beefed up after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001." The local business community is concerned it may "lose customers under a law requiring U.S. citizens to show passports or new ID cards containing computer chips — instead of driver's licenses — to cross the border for the fishing and hunting that lure tourists here. Most vacationers here spend time in both countries. That law is to take effect in 2008, though the Senate has voted to postpone it until 2009."

More Commentary. The USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "After the 9/11 attacks, the French newspaper Le Monde famously declared that 'We Are All Americans.' The Iraq war has squandered much of the cooperation, focus and goodwill needed to defeat the 9/11 enemy. The Canada arrests provide an opportunity to refocus international attention on the war on Islamic extremism."

Scope Of British Raid On Suspected Bomb Factory Questioned. The AFP (6/5, Jackson) reports, "Questions were raised in the British press over the circumstances of a huge anti-terror raid here two days ago as police questioned two terror suspects, one of whom was shot in the operation." Attorneys for brothers Abul Koyair, 20, and Mohammed Abdul Kahar, 23, "vehemently deny any involvement in terrorism after they were arrested during a dawn raid on Friday in Forest Gate, east London." Police have "declined to comment on news reports that experts were hunting for evidence of chemical or biological weapons as they continue to search the terraced house." The AFP Adds, "According to The Sunday Times, which cited Scotland Yard sources, there had been 'specific intelligence' which suggested that a single bomb overlaid with cyanide was being prepared at the address."

Administration Has Moved "Aggressively" To Mute Leaks. In a lengthy story marking the 35th anniversary of the release of the Pentagon Papers, U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Halloran, Michels) reports that 35 years after the New York Times published the papers, the "atmosphere feels distinctly different, the concept of national security more ominous. … With a more conservative federal judiciary, the realities of a post-9/11 world, and enduring public skepticism toward the media, the Bush Administration appears convinced that this time the scales might just tip in the government's favor." The Administration "has moved aggressively on other fronts, investigating leaks it asserts have harmed national security, firing a CIA officer suspected of leaking, and even suggesting that reporters could for the first time be prosecuted under the 1917 Espionage Act."

Pentagon Detainee Policies Omit Key Geneva Convention Tenet. The Los Angeles Times (6/5, Barnes, 958K) reports the Pentagon "has decided to omit from new detainee policies a key tenet of the Geneva Convention that explicitly bans 'humiliating and degrading treatment,' according to knowledgeable military officials, a step that would mark a further, potentially permanent, shift away from strict adherence to international human rights standards." The decision could "culminate a lengthy debate within the Defense Department but will not become final until the Pentagon makes new guidelines public, a step that has been delayed." However, the State Department "fiercely opposes the military's decision to exclude Geneva Convention protections and has been pushing for the Pentagon and White House to reconsider, the Defense Department officials acknowledged."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Ridge Says Vacated Spectrum Should Be Used For Broadband Public-Safety Network. Former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (6/5, 90K) writes that the nation's first responders can have "the national communications system they need instead of testimonials, a few bucks and repeated promises of change" when "Congress and the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) are willing to think and act anew." Ridge states that spectrum "owned by the American people" is being vacated, which could "allow the FCC…to create America's first nationwide broadband public-safety network." If it is auctioned off in 2008 as planned, "we will have lost our last best chance to give those who risk their lives for us the tools they need both to protect their own lives and ours."

New York Lawmakers Launch Postcard Campaign To Protest Anti-Terrorism Grant. The Washington Times (6/5, Hudson, 90K) reports, "New York lawmakers are urging their constituents to mail postcards depicting New York City landmarks" to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff in a "bipartisan campaign" to protest New York City's Urban Area Security Initiative funding. The Times adds that while members of Congress "agreed" to cut the program by "millions of dollars…from last year," they "did not expect…major slashes in the top terrorist target cities of New York or Washington, which will suffer a $32 million cut, or cuts to 26 other cities that total $204 million." Meanwhile, "Despite rumblings on Capitol Hill that hearings might be called or Mr. Chertoff's resignation demanded, the secretary is standing steadfast in favor of his department's decision."

Bloomberg Doesn't Expect Change In Funding. The New York Times (6/5, Chan, 1.19M) reports, "Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said yesterday that he was not optimistic that federal officials would change their minds about" New York City's funding. He added, however, that "hope springs eternal, and in any case, remember, we've got next year to fight for." His "comments came as top officials continued to assail the Department of Homeland Security's handling of antiterrorism grants."

Lawsuits Claim Ground Zero Workers Had Little Access To Proper Respirators. The New York Times (6/5, DePalma, 1.19M) reports that with "mounting evidence that exposure to the toxic smoke and ash at ground zero during the nine-month cleanup has made many people sick, attention is now focusing on the role of air-filtering masks, or respirators, that cost less than $50 and could have shielded workers from some of the toxins." More than "150,000 such masks were distributed and only 40,000 people worked on the pile, but most workers either did not have the masks or did not use them." These respirators "are now at the center of a federal lawsuit filed on behalf of more than 8,000 firefighters, police officers and private workers who say they were exposed to toxic substances at or near ground zero that have made them sick or may eventually do so." Lawyers "representing the workers say that there was no central distribution point for the respirators, no single organization responsible for giving them out, and no one with the power to make sure the respirators that were distributed got used, and used properly. By contrast, at the Pentagon, workers not wearing proper protective gear were escorted off the site."

WAR NEWS:

Pace Vows Thorough Probe Of Haditha Deaths. The AP (6/4, Baldor) reports, "The top US military officer pledged a thorough investigation into the alleged massacre of Iraqi citizens in Haditha by Marines, saying it is important to avoid a rush to judgment." Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, "acknowledged that the allegations involving the deaths of about two dozen Iraqis have raised concerns among Iraqi officials and in the United States. 'But you don't want to have the emotions of the day weigh into the process,' Pace told the Associated Press in an interview Sunday. 'We need to stick with our judicial process. We want to be sure that it moves forward without any influence.'"

Officials Express Caution. The Washington Times (6/5, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Both Democrats and Republicans yesterday expressed caution about the investigation of an incident last year in which US Marines killed civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Vice President Al Gore, "a vocal critic of the Iraq war," said on ABC's "This Week," "I don't have enough evidence to see how they've handled that particular set of charges. … I don't think that we have enough information now to know how they have handled it." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she has spoken with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki about the Haditha incident. 'I've talked to Prime Minister Maliki,' Miss Rice said on 'Fox News Sunday.' 'He wants coalition forces there. He knows that Iraqis are not yet capable of dealing with these security issues themselves. We have very good cooperation with him.'"

GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham was asked on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) to describe what he knows about the killings in Haditha, Graham replied, "The allegations are that some Marines used deadly force inappropriately, violated the rules of engagement, the law of armed conflict, that some officers may have had direct knowledge of this activity and failed to report it, that other people in the chain of command should have known and failed to do anything about it, a dereliction of duty allegation. … The allegations are serious. They're unnerving. And they're being investigated. And if it is true that our Marines killed innocent civilians, noncombatants, out of revenge, they will be severely dealt with."

Sen. Jack Reed, also on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace), said, "I think the test will be whether the leadership in the Department of Defense and in the administration does not try to confine these incidents in small sort of compartments and say it was just a few Marines or a few soldiers, but looks to see if this is part of a larger systemic problem. That's the challenge. … We have to take the blinders off. We have to look clearly and dispassionately about whether the situation is there and the training is such that this might be more widespread."

Haditha Incident Draws Comparisons To My Lai Massacre. The investigation into the deaths of 24 Iraqis at the hands of US Marines at Haditha is the subject of lengthy coverage in all three newsmagazines this week. The incident is the cover story in two of the magazines, Time and Newsweek. Time (6/12, Duffy, McGirk, Ghosh) reports in its cover story that "the Bush Administration finds itself on the defensive about a war that is now entering its 40th unrelenting month." The deaths of Iraqi civilians at the hands of US Marines at Haditha "threatens to become one of the war's signature debacles, an alleged atrocity committed by a small group of service members that comes to symbolize the enterprise's larger costs." Newsweek (6/12, Thomas, Johnson) reports in its cover story that Haditha "may turn out to be the worst massacre since My Lai. And Iraqis may be entirely justified in their outrage."

Up To 10 Marines Could Be Charged Over Haditha Killings. Time (6/12, Duffy, McGirk, Ghosh) reports in its cover story, "A knowledgeable congressional source monitoring the Haditha probes says congressional aides are being told by Marine officers in the Pentagon that the number of Marines who may be charged with murder is small. But the source speculates that the total number who may be charged with crimes ranging from murder to aiding in the attack or trying to cover it up could be as high as 10, according to Marines who have talked to officials at the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS), which is conducting the inquiry into the killings."

Iraqi Journalist Videotaped Scenes Of Haditha Deaths. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Kluger) cover package, "If the Marines are indeed guilty of an atrocity, they had the ill fortune to have committed their crime in the worst possible place: outside the front door of a budding Iraqi journalist and human-rights activist." The day after the killings, Taher Thabet "went into the houses where the killings had taken place and videotaped what he saw, as well as the wrenching scenes later at the local morgue, where friends and family collected the bodies of the victims."

Slain Marine Profiled. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Pitluk) cover package profiles Marine Miguel Terrazas, noting that his death, the result of an improvised explosive device set by insurgents, "appears to have led to the killings now under investigation."

US Downplays Iraqi PM's Remarks. In a separate story in its cover package, Time (6/12, Ghosh) reports on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's "unexpectedly angry response" to questions about the Haditha slayings. Al-Maliki "accused US forces of misconduct even beyond the actions of the Marines last Nov. 19. … Iraqis saw in al-Maliki's outburst a bid to counter the perception that he is Washington's stooge." Time adds, "For the moment, U.S. officials are downplaying al-Maliki's tough talk. … Indeed, al-Maliki's remarks may have been intended less for the U.S. government than for members of his own."

US Military Investigating At Least Two Other Incidents Of Civilian Deaths. U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Whitelaw, Pound) reports, "The US military acknowledges investigations into at least two other unrelated incidents of Iraqi civilian deaths. In one, several US soldiers are likely to face charges in the shooting death of one Iraqi in the town of Hamandiyah. And, last week, the BBC reported allegations that another military unit rounded up and shot 11 civilians in the town of Ishaqi before blowing up their house to hide the actions. (The Pentagon said an investigation cleared the soldiers of wrongdoing in Ishaqi.)"

Iraqi Ambassador Says His Family Members Were Victims Of A US "Atrocity." Newsweek (6/12, Thomas, Johnson) reports in its cover story, "In an interview with NEWSWEEK, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, Samir Sumaidaie" discussed "an atrocity that, he claims, happened to his own family. A year ago, says Sumaidaie, Marines raided the home of his cousin, a school principal in a small village in Anbar province. The Marines shot the man's son, a student home from college. The only weapon in the house was an AK-47 loaded with blanks. Ambassador Sumaidaie protested all the way to Gen. George Casey, the Coalition forces commander, but was told that the Americans fired in self-defense—and that the ambassador had to file a Freedom of Information Act request if he wanted to see the investigative file."

Estimate Says 38,000 Iraqi Civilians Have Been Killed Since May 1, 2003. A separate story in Time's (6/12, Ghosh) cover package, "Though there is outrage among many Iraqis about the alleged massacre in Haditha last November, the violence on Iraq's streets is so unrelentingly horrific that even the worst atrocities have lost their power to shock. Few Iraqis even know how many people have died by the bullets and bombs." Time adds, "According to the Iraq Body Count project, the most frequently cited source, at least 38,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed since May 1, 2003, when President George W. Bush announced that 'major combat operations' had ended."

Levin Call Haditha Killings "A Real Massacre." On CNN's Late Edition Sen. Carl Levin, (6/4, Blitzer) said that from what he has been told about the incidents in Haditha, "there is a massacre here of 24 civilians, and not accidentally. This looks like, from all appearances, a real massacre. There's finally an investigation that's taking place, but there's also the real possibility of a cover-up here."

Biden Reiterates Call For Rumsfeld Resignation. On NBC's Meet The Press (6/4), host Tim Russert asked Sen. Joseph Biden, "How high up the chain, based on your information, do you think this goes?" Biden replied, "The Secretary of Defense. … He should be gone. He shouldn't be in his office tomorrow morning. And I'm so tired of saying this on your show. I've been saying this for two years." Russert: "Well, the President knew about it in March." Biden: "Well, we can't get rid of the President. He's there for two and a half more years. There is a system of accountability. … When you make serious mistakes, you step forward and you acknowledge them and you walk away. Presidents can't and shouldn't do that. Secretaries of Defense can and should."

Kristol Says Liberal "Hand-Wringing" Wrong Response To Haditha. In his Weekly Standard column (6/12), William Kristol says, "The last thing we need in response to Haditha is hand-wringing liberalism. The war against the jihadists…is not a metaphorical one. Liberals may want to win a war on terror without fighting, and are shocked that in a war, crimes and abuses occur. But here's the hard, Trumanesque truth: In war, terrible things happen, including crimes and abuses and cover-ups." Though "crimes and cover-ups cannot be excused or tolerated," what "makes us exceptional is that we stand for liberty, and that we are willing to fight for liberty. We don't need to 'prove' we are different from the jihadists by bringing our own soldiers, if they have done something wrong, to justice. Of course we must and will do this. But our doing this 'proves' nothing. Even if there were ten Hadithas, we would still not have to 'prove' that we are 'different from the jihadists.' The idea would be offensive if it were not ludicrous. What we do have to prove is that we are strong enough to fight this war, and intelligent enough to win it."

US Marines Face Second Iraqi Murder Investigation. In a 1,500-word story on its front page, the Washington Post (6/5, A1, Knickmeyer, 744K) reports another controversial action by US forces against an Iraqi civilian. "All parties to the case of Hashim Ibrahim Awad al-Zobaie agree that he was shot dead by Marines of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment on April 26 in the small central Iraqi village of Hamdaniyah. But there are differing accounts of his death, and they are at the heart of another investigation into the conduct of American forces in Iraq." The Marines claim Hashim was burying a bomb and was armed, while Hashim's family claims he was executed and the evidence planted. "Hashim's family alleged this weekend that a small group of U.S. servicemen came to them last week and offered the family money to support the Marines' version of the killing." The Post keys on the fact that Hashim was disabled, and calls his killing "the smaller and less prominent of two incidents being investigated over allegations of wrongful death and possible cover-ups".

Rice Says Iraqi Cabinet Posts Will Be Filled Soon. The Financial Times (6/5, Biedermann) reports, "Iraq's governing coalition yesterday failed to name the crucial defence and interior ministers, despite an earlier pledge by" Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "to do so and despite ongoing violence." The AP (6/5, Yen) reports Secretary Rice said "Iraqi leaders should agree in the next few days on filling key security posts for the government," and says she called "on the United States to be more patient despite growing sectarian violence." Rice: "Of course, they need to get this settled, but they will get it settled. The more important thing here is that they get it right. When they get it right, and they will get it right, everybody will forget how long it took them." Rice "said she had faith that al-Maliki was a strong leader who will be able to assert control," and later "denied that a decision by U.S. military commanders last week to move about 1,500 combat troops from a reserve force in Kuwait into volatile Anbar province to help establish order in an insurgent hotbed was a sign of growing trouble."

AFP (6/5) says Rice "played down difficulties in filling key posts in Iraq's new government and predicted the process would be complete in 'the next few days.'" Rice "remained upbeat," and "played down Maliki's concerns about the conduct of US troops in Iraq following reports of" the Haditha killings and other alleged acts of violence.

In an analysis piece titled, "Iraqi Government Has Rocky Start," the AP (6/5, Buzbee) reports, "Two weeks ago, President Bush praised Iraq's new unity government as a watershed event and turning point in the war. Since then, a series of crises shows how troubled the path ahead remains." For all major players in the rebuilding effort, "the two troubled weeks have called into question whether U.S. troops can begin any drawdown this year, as originally hoped." While "not everything is bleak," the "stalemate over the [Cabinet] jobs demonstrates that apparent political success in Iraq — such as the formation of al-Maliki's unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds — can often mask more entrenched problems." Ambassador Khalilzad, "a hands-on official with perhaps the best view of the country's internal workings, said in astonishingly frank terms in recent days that while the unity government is a step forward, serious problems remain." Knight Ridder (6/4, Youssef) runs a similar report.

21 Iraqi Shiites, Kurds Killed In Religiously Motivated Attack. Gunmen killed 21 Iraqi Shiites and Kurds on busses in a town northeast of Baghdad, selecting victims by religion and ethnicity. The story was reported by each of the networks last night. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, lead story, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported on "an attack so brazen so, brutal, that against the daily drum beat of violence in Iraq this, one stands out. 21 people, 12 of them students on their way to take exams, executed by attackers who dragged them out of three buses northeast of Baghdad." ABC (Marquez) added, "Gunmen pulled their victim office the bus. Divided them up. Let the Sunnis go free. And then executed the Shiites and the Kurds."

CBS Evening News (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Palmer, 7.66M) reported the attack was "so brutal it even shocked this country already numbed by violence. Witnesses say armed gunmen stopped three minibuses north of Baghdad and killed all the Shi'a and Kurds on board including 14 students on their way to exams. The four Sunni passengers were spared. Nearby yesterday, the heads of eight Sunni men were discovered along with a note explaining they had been killed for allegedly having murdered four Shi'a doctors. The cycle of deadly religious tit for tat killings has escalated all week as Iraqi security forces battled increasingly bold insurgent gangs in broad daylight trying to take over whole neighborhoods."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported it was a "new horror in Iraq. Gunmen drag 21 Shiite Muslim men from three busses north of Baghdad and execute them. A dozen were high school students on the way to take exams. Five were old men. The lives of four Sunnis were spared. In the south, Sunnis were the victims. Iraqi police shot dead nine men in a Sunni mosque in Basra, a day after 28 Shiites were killed in a market bombing. The police said the dead were terrorists."

Iraqi Government Seen As Unable To Reduce Sectarian Violence. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, lead story, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Today's violence comes, despite the Iraqi's vow to crack down on sectarian violence, another sign that the new leaders have little control over security on their own streets. Once again, today, the government failed to appoint candidates to run the Ministries of Defense and Interior, as expected. The government agencies, expected to keep the peace, are still unable to do so."

CBS Evening News (6/4, story 2, 2:20, Palmer, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq's Prime Minister is trying desperately to work out a deal tonight between Shi'a and Sunni factions that would share out control over the country's security forces. The hope is then that each side would reign in its violent supporters. But the fear is it is already too late."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Once again, the nation's new government, even though it promised it would, could not agree on new chiefs for Iraq's police and army, leaders counted on to stop the violence. 'More negotiations are needed,' explained an Iraqi government official, a phrase heard often in recent weeks. But while the Iraqi government quibbles about who will lead their security services, Iraqi civilians die in increasing numbers."

The AP (6/4, Quinn) reports the attacks "dealt a blow to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's pledge to curb sectarian violence. He again failed to reach consensus Sunday among Iraq's ethnic and sectarian parties on candidates for interior and defense minister -- posts he must fill to implement his ambitious plan to take control of Iraq's security from US-led forces within 18 months."

The New York Times (6/5, Tavernise, 1.19M) also says "the killings were in keeping with the nature of attacks here now, and, in a grimly familiar pattern, were not hindered by authorities of any kind, Iraqi or American." The killings are "a grim illustration of how badly security has deteriorated in and around Baghdad." The Washington Post (6/5, Hernandez, Nouri, 744K) and Washington Times (6/5, Behn, 90K), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Forensic Teams' Efforts To Collect Evidence Of Saddam Atrocities Examined. The New York Times (6/5, Burns, 1.19M) reports from the edge of the Ash Sham Desert in Iraq, "in the late winter of 1991, at least 28 men were executed here, crowded together in a pit their killers scraped with a backhoe from the desert floor. Rounded up along the alleyways of their native city, they were forced aboard a bus or truck and driven out along an isolated highway." What "happened here is not only a macabre marker in the history of Iraq under Mr. Hussein, but a harrowing footnote in American politics. The victims here, American and Iraqi officials say, died in Mr. Hussein's suppression of the Shiite uprising across southern Iraq in early 1991. It was a rebellion that survivors — and American critics of the President George H. W. Bush — say that the president encouraged after halting American troops at Iraq's southern border with Kuwait at the end of the Persian Gulf war." For "the American forensic experts who came to Iraq after the 2003 invasion, the desert camp is a way station toward holding Mr. Hussein accountable for what many Iraqi human rights experts say was the most merciless passage in his 24 years in power." Raid Juhi, "chief investigative judge for the Iraqi court now trying Mr. Hussein in another case, said during a visit here on Saturday that the court had documentary evidence, and statements from witnesses, showing that at least 100,000 Shiites, and possibly 180,000, died in the 1991 repression. The trial of Mr. Hussein and his associates for what is known among the Shiites as the 'intifada,' or rebellion, could be still a year or more off."

Ohio Marine Unit's Losses Unite Parents Despite Differing Political Views. The Washington Post (6/5, A3, Slevin, 744K) reports "amid the sadness that has looped through his life since the death in Iraq of his only son," Bob Derga has "found a spark that drives him to defend President Bush, the war and the troops who are fighting it. He has begun to speak out, urging Americans 'to have the guts as a nation to stay the course.'" Paul Schroeder and Rosemary Palmer, "whose only son lived and died in the same Marine Reserve unit as Derga's son, have also been driven by anguish to speak out. But they do not believe in this war or this president or in staying the course." To "talk with the parents is to see reflected a real debate, grounded in searing loss, about the war's wisdom. It is also to witness a powerful connection felt toward one another by the Gold Star families of Lima Company, 3rd Battalion, 25th Marines." The Columbus, Ohio-based Lima Company "spent seven months in Anbar province last year and lost more troops than any other U.S. military unit in the war. What many had expected would be relatively safe duty -- perhaps guarding a base -- turned into grueling weeks of combat. Twenty-three Marines died, blown up by roadside bombs or killed by insurgents."

Military Doctors Face Unfamiliar Professional, Ethical Dilemmas. USA Today (6/5, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports military doctors Brett Schlifka and Hans Bakken have "made a pact — something they would not have done back home. Because counseling a family in a war zone is impossible, and because the U.S. military offers no guidelines on whether to withhold treatment for severely brain-damaged casualties, the doctors had decided to err on the side of life. No matter how severe the brain injury, no matter how hopeless the case, they vowed to keep a soldier alive long enough to get him out of the war zone, if only so his family could see him one last time." For Schlifka, Bakken "and other doctors at one of the busiest battlefield hospitals in Iraq, the war has created new or more complicated moral and ethical dilemmas. Here, doctors often face profound personal choices treating the most disturbing wounds they have seen." Like those "featured in the recent HBO documentary Baghdad ER, doctors here say working at a battlefield hospital is at once the most fulfilling and most frustrating experience of their lives — one that has changed them, as doctors and as people."

NATO Troops In Afghanistan Focus On Reconstruction, Winning Local Support. USA Today (6/5, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports NATO units "moving into troubled southern Afghanistan will have twice as many combat troops as the Americans they're replacing. But they will focus more on protecting reconstruction projects and winning Afghan support than on hunting Taliban fighters, the NATO commander said here Sunday." British Lt. Gen. David Richards, commander of NATO's International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) said, "I have a different approach. The way to win in a campaign like this is to win the support of the people." USA adds Afghan government troops "and U.S.-led coalition forces have been battling Taliban militants in southern Afghanistan." Next month, ISAF "will formally replace U.S. forces in the south, and Richards will take command there."

Suicide Bomber Kills Four In Kandahar. The New York Times (6/5, Gall, 1.19M) reports that in Kandahar, a "suicide bomber exploded his car on the main street…narrowly missing the governor of Kandahar Province and a Canadian military convoy, but killing 4 civilians and wounding at least 12 others, officials said. The explosion was heard across town and stirred anger and fear once more in a city that has been shaken by violence for months." As the police "cleared the wreckage of the suicide bomber's car, the owners and workers of a teahouse on the sidewalk beside it cursed the Taliban, the government, the United States-led coalition, former Afghan leaders, President Bush and Pakistan."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Fannie Mae Head Under Probe. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (6/5, Phelps) reports, "In a nearly 40-year career that's spanned politics and business, James Johnson has parlayed a talent for relationships that's taken him from rural Benson, Minn., to inside the Capitol beltway. … He served in the West Wing of the White House as Vice President Walter Mondale's right-hand man. In the 1990s, he led Fannie Mae, the nation's largest provider of home mortgage funding. He was chairman of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts and led the prestigious

DOJ_NMG_0031639

Brookings Institution. … But these days, Johnson is under fire for being too generous with other people's money. Fannie Mae's regulator has criticized the size of Johnson's compensation in his final year at the mortgage giant. And at UnitedHealth Group, he chaired the board committee that awarded lucrative stock-option packages to William McGuire and other top executives at the Minnetonka-based health insurer." The Tribune adds, "Compensation awarded to UnitedHealth executives going back as far as 1999 is under review by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the IRS and the Justice Department, as well as the subject of a special internal audit. As chairman of UnitedHealth's compensation committee, Johnson is in the crossfire with CEO McGuire, corporate counsel David Lubben and Chief Financial Officer Patrick Erlandson."

Key Figures In Fannie Mae Scandal Tied To Clinton Administration. In the National Review (6/19), Byron York says the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight (OFHEO)'s report on Fannie Mae was "stunning. In meticulous detail, it outlined a culture of corruption at the Federal National Mortgage Association — better known as Fannie Mae — that rivals the most serious corporate scandals in recent years. In this case, however, the main players are Washington insiders — some of them prominent veterans of the Clinton administration — and the scandal's effects could ripple through Congress for years." From 1998-2004, Fannie Mae "was headed by former Clinton budget director Franklin Raines, whose top management team included former Clinton Justice Department official Jamie Gorelick, sometimes mentioned as a future attorney general in a Democratic administration. During that period, the report says, Raines and his team grossly overstated Fannie Mae's earnings — to the tune of $10.6 billion — for the purpose of paying themselves big bonuses."

Former National Century Financial Executives Plead Not Guilty To Fraud Charges. The AP (6/3) reported, "Seven former executives of a defunct company that was once the nation's leading lender to health care providers pleaded not guilty Friday to charges that they defrauded investors of more than $3 billion." A federal grand jury indictment "last month alleged the executives at National Century Financial Enterprises lied to investors about how their money was being used, then conspired to conceal cash shortages by shuttling money among various subsidiaries. The former officers are charged with 60 counts of conspiracy, securities fraud, wire fraud, mail fraud and money laundering." Among the executives "who entered pleas Friday in U.S. District Court was founder Lance Poulsen, 62, of Port Charlotte, Fla., who faces 47 federal counts. He already is fighting similar charges in a civil case brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission."

Suits Over Backdated Stock Options Are Next Step In Probe. The National Law Journal (6/5, Bronstad) reports, "Securities class action lawyers are preparing for the next wave of shareholder lawsuits as more companies and their top executives face federal probes and accounting restatements linked to the backdating of their stock options." The Journal continues, In the past month, dozens of shareholder suits have been filed on behalf of large institutional shareholders by a number of law firms, including well-known plaintiffs' firms Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann of New York and Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins of San Diego. The suits allege that certain companies backdated stock options granted executives to enhance the profits the executives made when they exercised the options." The Journal adds, "Backdating stock options is at the heart of recent inquiries by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and Justice Department. So far, more than two dozen companies have been targeted, many of which have restated their earnings or ousted their top executives. … Meanwhile, lawmakers have been debating in recent weeks whether to seek stricter regulations than those being proposed by the SEC regarding executive compensation."

Judge Considers Companies Denying Legal Fees To Employees. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Davies) reports that a federal judge is considering whether prosecutors should be able to force companies to cut, "off legal support for employees suspected of wrongdoing," in a, "case against 16 former KPMG LLP executives accused of marketing fraudulent tax shelters." The Journal adds, "Defense attorneys for the former executives have complained to the judge that prosecutors leaned on KPMG to cap or cut off the legal-fee reimbursements to their clients." Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, "pronounced himself 'troubled' by the government's actions at a hearing last month. His response could come any day."

Former Tyco Exec Seeks Reimbursement For Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Levitz) reports, "Jailed former Tyco International Ltd. Chief Executive L. Dennis Kozlowski is battling over the insurance coverage for his hefty legal bills." Mr. Kozlowski filed papers in a New York state court, "recently seeking documents from an insurance broker that negotiated Mr. Kozlowski's 'officer and director' liability policy at Tyco." The Journal continues, "Mr. Kozlowski has put in a claim to be reimbursed for nearly $17.8 million he spent defending himself -- but the insurer has rejected the claim."

Tier Technologies CEO Forced Out. The Washington Post (6/5, D1, Kang) reports that only two years after Tier Technologies Inc. moved to Reston with a record stock price former CEO James, "Weaver has been forced out and the company is under a, "SEC investigation." The Post adds, "Its stock was removed from the Nasdaq National Market after it failed to file financial statements for the past nine months, and the company says it now must restate its financial records back to at least 2002." What went wrong is unclear, but records suggest, "a combination of missteps and core problems, including weak financial management and increased competition."

WSJournal Urges Stock Markets To Regulate Themselves. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M) editorializes, "Transatlantic mergers are promising to finally do for stock markets what globalization has done for the rest of the business world: bring new opportunities and efficiencies to investors. The big unknown is whether regulators will have the sense not to get in the way." The Journal also urges the business community to regulate itself, noting that "government abhors a vacuum. If private industry isn't offering its own solutions, regulators will design something that works for them -- usually with worse results."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Court Documents Reveal Broad Scope Of Alleged Jefferson Bribery Deals. In a front-page story, The Washington Post (6/5, Lengel, Weisman, 744K) reports that "over dinner with business partner and FBI informant Lori Mody, Rep. William J. Jefferson…furtively scrawled the letter 'c' on a sheet of paper, and next to it wrote some numbers indicating that he was demanding a much larger personal stake in an African business deal than previously agreed to." Jefferson told Mody, "I make a deal for my children," and, "as court records, sworn affidavits, plea agreements and search warrants attest, it was quite a deal, one of several involving at least seven business entities, nearly a dozen family members and hundreds of thousands of dollars sloshing through bank accounts, all for Jefferson's personal benefit." The Post notes that "as that controversy subsides" over the FBI raid, "the focus has shifted back to Jefferson and the corporate labyrinth that federal authorities say he erected to secretly receive illegal payments for promoting high-tech ventures in Cameroon, Ghana and Nigeria."

Judge Orders Release Of Nigerian VP Search Warrant Affidavit. Roll Call (6/5, Bresnahan) reports, "In another legal setback for Rep. William Jefferson," US District Judge Alexander Williams Jr. on Thursday decided "to publicly release documents supporting an FBI search of a Potomac home belonging to Jennifer Douglas, a wife of the vice president of Nigeria, Atiku Abubakar. Jefferson has until this afternoon to appeal the ruling." Roll Call notes, "The six paragraphs that will not be made public are from a court-approved wiretap in which Mody wore a wire during her dealings with Jefferson."

DOJ, House Lawyers To Begin Discussions About Jefferson Documents. Roll Call (6/5, Pershing) reports, "The dispute over last month's FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's…office will continue on three different fronts this week as the House and the Justice Department grapple over the fate of the documents seized from Jefferson and with how similar cases should be handled in the future. Lawyers from the House and the Justice Department are expected to sit down within the next several days to begin negotiations on a set of procedures for dealing with possible future search warrants for Congressional offices." Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner "has pledged to craft legislation on that subject and to hold more hearings on the constitutionality of the Jefferson raid," and "sources said House lawyers are expected to file a brief on behalf of the chamber in federal court on Tuesday supporting a motion by Jefferson's attorneys calling the search unconstitutional and asking that the FBI return the documents it took." Noting the ABC News poll which "showed that 86 percent of respondents — including 94 percent of Republicans — believed the FBI's search was allowable," Roll Call adds, "With Members in their districts last week, House GOP leadership aides said their bosses were taking a wait-and-see attitude on whatever legislation Sensenbrenner might produce."

More Commentary. In a Roll Call (6/5) op-ed condemning the FBI search as a violation of the Speech and Debate Clause, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars Congress Project director Don Wolfensberger Donald Wolfensberger writes that "the unprecedented FBI raid" on Rep. William Jefferson's office "instantly jolted me back to an earlier era of parliamentary history," when "King Charles I, with a group of armed men, burst into the British House of Commons to arrest five of his most vocal critics for treason" and set off the English Civil War. "There are clear signs President Bush has gotten the message from the united Congressional outcry at this overreach of power and is interested in repairing the breach. … Let us hope the damage is not irreparable and that the two houses on the Hill and the White House may come again to enjoy each others' hospitality — when invited."

In a Roll Call (6/5) op-ed, Chadbourne & Parke partner Abbe David Lowell writes, "A civil libertarian is a conservative against whom an investigation leak has just occurred," and "thus, Speaker Dennis Hastert…has become the new spokesman for reining in the power of prosecutors." Lowell notes, "It should not be shocking to the Speaker or anyone else paying attention that this administration did what none other has done in more than 200 years — execute a search of a sitting Congressman's Capitol Hill office. … This truly has become the administration whose motto is: 'We do it because we can.'" Lowell adds, "As worrisome as this problem is, the solution is not a difficult one. Midterm elections provide a real opportunity for Americans to restore a better balance."

Lobbying Firm's Clients Subpoenaed As Part Of Lewis Investigation. Roll Call (6/5, Bresnahan) reports a federal grand jury in Los Angeles investigating Rep. Jerry Lewis, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has subpoenaed "at least four clients" of the lobbying firm Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White. According to Roll Call, "Federal investigators are looking into the ties between Lewis and former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), a partner in Copeland Lowery, and are focusing at this point chiefly on Jeffrey Shockey, the deputy chief of staff for the Appropriations panel who previously worked for the lobbying firm, several sources close to the probe said. … When Lewis took over as chairman of the Appropriations Committee at the start of the 109th Congress, Shockey returned to the panel as deputy chief of staff. Shockey received a $600,000 package from Copeland Lowery before he left the firm."

Tennessee Waltz Bag Man, Former FBI Agent Testify About Alleged Bribes. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/3, Buser) reported, "The key government informant in Roscoe Dixon's bribery trial testified Friday that the former state senator indicated to him that to gain support in the legislature 'you had to pay to play.' Tim Willis, a political consultant who wore recording devices for the FBI, said he paid Dixon and his aide Barry Myers thousands of dollars in cash to push a bill on behalf of E-Cycle Management, Inc." He "acknowledged that he was well paid by the FBI -- $180,000 in salary and more than $26,000 in expenses since 2003 -- but that he did not become an informant only to make money or to avoid going to prison. 'I think the videotapes demonstrate that I don't need to lie today,' Willis told defense attorney Coleman Garrett on cross examination. 'Senator Dixon took bribes.'" The Commercial Appeal added, "In other testimony Friday, former FBI agent Joseph Carroll told jurors how he came out of retirement for 14 months to play the role of E-Cycle chief executive officer 'Joseph Carson.' Carroll's undercover skills were needed because he had spent most of his 30 years in the FBI investigating public corruption in more than a half dozen state legislatures."

The AP (6/3, Baird) reported that during Willis' testimony, jurors saw a second video clip of Dixon taking an alleged bribe. "'Oh man, you want me to carry that,' …Dixon says on the clip when handed two envelopes that informant Tim Willis said contained a total of $1,500. … Willis said Dixon was wary of accepting money himself and insisted that bribes go to an aide, Barry Myers, who testified against his former boss this week." The AP added that during Carroll's cross-examination, defense lawyer Coleman Garrett tried to ask Carroll "about 'other targets of the E-Cycle operation' but was stopped by Judge Jon McCalla on an objection from the prosecution. Garrett contends government agents focused more on black lawmakers than on white legislators." WPTY-TV Memphis (6/2) and WMC-TV Memphis (6/2) also reported on Friday's testimony.

Cotton Beginning Three-Year Prison Term Today. The Chattanooga Times Free Press (6/4, Lazenby) reported, "Former Hamilton County Commissioner William Cotton is scheduled this week to become the second Tennessee Waltz defendant to begin serving prison time on federal extortion charges." Cotton "is scheduled to report Monday to Edgefield Federal Correctional Institution in Edgefield, S.C., where he will serve three years."

Sorich Lawyers Subpoena High-Ranking Daley Aides' Records. The Chicago Tribune (6/3, Bush, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reported defense lawyers for former Daley patronage chief Robert Sorich "have subpoenaed datebooks, diaries, calendars and e-mails of the mayor's Chief of Staff Ron Huberman, corporation counsel Mara Georges and other high-ranking officials in the city Law Department. The subpoena demanded that the city release on Friday all documents related to internal investigations of the city's hiring and promotions practices and the scandal-marred Hired Truck Program." The Tribune noted, "Durkin's subpoena also demanded the city produce information about hiring that was provided to federal prosecutors in 1997. In particular, he sought lists that Sorich kept of names of people who applied for city jobs or promotions."

Blagojevich Patronage Chief Met With Hiring Officials About Applicants. The Chicago Tribune (6/4, Pearson, Chase, 643K) reported, "Gov. Rod Blagojevich's patronage chief routinely met with other hiring officials to discuss job applicants and their political sponsors for positions that were supposed to be free from clout, sources involved with the process say. Blagojevich aides say they created a complex system to prevent hiring officials from seeing the names of candidates seeking so-called civil service jobs, providing an extra layer of security to ensure politics was not a factor in doling out the jobs. But even after the system was established, the sources said, patronage officials and others in the governor's office still knew applicants' names and discussed their clout at meetings to decide whether to fill positions."

Former Ohio Workers Comp CFO Charged With Taking Bribes. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/2, Tobin, 375K) reported, "The former chief financial officer for the Ohio

DOJ_NMG_0031642

Bureau of Workers' Compensation took cash, a Florida Keys condo and tuition payments for his son in exchange for doling out lucrative investment contracts, according to charges filed by federal and state authorities Thursday." Terry Gasper "was charged in U.S. District Court in Cleveland with one count of racketeering. He was also charged in Franklin County Common Pleas Court with one count of money laundering and one count of violating Ohio ethics laws because he did not report the gifts. The charges were related to favors that authorities say Gasper received from investment brokers, dealers and marketers and from Tom Noe, the disgraced coin dealer and heavyweight Republican fund-raiser." The Dayton Daily News (6/2, Bischoff) noted, "He was charged through a bill of information, not an indictment," which Franklin County Prosecutor Ron O'Brien said his office typically uses when "the defendant is cooperating with authorities and plans to plead guilty." The AP (6/2, Welsh-Huggins) also reported on the charges.

Probe Examining Former AmEx Executive's Connections To Gasper. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (6/3, Brown, 375K) reported, "Authorities are investigating the role a former senior vice president of an American Express company played in getting unauthorized investment business from the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, sources said Friday. Officials are examining Clarke Blizzard's connections to Terry Gasper…and Blizzard's role in brokering millions in investments that were later changed into risky, unsanctioned hedge funds, sources said. Those funds eventually lost $4.8 million of the bureau's money." Blizzard "allegedly showered Gasper and friends close to him with thousands of dollars' worth of meals, Columbus Blue Jackets hockey tickets, airline tickets and other gifts."

Prince George's School Board Members Testify Before Hornsby Grand Jury. The Washington Post (6/4, C6, Anderson, Rich, 744K) reported, "Prince George's County Board of Education members and other school officials testified recently before a federal grand jury investigating issues related to former county schools chief Andre J. Hornsby, officials familiar with the testimony said. The testimony…signals a quickening pace in an investigation that helped drive Hornsby from office one year ago. … The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of grand jury proceedings, said federal prosecutors appeared to be scrutinizing issues raised by an independent ethics report. That report examined Hornsby's actions relating to the federal telecommunications subsidy known as 'e-rate and a $1 million purchase of classroom equipment for literacy instruction." The Post noted, "In April 2005, the FBI seized records from Hornsby's office in Upper Marlboro and other school facilities."

FBI Cuts Agents Assigned To Seattle Federal Prosecutor Murder Probe. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (6/3, Shukovsky) reported, "The FBI has cut the number of agents assigned to the almost five-year dragnet to find the murderer of Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Wales. … Leaders of the FBI's Seattle office -- who have about 140 agents to cover the entire state of Washington -- made the decision to reallocate scarce FBI resources last month. It came on the heels of a routine inspection of the office by FBI headquarters, said federal criminal justice sources." US Attorney John McKay "made clear Friday that he was not happy with the decision to cut the number of agents on the case. … But he added he has 'confidence in the Seattle FBI to get it right.'" SAC Laura Laughlin and Assistant SAC Steven Fiddler made no comment, but "one federal criminal justice source who spoke on condition of anonymity said" that the decision "is a good call" because "it reflects the lack of progress in the Wales investigation, and balances it against other investigative priorities."

Second DC Transportation Official Charged With Bribery. The Washington Times (6/5, Mcelhatton) reports, "A D.C. Department of Transportation inspector was indicted last week on charges of seeking cash payments in exchange for allowing illegal job sites to operate or to prevent contractors from being fined. Denard A. Smith," is, "the second city inspector charged in a bribery scandal in the past month." The Times adds, "Authorities said Mr. Smith accepted a total of about $4,000 in cash from more than a dozen people since last summer."

Florida Plastic Surgeon Convicted Of Medicare Fraud For AIDS/HIV Treatments. The Miami Herald (6/2, Dorschner, 323K) reported Isaac Nosovsky, "a former plastic surgeon in Weston, has been convicted in federal court of Medicare fraud charges involving expensive AIDS/HIV infusion treatments -- the latest case in a crackdown to stop widespread schemes that may have bilked taxpayers out of hundreds of millions of dollars." Nosovsky "gained notoriety last year over accusations that he allowed his brother, Gregorio, to perform breast implants and other cosmetic operations even though Gregorio had no medical license. At least 35 women have said Gregorio botched their surgeries, and both brothers still face criminal charges in Broward courts concerning their alleged unlicensed collusion." The fraud indictment "stated Nosovsky had taken Medicare for $1.3 million in his fraudulent billing scheme."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (6/2, 249K) added that Novosky was convicted of "fraudulently billing Medicare $1.3 million for patients treated at a HIV/AIDS clinic, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. … Medicare patients were paid cash kickbacks to attend Nosovsky's clinic…in Miami." The South

Florida Business Journal (6/2) noted that three "other co-conspirators - Rosa Walled, Rafael Walled and Gregory Delatour -were separately charged and have all pleaded guilty."

Columbine A 'Benchmark' To Troubled Children. USA Today (6/5, Toppo) reports, "U.S. public schools in April saw at least a dozen Columbine-like plots foiled, from central Alaska to southern Florida. … Why does Columbine still resonate for troubled kids? School safety experts say they struggle to answer that question." Bill Modzeleski, of the Safe and Drug-Free Schools program says, "seven years later, disaffected children talk about 'out-Columbining, outdoing Columbine. So that's the benchmark.'" Today continues, "authorities in several areas have responded by filing terrorism charges based on threats alone, paving the way for possible longer sentences and, in cases when attacks actually take place, trials in adult court."

Data From Active Duty Navy, National Guard Stolen With VA Information. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 3, 0:30, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The case of the missing data from the Department of Veterans Affairs is growing with more military personnel potentially at risk, from stolen information. The government says data on as many as 50,000 active duty Navy and National Guard personnel are among the records stolen from a Veterans Affairs employee last month. Already, 26 million retired veterans are at-risk."

Man Arrested Trying To Jump White House Fence. The Secret Service arrested a man yesterday as he tried jump the fence on the south side of the White House. The AP (6/4) reported that Roger Witmer of Washington "faces charges of unlawful entry and disorderly conduct." Secret Service spokesman Tony Mazur "said members of the uniformed division captured Witmer before he got over the fence. But he threw over plastic bags, and officials shut down traffic on the south side of the White House so they could be examined for explosives. None was found."

Hotel Website Loses Data From 250,000 Customers. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 6, 0:30, Harris) reported, "The Internet site Hotels.com has notified thousands of customers that their credit card information may have been compromised. The data was loaded on to a lap stop compute that was stolen back in February. The company says there is no evidence so far that the information has been misused."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 7, 0:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "The travel website Hotels.com says it involves a company laptop carrying the names, addresses, and credit card numbers of nearly 250,000 customers. Letters have been sent to those involved, and officials are watching for improperly used information."

Brownback Visits Jail Overnight To Highlight Reassimilation Program. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 7, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Every year, an estimated 650,000 inmates are released. Two-thirds of them will be rearrested within three years. Creating new crime victims and costing taxpayers millions of dollars to put those offenders back behind bars. For years, inmates have been released with $100 and a bus ticket. Now, a coalition of liberals and conservatives are trying to change that. Days ago, one of the most conservative politicians in the country, US Senator Sam Brownback, stayed overnight in this prison in his home state of Kansas. He met, mingled and prayed with, murderers, rapists and robbers." Brownback "doesn't want to reduce their sentences. He wants to reduce the chances they'll commit new crimes when they're released." Sen. Brownback: "Once a person has paid their penalty to society, let's work with them to see they don't go back in." ABC added the "annual price tag for corrections in this country, $60 billion. Nearly double the budget for homeland security. Which is why Senator Brownback is co-sponsoring the Second Chance Act. It would prepare inmates for success outside of prison." Of 40 inmates who participated in one program in Kansas, "only 4 have been rearrested. That's way below the national average of 66%." Senator Brownback "says research shows children of inmates are more likely to become criminals themselves. And that reentry programs can help address that generational curse."

WPost Praises SCOTUS Decision In Ceballos Case. An editorial in the Washington Post (6/5, A14, 744K) praises the Supreme Court decision the case of Richard Ceballos, a prosecutor with the Los Angeles district attorney's office, who claims he suffered professional retaliation for questioning the accuracy of a search warrant affidavit upon which his office was relying in a criminal case. The case presents a "difficult puzzle: whether the First Amendment right to free speech protects Mr. Ceballos's on-the-job expressions. The court ruled that it does not. On balance, we think that's right. … In the end, the First Amendment seems a bad fit for shielding intragovernmental debate. Protecting people like Mr. Ceballos should be the province of whistle-blower protection laws, which need to be strong enough to prevent retaliations of the sort he claims."

LATimes Skeptical Of Administration Stance On Preserving Internet Records. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) says the Bush Administration "has opened talks with leading Internet providers and search engines about preserving their records. The Justice Department apparently wants Internet companies to keep two years' worth of data on where users go, what they search for and to whom they send e-mail. The ostensible purpose is to combat child pornography and terrorism. That's a laudable goal. It's not at all clear, however, that this plan would put more bad guys behind bars. It's more likely that the new troves of data would attract hackers or trial lawyers." The Justice Department "should have to show that the change is needed to put more child pornographers and terrorists behind bars."

CIVIL LAW:

Number Of Fair Wage Lawsuits Increases. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Maher) reports, "Workers are filing more lawsuits against employers they accuse of violating fair-wage laws that govern overtime and minimum pay, with an increasing number seeking to combine the claims with large groups of their fellow employees as well. The suits increasingly seek what is called collective action under federal wage laws." The Journal adds, "In part, the uptick reflects efforts by lawyers to represent large groups of workers, from assistant managers to computer technicians and delivery drivers who may be owed back wages, and collect potentially lucrative settlement fees."

Potential Abortion Bans Playing A Role In Many State Races. The New York Times (6/5, Davey, 1.19M) reports that "in campaigns for governor and the Legislature…many candidates are not only being asked about limits on abortion, but a far broader, starker question: to outlaw or not to outlaw?" The Times notes that the issue is playing a prominent role in the South Dakota, Florida and Arkansas gubernatorial contests, adding that in many state races, "it remains uncertain who will benefit from the sudden focus on abortion bans -- candidates who oppose abortion rights or those who favor them."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush Will Urge Senate To Pass Gay Marriage Ban At White House Event. NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 8, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "At the White House, marriage will be the topic in the Rose Garden tomorrow. The President plans to use the setting to push again for an amendment against same-sex unions." NBC went on to report that Republicans "acknowledge they don't have the 67 votes needed for passage, but President Bush is calling on Congress to act now." NBC also said that with his "approval ratings low, steady bad news out of Iraq, problems with the immigration bill, and elections in November looming, the timing of the gay marriage debate is welcome by the President and his party."

The Washington Times (6/5, Fagan, 90K) reports that today the Senate begins debate on the gay marriage ban. The Times notes President Bush "this weekend stepped into the fray, using his Saturday radio address to urge approval of the amendment. … He will make another push at a White House meeting today, after conservative groups complained that he hasn't fought hard enough for the measure. The Senate is expected to vote Wednesday on whether to limit debate and force a final vote, but even supporters say they likely won't get the needed backing from 60 senators to force a final vote."

Friend Says Gay Marriage Is Barely On Bush's "Moral Radar." Newsweek (6/12, Rosenberg) reports that President Bush "had been mostly mum on gay marriage since his re-election. But now, with his poll numbers in a nose dive and even his most enthusiastic supporters grousing, Bush took up the cause in his radio address Saturday; an amendment is needed because 'activist courts have left our nation with no other choice,' he explained." Newsweek notes, "Though Bush himself has publicly embraced the amendment, he never seemed to care enough to press the matter. One of his old friends told NEWSWEEK that same-sex marriage barely registers on the President's moral radar." White House aides "insist that the President does care about banning gay marriage."

Frist To Bring Gay Marriage Amendment Up For A Vote This Week. Newsweek (6/12, Rosenberg) reports that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist this week will bring the Federal Marriage Amendment (FMA) up for another vote in the Senate. The House "House could weigh in next month. Though it isn't expected to pass either House, supporters want to get pols on the record before November." Newsweek adds, "While the GOP leadership clearly hopes this tack can revive their sputtering election prospects this fall, some GOP strategists aren't so sure. Pew polls show a 10-point jump in support for gay marriage since 2004."

NYTimes Calls Bush Radio Address "Cynical" and "Depressing." The New York Times (6/5, 1.19M), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "devoted his Saturday radio speech to a cynical boost for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage. It was depressing in the extreme to hear the chief executive trying to pretend, at this moment in American history, that this was a critical priority."

Bauer Sees Change In How Marriage Is Viewed. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) former presidential candidate Gary Bauer, president of American Values and chairman of the Campaign for Working Families, writes, "Many couples are replacing the traditional promise 'til death do us part' with vows such as 'for as long as our love shall last' and 'for as long as we continue to love each other.'

Clearly these couples are under no illusions about their odds in a nation with a 50% divorce rate."

FBI Uncovers Eastern Shore Sex-Trafficking Operation. The Virginian Pilot (6/3, Burke, Gaynair) reported, "Federal authorities allege they have uncovered a sex-trafficking operation in which prostitutes were transported from New York City to service Hispanic customers at a brothel" in Mappsville on Virginia's Eastern Shore. "The case is the latest in a growing number of investigations nationwide of sex trafficking involving Hispanic women," and "in the Eastern Shore case, three people have been arrested so far." FBI agents "secretly videotaped activity and conducted surveillance at the Beartown Road house, where weekend business was brisk, according to court documents and testimony in Norfolk federal court last week. … Jennifer V. Collins, the lead FBI agent in the case, testified…that there were conflicting opinions among those involved in the operation of the brothel about whether the women were free to leave when they were on the Eastern Shore."

Busby Retracts Controversial Remark Concerning Voting By Illegals. The Washington Times (6/5, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Francine Busby, the Democratic candidate in the CA50 special election, "finds herself trying to explain a remark she made last week to a largely Hispanic audience: 'You don't need papers for voting.' On Thursday night, Francine Busby, the Democratic candidate for the 50th Congressional District in California, was speaking in Escondido when she uttered those words." Someone taped the remarks "and a recording began circulating Friday. After she made that statement at the meeting, Mrs. Busby immediately said: 'You don't need to be a registered voter to help' the campaign. She said that subsequent statement was to clarify what she meant."

Rothenberg Says Strong Busby Showing Would Be Evidence Of Coming "Democratic Deluge." Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (6/5) that neither party is expressing confidence about the CA540 special election, which "increasingly looks like a test of Democratic efforts to ride a wave of voter dissatisfaction and of Republican efforts to energize the party's conservative base." Rothenberg notes that "even if former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) ends up squeaking out a narrow victory against Democrat Francine Busby…a strong Busby showing (say, near 50 percent) would be evidence that the Democratic Deluge of '06 has begun."

Electronic Voting Machines Face Legal Challenges. USA Today (6/5, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports that electronic voting machines are the subject of legal challenges in at least six states. Most of the suits "argue that the machines are vulnerable to software tampering, don't keep an easily recountable printed record and may miscount, switch or not record votes and even add phantom votes. … No case yet has claimed intentional manipulation of electronic vote data. But another advocacy group, Black Box Voting, reported last month that a Finnish expert found security flaws for a Diebold Election Systems model. Diebold, a major manufacturer, says the vulnerability is theoretical and will be fixed this year."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ, FTC In Antitrust Clash Over Generic Drugs. The Financial Times (6/5, Kirchgaessner, Bowe) reports, "An unusual rift between the top antitrust authorities in the US over the legality of deals between pharmaceutical companies and their generic counterparts is intensifying, raising questions for the companies involved in the controversial transactions." The Times continues, "The dispute between the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, which is playing out in the arena of the Supreme Court, is likely to become even messier next week when the FTC takes the rare step of filing a second petition urging the court to take on the issue over the objections of the Bush administration." The Times adds, "At the centre of the disagreement between the justice department, the top law enforcement body, and the FTC, an independent agency composed of Democratic and Republican commissioners, is a complex patent dispute involving Schering-Plough and its drug, K-Dur 20, which treats the side-effects of drugs for high blood pressure. … In 1997 Schering ended a dispute with a generic rival by paying the company, Upsher-Smith, $60m (€46m, £32m) to stay out of the market until 2001. Schering's patent was originally intended to expire this year. The FTC has claimed that the agreement, as well as similar deals that have since been agreed between drug companies, are anti-competitive. … The agency says that while settlements between drug companies do not violate antitrust laws, the equation changes when branded drug groups offer their generic rivals deals they cannot refuse: substantial payments to stay out of the market until a certain date."

Toshiba Gets Nod For Westinghouse Deal. The Financial Times (6/5, Kirchgaessner, Hoyos) reports, "Toshiba's $5.4bn takeover of Westinghouse, a UK-owned nuclear company, has cleared a significant regulatory hurdle with the approval of the deal by the US committee that investigates foreign transactions on national security grounds." The Times continues, "People familiar with the transaction said it got the green light from the secretive Committee on Foreign Investment in the US, or Cfius, last week." The Times adds, "Approval from Cfius was widely expected but it represents an important milestone given the heightened political tension in Washington. Both the Cfius process and acquisitions by foreign companies of sensitive assets either owned by US groups or, in the case of Westinghouse, located in the US have recently come under the spotlight. … A political firestorm erupted in Congress this year after Cfius approved the takeover of five US port terminals and other facilities by a state-owned Dubai company. Lawmakers said the deal compromised US national security and attacked the executive branch agencies that comprise Cfius for failing to adequately investigate the deal. … The backlash forced Dubai Ports World to sell the port terminals to a US buyer. It also prompted a flurry of legislative proposals to revamp the Cfius process. … Although the proposals have not yet been made law, attorneys and lobbyists who work on Cfius deals in Washington say that, in practice, the Dubai controversy has had a significant impact on the way deals are handled and expanded the range of transactions that are reviewed."

Planned NYSE Merger Reveals Lack Of International Regulations. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Wysocki, Lucchetti) reports, "As financial markets grow more electronic and international, a big question looms: Who should regulate them? … That issue is now in the spotlight as the operator of the New York Stock Exchange sets plans to merge with Euronext NV." The Journal adds, "Right now there's no formal legal framework for regulating exchanges that cross national borders." While executives at the NYSE and Euronext say little regulation will change, "under the new combined holding company'" regulators are still "planning adjustments -- more sharing of information, for example."

Unitab Rejects Tabcorp Takeover Bid. The Financial Times (6/5, Reporters) reports, "Unitab on Monday rejected an eleventh hour unsolicited A$1.9bn offer from Tabcorp, Australia's biggest gaming group, and maintained its endorsement of a merger plan with another betting operator. Tabcorp's cash-and-paper offer – presented on Thursday — values the Queensland-based Unitab at A$14.25 a share." The Times continues, "This is higher than a rival A$1.7bn paper bid for Unitab, unveiled in March, from Tattersall's." But Unitab said, "in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange on Monday that it considered the offer made by Tabcorp inadequate for a takeover."

Political Fallout From Rate Increase Halts FLP, Constellation Merger. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Smith) reports, "FPL Group Inc.'s proposed $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy Group Inc. looks increasingly doubtful due to a political furor in Maryland over higher electricity rates. Constellation Chief Executive Mayo Shattuck sent employees a letter May 30 in which he said the firm had 'ceased FPL merger integration activities.'" The Journal continues, "A 72% rate increase by Constellation's Baltimore Gas & Electric unit has become a political issue in Maryland, where Democrats are hoping to unseat Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich."

Ferrovial To Raise Hostile Bid For BAA To $18.46 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Singer) reports, "Spanish construction company Grupo Ferrovial SA will raise its hostile offer for British airports operator BAA PLC for a second time in a final, £9.8 billion ($18.46 billion) bid to acquire the world's largest airport operator by market value, according to people close to the matter. It will raise its bid to at least 915 pence ($17.23) a share." The Journal adds, "To defend against the Ferrovial bid, BAA has said it would return £700 million to shareholders and boost its dividend payout by 40% this fiscal year."

ENVIRONMENT:

Blanco Threatens To Block Federal Efforts To Drill In Gulf. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Cooper, 2.11M) reports that Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco says she will try to block federal efforts to open part of the Gulf of Mexico to oil drilling this summer unless Washington shares the proceeds with her state. Blanco "risks the ire of Washington, which is providing billions of dollars in reconstruction money to her storm-racked state. Even so, she says she will try to block the August auction of offshore oil properties in the western Gulf unless the federal government agrees to help restore the state's wetlands, which scientists say are disappearing at an alarming rate." The Journal adds, "It is unclear whether Ms. Blanco can force the cancellation of the August lease sale, but she may be able to delay it, since she can file an objection with the Interior Department. If the department rejects her complaint, Ms. Blanco can appeal to the Commerce secretary. If the Commerce secretary overrides her, Ms. Blanco has hired a Washington lawyer and threatened a suit."

Gore Urges Paulson To Speak To Bush About Global Warming. Former Vice president Al Gore was asked on ABC's This Week (6/4, Stephanopoulos) if he thinks the nomination of Henry Paulson, his "ally… in the fight against global warming," is evidence of "a change of heart by the president" on global warming. Gore replied, "I would like to think so. … I doubt it. I would love to be proven wrong about that. His first secretary of the Treasury was terrific on the issue of global warming, but it didn't make any difference to the president." Gore added, "I hope that privately he will try to convince the president to change his mind."

Hubbard Cheers Paulson Nomination. R. Glenn Hubbard, who was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President George W. Bush, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), "President Bush's selection of Hank Paulson to be the next Treasury secretary is cause for cheer. His nomination also offers a pause for reflection on the economy's performance and its productivity muse -- and on concerns about the economic outlook." Treasury Secretary John Snow "has rightly celebrated the economy's success, and Mr. Paulson will no doubt do so as well. But explaining the fount of that success and confronting real fears about change and entitlement spending would be a welcome addition."

China Becoming A World Leader At Developing Renewable Energy. U.S. News and World Report (6/12) reports that China "is quietly becoming a world leader in developing renewable energy sources and technology. With its energy needs growing exponentially and the price of oil near record highs, Beijing is using every possible means to eke out extra kilowatts -- and this means not only cutting oil deals with rogue regimes and building nuclear reactors but also putting into place some of the most aggressive renewable-energy policies in the world."

NYTimes Praises Protection Of Coral Under The Endangered Species Act. The New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) editorializes, "Anyone who has given thought to the pitifully fragile state of the oceans' coral reefs should have been heartened by the recent classification of two kinds of coral as threatened under the Endangered Species Act. The inclusion of the elkhorn and staghorn, two species of Caribbean coral, was a welcome first for the list, prompted by a task force on coral reefs established by President Bill Clinton and continued by the Bush administration.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

2 DC Jail Escapees Recaptured. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Glod, Pierre) reports, "The second of the two men who escaped from the D.C. jail Saturday was recaptured last night in the Seat Pleasant area of Prince George's County. The other man was picked up early yesterday at a Fairfax County motel." Ricardo Jones, "was seized about 11:40 p.m., the U.S. Marshals Service said." While Joseph Leaks, "was arrested without incident about 1:20 a.m. yesterday." The Post continues Leaks and Jones had escaped by, "smashing through a reinforced window, officials said."

Jail Break Raises Concerns Over Neighboring Citizens Safety. The Washington Times (6/5, Mcelhatton) reports, "The jailbreak has raised questions about whether the facility's siren system to alert neighbors was working properly. Wilbert Hill, an advisory neighborhood commissioner who lives about five blocks from the Southeast jail, said he and others in the area did not hear the sirens. 'I think they should have some way of notifying residents of a prison break,' Mr. Hill said."

Alleged Drug Dealer May Be Linked To Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (6/3) reports on an alleged drug dealer who may be linked to recently reported overdoses involving fentanyl-laced drugs and writes, "The plan was to buy drugs and arrest the suspected dealer, Maurice A. Adkins, on the spot. But Adkins tried to escape, injuring an undercover detective in the process, and officers opened fire, officials said. As Adkins, 27, lay in critical condition in a hospital Friday, prosecutors filed charges of first-degree assault on a law enforcement officer, delivering a controlled substance and possession of a controlled substance. … A man arrested with Adkins was hospitalized after authorities discovered that he had swallowed some heroin during the arrest, police said."

Heroin Overdoses Reported In Pennsylvania. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/5, Rotstein) reports, "A potent form of heroin delivered devastating effects to users in several city neighborhoods over the weekend, killing one and knocking others unconscious in cars and homes. Pittsburgh police said they and paramedics responded to at least 20 heroin overdose cases in a 24-hour period yesterday and Saturday, primarily in Hazelwood, Greenfield and Lincoln Place and on the North Side. At the scene of many of the overdoses, investigators found tiny packets labeled in red type with the words: 'Get high or die trying.'

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/5) reports, "Police do not know if a high concentration of the drug or something mixed with it is to blame for the unusually high number of overdoses. Police do not know where the heroin is coming from but are working with their counterparts in Detroit to see if there is a link with overdoses reported there."

In Tennessee, Plea Agreements Reveal Millions Of Dollars Worth Of Drug Trafficking. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (6/5, Satterfield) reports, "A slew of guilty pleas entered in the past two weeks in U.S. district courts in Knoxville and Greeneville has generated a paper trail outlining a decade-long venture among a diverse band of traffickers that served up $22.5 million worth of marijuana and nearly $1.1 million in meth to users in East Tennessee. The granddaddy of plea agreements secured by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Reeves in this case involves Washington County man Mark Saults, a horseback-riding country boy who headed up this organization. Saults has admitted pushing 15,000 pounds of pot, 24 pounds of meth and a handful of pounds of cocaine in a drug business he began in earnest in 1995." The Sentinel also notes the DEA's involvement with the case.

10 Arrested In Mississippi Drug-Ring Investigation, More Arrests Expected. From Hattiesburg, the AP (6/4) writes, "Authorities say they have arrested at least 10 people in a probe into a drug trafficking ring that operates between Mexico, Jackson and Hattiesburg and more arrests are likely. … 'You can reasonably say that these defendants are connected to an active investigation that remains ongoing,' said Steve Luzinski, spokesman for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in Jackson. He described it as a large investigation into marijuana and cocaine trafficking." A similar story was published by the Hattiesburg American.

Use Of DEA "Bug" Credited For Collapse Of Gang Leader's Influence. The Chicago Tribune (6/4) reports, "At the peak of his tyranny, Larry Hoover's "gang nation" numbered 50,000 members in 35 states. … In the mid-1990s, though, Hoover's influence collapsed. The key reason: U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents dreamed up the kind of electronic gadget that makes TV's '24' a celebration of technology deployed against bad guys. More than a decade after that DEA coup, a three-judge panel of the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has declared that the feds' tactics didn't violate the rights of Hoover's deputy, Gregory 'Shorty G' Shell." The Tribune goes on to report how DEA supervisor Rick Barrett thought of the idea of using microphones and transmitters thin enough to fit a prison visitor's tag and ultimately get information needed for the investigation.

In Texas, "Operation Elm Street" Seen As Groundbreaking Drug Investigation. The McAllen Monitor (6/4) reports, "Two to three times a week, for at least a decade, George Gutierrez or members of his clan…made trips up U.S. Highway 281 to San Antonio, Austin or sometimes Houston with 50 to 300 pounds of pot concealed in passenger vehicles. … The illicit drug proceeds financed a multi-million dollar real-estate developing business, lush trips to Las Vegas, the best hotels. … But access to those and other luxuries came to a halt when the county's drug interdiction task force in tandem with the local U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's task force closed in on the family's illegal dealings in late 1999." The investigation was called "Operation Elm Street," and it "became a groundbreaking operation that launched larger, longer investigations, the kind for which HIDTA task forces are known."

Guatemalan Man Accused Of Drug Smuggling, Customs Officer Faces New Trial. In its "Police Briefs" section, the Brownsville (TX) Herald (6/5) reports a federal judge on Friday "denied bond for a Guatemalan man after customs officers found more than 6 pounds of heroin and more than 6 pounds of cocaine in his truck's battery. Henry Otoniel Yanes drove a 1999 Ford Ranger across the Gateway International Bridge on Wednesday, according to a criminal complaint. … According to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Web site, Colombian heroin traffickers are known to smuggle the drug to Guatemala and then into the United States using car batteries."

In a separate story in the same section, the Herald reports, "A federal judge said a new trial for a customs officer accused of bribery will take place…despite objections from his two attorneys. The four-day bribery trial for U.S. Customs & Border Protection K-9 officer Juan Posas ended May 25 afternoon with a mistrial because of a deadlocked jury. Authorities arrested Posas in March based on a two-count indictment for accepting bribes and allowing drug smugglers to pass through his post."

In Montana, Tobacco Shop Owner Acquitted Of Possessing Drug Paraphernalia. The AP (6/4) reports a tobacco shop owner has been acquitted of possessing drug paraphernalia for sale, a day before a similarly accused but convicted Missoula man was sentenced by a judge critical of the prosecution. A federal jury Thursday acquitted Bradford Moore, 46, owner of Heads Up Tobacco Shop. He is one of four Montana business owners arrested last year during an investigation by federal drug agents. The four include David Sil, 61, of Missoula, who Friday received a sentence of two years on probation for distribution of drug paraphernalia."

The Missoulian (6/3) reports, "Last May, Drug Enforcement Administration agents seized pipes, cash, clothing items and business records from Sil's shop, The Vault, a small pipe and tobacco accessories business he opened nearly 10 years ago. On Friday, fighting for a sentence at the lower end of the federal spectrum, Sil's attorney, Martin Judnich, explained that his client operated The Vault in Missoula for eight years, without subterfuge and without legal consequences."

IMMIGRATION:

Fifty-Five National Guard Troops Begin Border Security Duties In Arizona Today. The New York Times/AP (6/5) reports that 55 Utah National Guard troops will begin work today "extending fences, improving gravel roads and working on border lighting near the town of San Luis, Ariz., which is part of the nation's busiest Border Patrol station." The AP notes, "The troops are part of President Bush's plan to send up to 6,000 National Guard members to the four border states to perform support duties that will allow immigration agents to focus on border security. The Guard members will not perform significant law enforcement duties." NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 3, 2:25, Lewis, 9.87M) reported, "critics contend that sending in the National Guard on a hastily improvised mission like this probably will not do much to stem the flow of illegal immigrants from the south of the border, this as concerns about securing that border continue to mount in this country. Despite the criticism, the Border Patrol people here say they welcome the addition of the Guard, something they say will free up agents to do the work of law enforcement."

DOJ_NMG_0031649

Report Finds Illegals Escape Portion Of Tax Burden. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Brulliard, 744K) reports a study by the Urban Institute shows that taxes "paid by immigrant households in the Washington region are on par with those paid by native-born Americans, although immigrants here illegally pay less." DC-area immigrants "pay nearly one-third of their income to the government -- at least $10 billion a year -- but those here illegally pay less than $1 of every $5 they earn in taxes, the report says. That is partly because they earn less but also because many are paid off the books and escape payroll taxes.

Stabenow's "Balancing Act" On Immigration Draws Criticism Form Left And Right. The Washington Times (6/5, Lambro, 90K) reports Sen. Debbie Stabenow "is under attack in Michigan for straddling the fence on the immigration bill, attempting to please both sides of an issue that has deeply divided her political base." Stabenow "has come under fire" from Republicans and the Lansing State Journal, "a major state newspaper," for "opposing key amendments that would crack down on the hiring of illegal aliens. According to the Times, "While Mrs. Stabenow's votes on the bill appeared contradictory to some, Michigan Democrats said she was striking a balancing act on the measure by casting votes that would appeal to her state's Hispanics, but in the end voting against the entire bill, which much of her party's blue-collar constituencies oppose."

Immigration Sowing Discord Amongst Some GOP Rivals. The Washington Times (6/5, Hurt, 90K) reports, "From districts along the Mexican border to deeply landlocked districts, immigration has become both a rallying cry for Republicans in some races and a wedge that splinters Republicans in other races." The Times notes that Sen. John McCain cancelled his appearance at a fundraiser for former rep. Brian Bilbray, who is trying to replace former Rep. "Duke Cunningham, after Bilbray "publicly attacked" McCain's Senate legislation "because he said it granted 'amnesty' to illegals." Among other races briefly noted by the Times is the GOP primary in UT6, where Rep. Chris Cannon's support for a guest-worker program helped challenger John D. Jacob beat Cannon among delegates at the Utah GOP convention.

Grassley Tax Measure Complicates Immigration Reform Negotiations. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (6/5) writes, "On May 23, as the Senate raced toward passage of the comprehensive immigration bill" Sen. Charles Grassley "moved the adoption of a new Title III to the measure. It passed easily without anybody mentioning that the amendment raises revenue, which was a violation of the U.S. Constitution's requirement that all such measures originate in the House of Representatives. That adds another new obstacle to the formidable task of reconciling seemingly irreconcilable Senate and House immigration bills. To surmount the constitutional problem, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, in effect, must pass a new bill -- either under a procedure requiring unanimous consent or starting over with a bill subject to amendment." According to Novak, "There is no sign that Grassley intentionally sought to sabotage the immigration bill."

Annan Claims Migration Benefits Countries Of Origin And Receiving Countries. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M) Kofi Annan, secretary general of the UN, writes, "In a report that I am presenting tomorrow to the U.N. General Assembly, I summarize research which shows that migration, at least in the best cases, benefits not only the migrants themselves but also the countries that receive them, and even the countries they have left. How so? In receiving countries, incoming migrants do essential jobs which a country's established residents are reluctant to undertake. … Meanwhile, countries of origin benefit from the remittances that migrants send home, which totaled around $232 billion last year, $167 billion of which went to developing countries -- greater in volume than current levels of official aid from all donor countries combined, though certainly not a substitute."

TAX:

McCain Among GOP Senators Blocking Estate Tax Repeal. Roll Call (6/5, Stanton) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "hopes that the expected defeat of a GOP plan to fully repeal the estate tax this week will help increase pressure on the two wings of his fractured party to work together, along with moderate Democrats, to craft a compromise later this summer, Senate GOP aides said. … A motion to proceed to the bill is set for Wednesday, but a senior GOP aide said Thursday said that it remains well short of the 60 votes required to take up a full repeal measure. If that happens, leadership aides are expected to recommend that Frist drop the issue for now to 'let the dust settle' and allow compromise talks to continue behind the scenes before settling on a course of action." Roll Call goes on to report that "moderate" Republicans, "including Sen. John McCain, have argued that…the repeal sought by Frist and President Bush would expand the deficit by too much.'

WSJournal Says As Many As 62 Senators May Support Repeal. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), in an editorial, writes that with sixty votes needed "to defeat a liberal filibuster…we're told 56 Senators have indicated they'll vote for repeal, with another six undecided." The Journal adds, "It speaks volumes that opponents of repeal aren't debating the morality of the double or triple taxation that the death tax represents. Instead, they're basing their case on highly dubious Joint Tax estimates. These phony numbers may provide political cover both to fence-sitting Democrats and 'deficit hawk' Republicans such as" McCain and Sen. George Voinovich.

Sessions Says Estate Tax Is Among The "Most Painful" Taxes. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (6/5, 744K) Sen. Jeff Sessions writes that the estate tax – "or, as many of us prefer to call it, the death tax –" is "one of the IRS's most painful taxes, as it hits families at the worst possible time, when they are dealing with the death of a loved one."

Columnists Claim Repeal Would Diminish Assistance For The Needy. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (6/5) writes, "it's important to realize that there's still a clear connection between tax breaks for the rich and failure to help Americans in need. Any senator who votes to repeal the estate tax…is in effect saying that increasing the wealth of people who are already in line to inherit millions or tens of millions is more important than taking care of fellow citizens who need a helping hand."

The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (6/5) writes, "It doesn't matter if you are liberal or conservative, Democrat or Republican. There is no possible excuse for doing what Congress is poised to do this week: Abolish the estate tax." Mallaby adds, "The nation faces rising inequality. … What is the dumbest possible response to this? Identify the most progressive federal tax and repeal it."

IRS Will Split Tax Refunds Among 3 Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (6/5) reports, "Hoping to encourage Americans to save more of their tax refunds, the Internal Revenue Service will change its rules to allow taxpayers who opt for direct deposit of their refunds to divide the money among as many as three accounts. Taxpayers would have to fill out an additional form -- dubbed Form 8888 -- to take advantage of the program." The Journal continues, "'Split refunds should encourage saving, and we hope it will dampen demand for refund anticipation loans,' said IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson. The program will take effect in January."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

High Court Taking Fewer New Cases. The Washington Post (6/5, A13, Lane) reports, "The inscription on the Supreme Court's front door declares 'Equal Justice Under Law.' But lately it almost seems that 'Going Out of Business' might be more accurate. … That's because the justices have been unusually stingy about agreeing to hear new cases." The Post continues, "Out of thousands of petitions for certiorari, as appeals are known, the court has granted only 16 for the term beginning in October. That is nine fewer than the 25 it had granted by this point in the previous term. … The court has an opportunity to issue more grants today and on each of the remaining three Mondays in June. But it is unlikely that the court will be able to find the 16 cases it would take to fill up its 32-hour fall oral argument calendar, lawyers who specialize in Supreme Court practice said. … Even for a court whose caseload has declined from about 150 to about 80 per term over the past quarter-century, this is a slow pace." The Post adds, "Lawyers who practice regularly before the Supreme Court are aware of the trend but are at a loss to account for it. … One factor, lawyers noted, might simply be the lack of lower-court rulings that cry out for correction. Usually the court looks to resolve 'circuit splits' -- conflicting decisions by regional appeals courts on major issues. … But with the appeals courts increasingly stocked by Republican appointees, there is relatively less disagreement among them."

Medicaid Citizenship Rules Seen As Hardship For Children And The Elderly. The New York Times (6/5, Pear, 1.19M) reports the Bush administration "plans this week to issue strict standards requiring more than 50 million low-income people on Medicaid to prove they are United States citizens by showing passports or birth certificates and a limited number of other documents." The Times notes that "federal health officials" considered granting states "broad discretion to accept affidavits in place of official documents. But House Republicans complained, and the administration backed off, allowing affidavits 'only in rare circumstances.'" According to the Times, "advocates for the poor" claim the new requirements "could cause hardship for children, older Americans and poor people born at home in rural areas who never received birth certificates. Children account for about half of Medicaid recipients. People 65 and older account for about 10 percent."

White House's Wehner Highlights Underreported Positive Trends In The News. In a Washington Post op-ed (6/5, A15), Peter Wehner, director of the White House's Office of Strategic Initiatives, says, "By now Americans know the litany: The nation is engaged in a difficult and costly war in Iraq; Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon; gas prices are high; the costs of reconstructing the Gulf Coast region are huge; illegal immigration is a major problem -- and more." But these issues "aren't the whole story -- and they ought not color the lens through which we see all other events." A "strong case can be made that in a number of areas there are positive trends and considerable progress." We are "witnessing a remarkable cultural renewal in America. Violent crime rates remain at the lowest levels in the history of the Bureau of Justice Statistics' survey (which started in 1973). We are experiencing the sharpest decline in teen crime in modern history. Property crimes are near the lowest levels in the history of the federal survey. Welfare caseloads have declined almost 60 percent since 1996. Both the abortion rate and ratio are at the lowest levels we have seen in the 30-year period these data have been tracked." Other positive news includes the economy, which is "the strongest in the world and growing faster than that of any other major industrialized country," the US is using its "military power to promote great purposes" and "we are witnessing one of the swiftest advances of freedom in history." The "trajectory of events is in our favor -- and with the passage of time, all this will become clear enough."

Kappes Will Return To CIA. Time (6/12, Burger) reports in its "Notebook" column that Stephen Kappes, a former CIA operations chief, will rejoin the CIA as predicted. Kappes "would rejoin a CIA that has changed considerably since he quit in November 2004 after a management dispute with Porter Goss." Time adds, "Many career spooks are said to be thrilled by the symbolism of bringing back a man who stood up to the unpopular Goss, who quit last month. But the return of Kappes, who declined interview requests last week, is receiving some mixed reviews."

Congressional Lobbying Reform Negotiations Have Stalled. The AP (6/5, Abrams) reports, "The stench of scandal on Capitol Hill is getting stronger five months after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to influence-peddling charges, but a lobbying overhaul has yet to see the light of day." The AP notes that in January both parties "battled for the ethical high ground." Rep. David Dreier, "who has led GOP lobbying efforts in the House, said at the time he hoped to pass a bill by the end of February." Dreier's spokeswoman, Jo Maney, "said the effort to reach consensus on the bill has been a challenge because some lawmakers are opposed to any changes while others favor revamping the entire system."

Municipal Governments Increasingly Relying On Lobbyists For Earmarks. Business Week (6/12) reports that as Congress "has moved toward passing more narrowly targeted spending projects, known as earmarks, a niche lobbying business has sprouted to steer that money to local interests." A "surprisingly large number of legislators have resigned themselves to the outsourcing of federalism. Some say that given the press of other legislative duties, they welcome any help they can get." More than "800 state and local governments, or their arms, employed a lobbyist on Capitol Hill in 2005, some more than one, according to a count done for BusinessWeek by the Web site lobbyists.info."

Administration Enforcement Of Medical Privacy Law Criticized. A front page story in the Washington Post (6/5, A1, Stein, 744K) reports, "In the three years since Americans gained federal protection for their private medical information, the Bush administration has received thousands of complaints alleging violations but has not imposed a single civil fine and has prosecuted just two criminal cases. … While praised by hospitals, insurance plans and doctors, the approach has drawn strong criticism from privacy advocates and some health industry analysts. They say the administration's decision not to enforce the law more aggressively has failed to safeguard sensitive medical records and made providers and insurers complacent about complying."

Study Urges Government To Recognize "Strategic Value" Of CORs. The Washington Post (6/5, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that a study released by the Merit Systems Protection Board urges the federal government to "find ways to identify and track" contracting officer representatives, or CORs, "improve their training opportunities and recognize their 'strategic value.'" The Post adds, "A significant proportion of the CORs told the Merit Systems Protection Board that their contracts failed to meet at least one of these goals: quality, timeliness, completeness and cost. Only 52 percent of the CORs said their contracts met all of the goals at the same time. … The study also questioned whether some agencies are doing enough to support CORs so they can crack down on waste, fraud and abuse, and the board recommended that agencies ramp up training for CORs."

NYTimes Says Drug Benefit Has Left Some Worse Off. An editorial in the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) says that while the new Medicare drug benefit "has scored some real successes after a staggeringly bad start, but it seems to have left some beneficiaries worse off." The Bush Administration "seems to have resolved most of the bureaucratic and computer problems that initially left tens of thousands of people unable to obtain essential medicines quickly. Complaints at pharmacies have dropped precipitously, and callers who once found it impossible to get through congested help lines now typically wait only a few minutes when trying to reach either Medicare or most individual health plans."

US Firms Post Unprecedented Rate Of Growth. The Financial Times (6/4, Swann, Guerrera) reports, "US companies have increased their share of the economic pie at a faster rate over the past five years than at any time since the second world war. Recent government figures show that profits from current production as a share of national income have risen from 7 per cent in mid-2001 to 12.2 per cent at the start of this year. This rate of growth is unprecedented since collection of these figures began in 1947."

Central Bankers Seek To Discourage Speculative Investments. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Browning, LaHart, 2.11M) reports that the world's central bankers "are draining away some of the easy money that has made investors' lives comfortable for years. … If they keep mopping up the excess liquid cash they had helped pour into the markets, they will eventually slake the world's thirst for speculative investments, forcing investors toward established stocks, government bonds and other safe investments. If they decide to go easy, as Japanese officials recently have been doing, then maybe some of the speculative investments can hang on."

Florida Republicans Worried About Harris' Senate Bid. USA Today (6/5, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports that Rep. Katherine Harris' bid for the GOP Senate nomination in Florida is "inspiring dread among many in her party. Whether they measure by fundraising, polls, disarray, ethics, strange behavior or potential to polarize, they see trouble." Although Gov. Jeb Bush, said Harris could not win, and "staged a search for an alternative," the September 5 primary "will pit three little-known latecomers against the high-profile Harris." USA lists Harris' "other problems," including her "appearance," her "sketchy record" and her ties to corrupt defense contractor Mitchell Wade.

Jeb Bush Called Best Governor In US. In the Weekly Standard's cover story (6/12), Fred Barnes says if Gov. Jeb Smith's "last name were Smith," he would "be the prohibitive frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. But his last name is Bush. So Jeb Bush, nearing the end of his eight years as governor of Florida, has to settle for being the best governor in America." Bush has been "recognized as the best by a smaller group: governors who served with him and experts and think-tank and conservative policy wonks who regard state government as something other than a machine for taxing and spending." Barnes concludes the lengthy profile by saying, "We know he's not running for president in 2008. But what about 2012 or 2016? He seems disinclined."

In Possible 2008 Preview, Warner, Allen Cross Paths In Richmond. The Washington Post (6/5, B1, Shear, 744K) reports, "The orbits of former governor Mark R. Warner (D) and U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) collided Saturday at Richmond's swank Jefferson Hotel, offering a preview of what the 2008 election might bring if Virginia's two most ambitious politicians seek the White House. … In six months, the prospect of a chance meeting of Warner and Allen might not seem so novel. Both are openly flirting with a presidential bid, although neither admits to having made a final decision. An announcement from either could come after the November elections."

Gore Says He Has "All But Ruled Out" Another Presidential Bid. The Washington Post/AP (6/5, A5) reports that former Vice President Al Gore "says he has all but ruled out running for president in 2008, saying the best use of his time is to educate people about global warming. … Gore, in an interview broadcast yesterday on ABC's This Week, stopped short of issuing…an unequivocal statement. But he said his time is best spent educating people on heat-trapping gases raising Earth's surface temperature."

Kristol Says Gore, Not Clinton Is Favorite For 2008 Democratic Nomination. On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "There's a huge opening for" Sen. Hillary Clinton "to be challenged from the left. Gore is the strongest challenger, probably, from the left. And I think…he can get in the race a year from now. It will be Clinton vs. Gore. I think Warner, Bayh, Feingold -- I think those people start to fade awfully fast. And I believe Gore could beat Clinton in the Iowa caucuses. … The notion that Hillary Clinton should be favored over Al Gore strikes me, at this point, as wrong. … I think he could be the nominee in 2008."

Brown Running For California Attorney General. The New York Times (6/5, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Jerry Brown's candidacy for California attorney general. Brown "is running to fill a law-and-order post that is beholden to the demands of other state officials — not to mention Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican — might surprise those who remember his maverick, on-my-own 1992 presidential bid. That was his most recent venture on the national political stage. (And his last, he says.) But as the mayor of Oakland since 1999, Mr. Brown has largely run, and delivered, on a promise to crack down on violent crime, which has plagued the city. Mr. Brown says that his experiences living in downtown Oakland, in a loft above his campaign headquarters, have given him an up-close look at the problem."

CDC Estimates AIDS Has Infected More Than 65 Million People. The New York Times (6/5, Times, 1.19M) reports that 25 years after the first mention of a "peculiar cluster of pneumonia cases in five otherwise healthy gay men," in the June 5, 1981 Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the US estimates that HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, "has infected more than 65 million people, 25 million of whom have died." The Times story also examines the disease's impact on a New York City nurse, an HIV-infected mother in Atlanta, an Indian prostitute, an artist, a doctor who wrote "what AIDS chroniclers regard as the first article on the emergence of -- well, of something unusual and terrible, but exactly what was not clear at the time" and the friends of AIDS victims.

AIDS Survivors Profiled. ABC World News Tonight (6/4, story 11, 0:20, Rooney, 8.78M) profiled long-time AIDS survivor JT Anderson, who is "working as a counselor, sometimes telling people, they, too, have the disease, AIDS has defined his life." Anderson: "I wish I did not have to live through that time. But I have been. And I have survived it. And I'm very happy that I have. This is the basic regimen."

The CBS Evening News (6/4, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) profiled long-time AIDS survivor LaGena Lookabill Greene, who has lived with the disease for 25 years.

Writer Praises Warren's Approach To Religion And Public Life. Tom Krattenmaker, a writer specializing in religion in public life, writes in USA Today (6/5, 2.31M), "Is 'inclusive' Christianity just watered-down religion — a weakened faith that compromises the Truth for the sake of political correctness? Listening to the more strident voices in today's debates over religion in public life, one could easily reach that conclusion. … Happily, another model is emerging, one that makes a compelling case that evangelical belief in the public square need not always divide us. The exemplar of this other approach: Rick Warren, the pastor of an evangelical megachurch in California, the author of the mega-selling Purpose-Driven Life." Warren "is spending his time and clout…on a campaign that can bring people together and save many lives in the process. Warren is taking on poverty and AIDS and on a continent — Africa — that tends to command the least of the world's attention and resources."

Professor Makes Case For Tradeable Gasoline Rights. Martin Feldstein, a professor of economics at Harvard, writes in the Wall Street Journal (6/5, 2.11M), "The rapid rise in the price of gasoline has produced calls for tougher fuel economy standards on new cars and trucks. Although reduced gasoline consumption would be good for the environment and for national security, such a regulatory change would be a mistake. A far better approach would be a system of tradeable gasoline rights, or TGRs. … In short, a system of tradeable gasoline rights would be better than either higher taxes or tougher new car regulations. … It would be an efficient way to reduce gasoline that Congress could actually pass."

Herbert Praises Boston's SkillWorks Program. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) about "a modest but promising joint effort by business, government, union and nonprofit leaders in the greater Boston area to open new doors to good jobs and higher standards of living." The effort, called SkillWorks, was "organized by the Boston Foundation, to improve the skills and career opportunities of the low-wage work force in a number of industries. … What SkillWorks is attempting to do is merge investment commitments from foundations and the government (Mayor Thomas Menino is solidly onboard) with a willingness of business leaders to actually provide meaningful employment and promotion opportunities to the kind of men and women whose talents have long been overlooked, and thus wasted." SkillWorks "is a serious attempt to address at least one aspect of this complex picture in a way that is beneficial to employers while keeping the best interests of the workers in mind."

Hevesi Criticized Over Suggestion About Shooting Bush. In an editorial, the New York Times (6/5, 1.19M) writes New York State comptroller Alan Hevesi "should know better than to suggest that anybody — in this case Senator Charles Schumer — would like to put a bullet between the president's eyes. That is the opposite of funny, and an outrageous remark for a public figure."

LATimes Praises Effort To Replace Electoral College. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (6/5, 958K) praises the National Popular Vote campaign, "which intends to undermine the Constitution's anachronistic Electoral College. If the campaign succeeds, future presidents will take office only if they win the popular vote nationwide. … The beauty of this approach is that each state is constitutionally allowed to allot its electoral votes as it sees fit. The measure was approved by California's Assembly on Tuesday and is pending in four other states; backers hope to get it before all 50 states by January."

Rice Claims US Offer To Negotiate With Iran Is Not A Change Of Policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, on CBS' Face the Nation (6/4, Schieffer), said the recent US statement about negotiating with Iran were not a change in policy. Said Rice, "When the President made the decision more than a year ago that the United States was going to fully support the European negotiations, that that was in the US interest to have the diplomacy have a chance to work, that really was the course that we continued to follow this week." She added that "it was clear that at some point, we were going to have to decide should the United States become party to the talks that we already supported." During her appearances on Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) and CNN's Late Edition (6/4, Blitzer) Rice made very similar statements regarding the evolution of US policy towards Iran. On Fox, Rice noted, "The decision to join the talks is a natural follow-on to the decision that the president took more than a year ago to fully and completely back the negotiations." While on CNN she maintained that "this is a path that really is logical given the president's decision more than a year ago to fully support and back the European three negotiations with Iran, with some steps that the United States took, for instance, removing our objections to a WTO application for Iran. The next step of offering to join the talks should Iran suspend its enrichment programs, the condition that the IAEA board of governors, that's a logical step in a policy that's really been set for more than a year."

Iran Announcement Seen As A Diplomatic Win For Bush Administration. Time (6/12, Shannon) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Chalk up a diplomatic win for the White House. President Bush's surprise offer last week to talk to Tehran yielded breakthroughs that have momentarily quelled fears of U.S. military action against the Iranian regime." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "obtained an unprecedented commitment from Moscow and Beijing to support penalties in the Council if Iran refuses a package of political and economic incentives and continues nuclear activities that could enable it to build a Bomb." Time adds that "the pressure on Iran from all sides is growing. An International Atomic Energy Agency report on Iran's activities is expected next week, and Western diplomats tell TIME that it will include 'potentially incriminating' details about traces of highly enriched uranium recently found by inspectors on equipment at the Lavisan-Shian military site."

Newsweek (6/12, Hirsh) reports that a month ago, Rice's strategy for stopping Iran's nuclear program "was in danger of falling apart." In addition to US allies who were "voicing doubts about Rice's approach," Rice "faced a separate mutiny from the rear: mounting skepticism in the White House that diplomacy could work at all, along with tough resistance to direct talks from the hard-line faction of Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld." A senior Administration official says that on May 8 he "idea of two paths was born." The two paths "involve delivering a clear ultimatum to Tehran and, with it, a brand-new inducement. According to the new approach, if Iran cooperates and suspends enrichment of uranium, Washington will sit down and negotiate directly alongside its European partners." Newsweek notes, "As she has so often done, Rice had found a graceful way out of her troubles by compromising -- and winning President George W. Bush over to her views. In one swift move, she managed to get ahead of the Iranians, outflank administration hard-liners, delight and unify her European partners (even the Russians) -- and spin the whole affair as a triumph of U.S. leadership."

Rice Allows Iranian Government "A Little Time" To Respond To US Offer. Secretary Rice, commenting on the Iranian government's response to the offer of face-to-face talks with the US, on CBS' Face the Nation (6/4, Schieffer), said, "We're going to give the diplomacy a little time here. And we're not going to react to everything the Iranian leadership says. Over the last couple of days, they have said lots of different things. … Iran keeps talking about its right to civil nuclear power. No one is questioning that it has a right to civil nuclear power. But many countries have the right to that that don't enrich and reprocess on their territory. And given Iran's history, it must not have the technologies that could lead to a nuclear weapon."

On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) Rice contended that, "We understand that it may take a little time for Iran to assess the situation. In short time they will be presented with the actual proposals that the E.U. three and others have been considering. And I think we have to give that some time." However, "We will not allow Iran to drag this out. This really has to be settled not in a matter of months. This program has been moving along. But one reason, Chris, that you want to be sure that there's a suspension of the activity is that you don't want the negotiations to be used as a cover for continued progress along the nuclear front. "

USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) picks up Rice's comments in a story tiled "Rice: Iran Must Act Quickly On Incentives," while the AP (6/5, Pickler) headlines its report "Rice Warns Iran Against A Slow Response." The Washington Times (6/5, Pfeiffer, 90K) also reports the story.

Biden Endorses Negotiations With Iran, Claims There Is No "Imminent Threat." Responding to the administration's shift in policy towards Iran, Sen. Joseph Biden, on NBC's Meet the Press (6/4, Russert) said, "I think it's a very positive step. … I think it's long in coming, but very welcome." According to Biden, "this was a bit of a knockdown, drag-out fight between Cheney and Condoleezza Rice, and Rice won this round as to how to proceed with regard to Iraq. What you do is you continue to proceed down the line that apparently Secretary Rice now has the president on rather than return to the bellicose notions of threats." Biden added, "We shouldn't undertake military action now. It should be the absolute last resort. And one of the things that I've gotten all the briefings as most of the people in my position have, and there is no imminent threat at this point." Asked if the US public would believe

President Bush if he said Iran possesses WMDs and that military action is necessary, Biden responded, "No."

Khamaneni Threatens To Disrupt Middle East Oil Supply If US Attacks. CBS Evening News (6/4, story 3, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "As if the oil markets are not rattled enough, Iran's top leader threatened today to choke off the flow of Persian Gulf oil if the US were to attack the country." CBS (Phillips) added, "The threat came in the form of a rhetorical broadside from Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and will send shivers through the world's oil markets. If you, he said, meaning the United States, make a wrong move regarding Iran, definitely the energy flow from this region will be seriously endangered. The key phrase in that threat is the use of the term 'in this region' not just Iranian but Saudi, Kuwaiti, Iraqi, all the oil from around the gulf has to flow through the narrow Strait of Hormuz, just 21 miles wide as it tucks up against the Iranian coast." In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "downplayed the threat saying playing the oil card was too risky a strategy for Iran." Secretary Rice: "Well, I think that we shouldn't place too much emphasis on a threat of this kind. After all, Iran is also very dependent on oil revenue. I think something like 80% of Iran's budget comes from oil revenue."

NBC Nightly News (6/4, story 5, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "It's a threat that was quickly dismissed by the US. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice suggested the cost to Iran would be too high if it stopped the flow of oil. She also had a warning of her own, that Iran needed to decide quickly on new incentives to end its nuclear enrichment program or face sanctions."

The New York Times (6/5, Knowlton, Tribune, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "played down today a threat from Tehran to curb oil exports if the United States made 'a single mistake about Iran,' but added that Iranian leaders had a limited window for taking up a six-nation offer of incentives if they stop enriching uranium."

In its coverage, the Washington Post (6/5, A10, Vick, 744K) keys on Khamenei's comments, reporting that he "unleashed a flurry of broadsides Sunday at the United States and other countries confronting his government over its nuclear program, saying that suggestions of a consensus against Iran were 'a lie.' 'There is no consensus against Iran. This is a lie by the US and a few other US supporters,' Khamenei...in a speech. 'Some 116 member states of the Non-Aligned Movement supported Iran's brave achievements in nuclear technology. The consensus is among a few monopolist countries. Their consensus is of no value.'" The AP (6/5, Dareini) also reports the story.

Lifting Of Some US Sanctions On Table For Tehran, Diplomats Say. AFP (6/5, Adler) reports, "The United States has offered to lift some of its trade sanctions against Iran as part of a package of benefits the EU will deliver to get Tehran to guarantee it will not make nuclear weapons, diplomats told AFP. The United States is proposing 'lifting sanctions partially, not only waiving sanctions but actually lifting them,' in an agreement to be worked out in multilateral talks that would start once Iran suspended uranium enrichment, said a senior Western diplomat, who requested anonymity." According to AFP, "The United States 'is not only interested in allowing Europe to sell Airbus airplanes to Tehran but also supplying (US-made) Boeings,' the diplomat said. And trade in agricultural fields, 'where the United States is particularly competitive...is important for Iran since Iran is still a rural country in lots of ways,' the diplomat added."

"Relatively Conciliatory Statements" By Iran Seen As Raising US Hopes. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Solomon, 2.11M) reports, "A series of relatively conciliatory statements by senior Iranian officials over the weekend is raising hopes that Tehran may be preparing to respond positively to a call by the US for direct talks over its nuclear program." President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said his government would seriously study a package of incentives, expected to be delivered by European envoys, aimed at persuading Iran to scrap development of nuclear technologies. … The seemingly encouraging tone, however, was countered by other Iranian leaders."

Shanghai Cooperation Organization To Consider Offering Membership To Iran. The Washington Times (6/5, Mainville, 90K) reports, "An obscure regional security group will consider admitting Iran as a member at a summit this month, accelerating its transformation into a political and military bloc with the potential to challenge US interests." The Times adds, "US analysts think Russia and China already are using the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) -- which links the two with four Central Asian neighbors -- to try to squeeze the United States out of the region."

US-Funded Radio Farda Reaches Out To Young Iranians. The Washington Post (6/5, A13, Finkel, 744K) reports on the US-funded Radio Farda, which broadcasts inside Iran. According to the Post, Radio Farda "has been a work in progress since its debut in late 2002. The one constant, for which it has been both lauded and criticized, is that unlike Cold War-era transmissions by the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe that relied primarily on news programming, Farda blends news and music as a way to reach a country where two-thirds of the population is said to be under 30."
